Daddo said she became enthralled with Ladino at an early age, explaining to the Beth Emeth audience that, as a child, she would visit the markets near her hometown of Akko with her grandfather and hear the language spoken by the merchants.

"For me, Ladino is the smell of cinnamon and flowers," Daddo told the crowd, then urged them to clap along as the band picked up tempo and blasted into a rousing drinking song.

The concert-goers clapped, sang, shouted, and one inspired patron ululated repeatedly for all to hear, which brought smiles to the band.

"That's it!" Daddo shouted appreciatively. "Now you're thinking like you're in the Middle East."

For their part, the band was thrilled to be in Canada.

"It's great being in Toronto," said Yuval Keydar, the band's pianist/guitarist. "Dganit brought this music to us and now we can bring it to you."

Keydar said the band plans to record another album in Ladino and return to Toronto again afterward.

"This is a beautiful thing they're doing," gushed one woman after the show, as she rushed to purchase a copy of the CD on sale outside concert hall.

Rabbi releases Shabbat-inspired CD

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

If Shabbat is a day of rest and spiritual enrichment, then Shawn Zevit has just put together its accompanying soundtrack.

Titled Generations: Journey Across the Ages, the double CD is both an ode to the spirit of Shabbat's past and a nod to its future.

Featuring various guest vocalists and musician friends playing mandolin, violin, percussion and bass, the project is full of Zevit's rhapsodic meditations on the Sabbath.

On disc one, Zevit, a Reconstructionist rabbi, melds 15 traditional Shabbat liturgies and zmirot with his gentle folk, pop and New Age inspired arrangements and lyrics.

Zevit envisioned this disc as a "spiritual journey… a complete experiential entry into the Sabbath" that invites the listener to absorb the music in comfort at their own pace.

And the disc has the desired effect of shepherding the listener to a dreamlike soundscape, where one can allow these songs to engulf them and strip them of their weekday hardships.

But while disc one is Zevit's attempt to infuse Shabbat songs with modern musical interpretations, disc two is solidly rooted in tradition and fuelled by personal nostalgia.

All 15 tracks on the second CD were culled from original Shabbat recordings made by Zevit and his grandfather in the early 1990s.

After his grandfather died in 2003, Zevit knew the work on this part of the album would be difficult.

"I don't think I was ready to go into the studio right away. The loss was too palpable," he said. "But a couple of years later I was ready to go back in and sit and listen to his voice, and it felt like God aligned the universe to make the possibility happen to record this album."

For many, listening to disc two will be like travelling back in time.

The sounds of Zevit, his grandfather and his family singing Shabbat melodies around the dinner table will strike an emotional chord with anyone who's lost a grandparent with whom they've shared similar moments.

The contrast between the two CDs is striking. But that's exactly what Zevit had in mind with Generations.

"It's triggering people to think of their spiritual lives… where they are vis-a-vis innovation versus tradition. CD one versus CD two," Zevit said. "I wanted to show people how they could be in a relationship with an abstract thing called Judaism. It's an actual relationship with family, lineage and history."

Winnipeg-born Zevit called Toronto home for many years before moving to Philadelphia in 1993 to marry and settle down.

By HARRISON JORDAN
Special to The CJN

The Barenaked Ladies hit the stage at the Air Canada Centre in Toronto last month as part of an 18-city cross-country tour that ended Feb. 26 in St. John's.

Before that, they toured the United States last fall in support of two new independent studio albums – Barenaked Ladies Are Me and Barenaked Ladies Are Men.

But now that they're older – they've been together almost 20 years – the Ladies definitely appreciate the comforts of home.

"I built my own studio because I was sick of having to go to Los Angeles or Nashville to make a record," said front-man Steven Page, who grew up in a Jewish family in the former municipality of Scarborough. "This way we can see our families and have real lives."

The band recorded 29 new songs and divided them up into two albums.

"We were trying to make [the albums] balanced with emotional content, who sang what, and so on," Page said.

"I think the first record is more concentrated, and the second is more eclectic, but in a certain way more what people are used to."

The Ladies may be older, but they still like to have fun.

In between recording the albums and touring North America, BNL (as some of their fans call them) headlined a Ships and Dip event, which involved performing their songs on a cruise ship for four days.

Guitarist Ed Robertson challenged lucky fans to a game of "Guitar Hero," and Page spoke to his shipmates about wine tasting.

There was even a photo shoot in which the band and their fans posed bare naked (no pun intended).

"We were all nervous, but it was a lot of fun. We had 500 fans show up for this big, nude picture," Page said.

Page and the Ladies are also seriously involved in projects related to the environment, including their own Barenaked Planet initiative.

"The main goal is to make our backstage area have a considerably smaller environmental footprint than it had," he said.

"The touring industry is not a particularly green-friendly one. We have a lot of buses and trucks, with generators running all day, and backstage there is no recycling. We have to change all of that."

Page is also one of the founders of the Canadian Music Creators Coalition, which aims to end copying restrictions on digital music files.

"If I buy from the grocery store, I can use those eggs however I want," is how Page describes the coalition's philosophy.

BNL will be touring England later this month.

Before that, Page said, "I'm looking forward to spending time with my family, and start making another record."

TEATRON'S THE GOD OF ISAAC AT LEAH POSLUNS MARCH 21 to 25

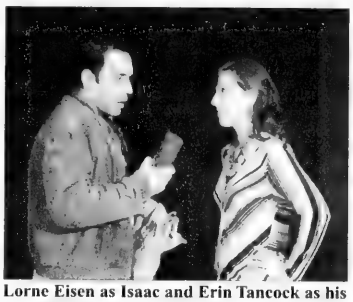
"Hilarious, shrewd and touching" is how the Chicago Sun Times summed up The God of Isaac, a comedy by Chicago playwright James Sherman about a young Jewish man in search of his spiritual roots and identity.

"I'm always looking for plays that have a serious Jewish dilemma," says Toronto director Ari Weisberg. "It's not enough for me just to have a Jewish character or a Jewish playwright. James Sherman has written quite a number of plays with Jewish content, and he sent The God of Isaac to me. I like it because of its content and because it has some autobiographical aspects to it."



Lorne Eisen as Isaac and Erin Tancock as his wife Shelley have a frank discussion about non-kosher salami in their home in The God of Isaac.

Weisberg is founding artistic director of Teatron Theatre, which stages thematically Jewish plays; a recent example is Alfred Uhry's The Last Night of Ballyhoo, which ran at the Leah Posluns Theatre in January. The God of Isaac is Teatron's next ambitious project, and Weisberg and a cast of six are readying for the opening next week.

"It tells of a young man who was brought up culturally Jewish, and something happens and he decides to search for his roots… Sherman's script toes the fine line between a comedy and a serious discussion of religious and cultural identity." Catch Teatron's The God of Isaac at the Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., March 21 to 25. Tickets are $15 (previews) to $40. 416-616-5350

Names in the News: Celebrity psychic and spoon-bender Uri Geller is so buoyed with the success of his Israeli television show, The Successor, that he's hoping to replicate the formula in England. The program, which ostensibly seeks a psychic to follow in Geller's footsteps, invites members of the public to perform astonishing feats. One episode, in which a contestant stopped his heart for 30 seconds, generated controversy after an Israeli youngster tried to copy the stunt and ended up in hospital.

The Andy Prize: One year after the untimely passing of his wife Andrea, philanthropist Charles Bronfman has announced the first recipient of the prize, which is to be awarded annually in her name.

Chosen by a panel of judges, the winner of the 2007 Andy Prize is Israeli artist and jeweller Itay Noy. Noy's work was chosen for its "philosophical exploration of the notion of time, evoking a dialogue with the viewer on both esthetical and conceptual levels." Bronfman will present an award of NIS 50,000 ($12,000 US) to Noy at a ceremony in Tel Aviv in June.

The Schumann Prize: Pianist Anton Kuerti is one of two recipients of Germany's 2007 Schumann Prize. The award is given every two years by the Robert Schumann Gesellschaft in association with the city of Zwickau, the composer's birthplace. Kuerti shares the honour with another Canadian, Vancouver musicologist Margit McCorkle. The 5,000-Euro ($7,650 Cdn) prize is to be awarded in Zwickau on Aug. 25; Kuerti will perform an all-Schumann concert as part of the ceremony.

His passion is music

He still refers to himself as a Torontonian despite being the director of outreach and external affairs for the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF) in Philadelphia.

When he isn't busily engaged in his duties with the JRF, Zevit is alternately writing (he's a published author), teaching, doing social justice work and sermonizing at various institutions around North America.

But his passion is music.

Not formally trained, he said he's "not someone who can sit down and read sheet music. I'm more a musician by ear." He added that, in his life, he's grateful to have worked with session players who recorded with Sly and the Family Stone and Van Morrison.

With this compilation, Zevit feels he's accomplished a great feat.

"Part of it was honouring the closeness of my relationship with my grandfather," he said. "The fact that in my family... that whole generation died within a couple of years... what was initially a personal project to preserve the family melodies that my grandparents had shared with me, suddenly became a project to teach about the depth of tradition."

For Zevit, Generations also became something more, an archival project that provided a way to protect a family legacy.

"My family is no longer all in one spot. They're all spread out. So the [liturgical family] legacy isn't uniform anymore," he said. "So what's gonna happen with this music? When I go, is it gone?"

Not anymore.

Zevit has tentative plans for a follow-up project, called Generations II, which he hopes to record over the next year.

Film explores controversy over Jerusalem's Gay Pride parade

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Pride, a new documentary short film by Toronto-based Chutzpa Productions in association with OUTtv, focuses on Israel's gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered (GLBT) community and its struggles to stage a parade last year in Jerusalem.

With Pride, producers Igal Hecht and Lior Cohen stay true to their company's philosophy of dealing with "contemporary issues that Jews in Israel and the Diaspora are faced with, yet are afraid to tackle."

Indeed, the film opens with a montage of vitriolic, anti-gay commentary from a haredi citizen, intolerant of the GLBT community's plan to march through the streets of the Holy City.

Scenes shift back and forth between members of Israel's GLBT communities hoping for a peaceful parade day and for acceptance and video of haredi mobs throwing stones at police while swearing to never allow such a thing to occur.

Shot over five intense days last November, Pride recaps how GLBT leaders rode an emotional roller-coaster as plans for their parade were made and subsequently cancelled numerous times, due to national security fears, violent protests and breakdowns in negotiations.

The use of stark imagery in the case of haredi protests lends the film some heaviness, but the violence and hate are not what Hecht hopes the audience will come away with from the documentary.

"Yes, those [violent] scenes happened, and we couldn't avoid showing it. This is their opinion," he told The CJN. "But I hope the film also shows how amazing Israeli democracy is."

A couple hug while attending Israel's Gay Pride event in Jerusalem last November. [Chutzpa Productions]

In one subplot to the story, the filmmakers follow the path of two Tel Aviv men, previously married in Toronto, who become one of the first legally recognized, married, gay Israeli couples one week after the Israeli Supreme Court upheld their petition for recognition.

In another, the filmmakers visit with one of Jerusalem's first openly gay city councillors.

"Israel even allows gays and lesbians in the army. Not even the United States does this. This shows how advanced Israel's democracy is," Hecht said.

But for all that, the visceral vehemence of the haredim against the idea of a peaceful GLBT parade in Jerusalem is what dominates the mood of Pride.

Things work out, in a fashion, by the end of the film, but what's clear is that GLBT activists in Jerusalem still have a long fight ahead of them.

Yet it's that continued fight itself that, according to Hecht, serves to further enhance democracy in the Holy Land.

"Forget just saying that [Israel] is the only democracy in the Middle East and all that," he said. "No other country with such a volatile, powerful religious [element] would allow this to occur. Whether you agree or disagree with the [parade], that wasn't the issue. It was celebrating... Israeli democracy."

Pride is a thought-provoking, engaging documentary, which will undoubtedly raise the ire of some and swell pride in others.

Judge for yourself.

Pride airs on OUTtv Friday, March 16, 9:30 p.m.

Living in Israel as a new immigrant Moving Up: An Aliyah Journal by Laura Ben-David, Mazo Publishers.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Laura Ben-David and her family – husband Lawrence and children Shira, Lexi, Eitan and Ezra – made aliyah in the summer of 2002, when the Palestinian uprising was boiling over and Israel's future seemed bound up with escalating Arab violence.

Not an ideal time to settle in Israel, but the Ben-Davids were determined to keep a promise they had made to themselves.

And so off they went, come what may.

Ben-David kept a diary of their first year in their new home. Moving Up: An Aliyah Journal, the bestselling Israeli book on Amazon.ca, is the result.

This readable,though exclamation-filled volume traces their journey from Boca Raton, Fla., to Neve Daniel, a West Bank settlement in the Gush Etzion bloc, which Israel apparently intends to retain even in the event of a political agreement with the Palestinians.

Originally a New Yorker, Ben-David says that she was the very first immigrant to settle in Israel under the Nefesh B'Nefesh program, which encourages and facilitates aliyah from the United States and Canada. Since then, 10,000 others have made aliyah under its auspices.

She and her husband, both Orthodox Jews, flew to Israel with 12 huge suitcases and six large carry-ons. Their household goods had already been packed into containers and forwarded by ship.

"After lots of hugging, crying and stalling, we finally said goodbye," she writes.

Upon their arrival, her groups was greeted by, among others, Benjamin Netanyahu, Israel's former prime minister. "What a thrill! The whole experience made us feel like a million bucks."

So far, so good.

Accompanied by a reporter and photographer from a Boca Raton newspaper, the Ben-Davids had a wonderful first Shabbat in Neve Daniel, which is quite close to Bethlehem.

Within days, they started the process of "joining mainstream life in Israel," opening a bank account and applying for medical insurance.

But soon enough, they come face to face with the reality that Arabs not only live in the West Bank but also outnumber Jews by a wide margin.

Having seen Israeli army roadblocks, she observes, "We are all very alert here and watching for suspicious people and things. Unfortunately, we are dealing with a culture that we don't understand., A culture where nothing is sacred in their warped desire to rid Israel of all its Jews."

Later, she has a more direct encounter with Palestinians, when Arab children throw stones at her. Still later on, she is deeply affected by the news that 12 Israeli soldiers and police have been killed in an ambush in Hebron.

Primarily, Ben-David does not concern herself with Arabs in her book. She focuses, instead, on her reaction to the land and how she and her family adapt to it.

Like eager tourists, they explore Israel to know it better. "I love this land. Driving through it and going from mountains to farmland to desert to beach in one afternoon! It's unbelievable!"

Her observation of the ulpan, the Hebrew language class in which she is enrolled, may strike a chord of recognition among readers who have been there and done that.

"After I complete ulpan, I suppose I will have to go to a finishing school to learn to actually talk like the Israelis, and then perhaps I'll begin to understand them. In the meantime, it would help if I could learn to form a proper grammatical sentence in Hebrew."

By her sixth month in Israel, she is more or less fluent. "Despite how I make fun of myself, the reality is that I can now actually have a reasonable conversation in Hebrew, even over the phone. Even better, when I go into a store and talk to the sales help in Hebrew, they no longer feel bad for me and offer to speak to me in English. These are major accomplishments!"

Like anyone who has ever visited Israel, Ben-David quickly takes the measure of Israelis. As she puts it, "People are blunt and direct and expect everyone else to be as well."

She is not impressed by Israel's no-holds-barred political culture, being taken aback by the spectacle of the prime minister and foreign minister slinging mud at each other.

"Imagine if Dick Cheney started wholeheartedly bashing George W?"

Nor is she impressed by crooked car-repair shops, having heard from a friend that one shop brazenly replaced a broken window with a used one.

One immediately empathizes with Ben-David when she finally finds a restaurant that serves good old-fashioned pastrami sandwiches.

"This may not sound very exciting, but believe me – it is. I didn't even know that pastrami existed in Israel. It even had good mustard!"

She holds her breath as her husband, a computer expert, is granted a job interview thanks to a tip from a neighbour.

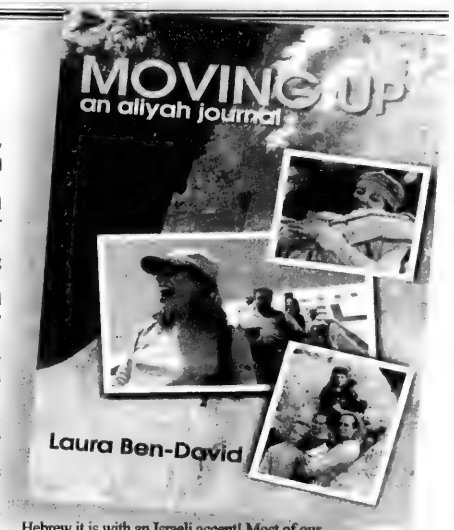
"The first interview went very well, and in fact he was called back for a second interview. Wow, imagine moving to Israel and getting a job from the first interview you land! Sounds too good to be true!!"

Her skepticism is well-grounded. He did not get the position, lacking proficiency in Hebrew.

But patience is a virtue, especially in Israel. An American company hires him, but on an Israeli salary. They are nevertheless happy.

Ben-David, too, is satisfied with the manner in which her children adapt to Israel.

"Over the past six months, we have watched incredible transformations in our kids," she writes. "We now hear [them] asking about where we will permanently settle (Neve Daniel seems the unanimous choice for our children!). We've seen resistance to Hebrew begin to melt away, and unlike us, when our kids speak Hebrew it is with an Israeli accent! Most of our kids have developed strong groups of friends. We've watched the awkwardness and strange feelings of being in a new location be replaced by familiarity and a true sense of belonging."



Ben-David exults in her own progress.

"While we still have a long way to go, I can't believe how far we've come. In six short months, our lives have changed in a most unbelievable way. We have left a world of leased luxury cars and come to a land of long-term owning of multi-passenger, functional vehicles. We left the beautiful manicured grass that is only for show, to a country that puts a playground on every corner... We've traded in Disney World for the Western Wall."

As Moving Up ends, Ben-David learns that she is pregnant with her fifth child.

What better way to finish a book like this than on that note?

Judaism comforts, gives strength at healing services

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The symbolism in Jewish traditions and prayers can give comfort and strength to those suffering from sickness and despair, asserts music therapist, educator, and holistic practitioner Yehudit Shier Weisberg.

"Any concept that I found in [the philosophy of] energy healing can be found there," she said.

Weisberg puts her belief to work in the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, together with co-ordinator Etta Ginsberg McEwan, former director of social work for Baycrest. Weisberg acts as a facilitator and also plays music during various programs.

McEwan, who is an advocate for the elderly and the disabled, was approached in 1995 by Rabbi Dow Marmur, then spiritual leader of Holy Blossom Temple. He had heard about programs of Jewish healing in the United States and felt that "if the U.S. could have that, we in Canada could, too," she said.

A committee met at Holy Blossom for several months to discuss what Jewish healing meant and the best way to use the concept. Finally, in the spring of 1996, McEwan said, "We decided it was time to stop talking and do something."

Rabbi Nancy Wechsler and Jack Kugelmas began a support group that ran for eight weeks. Similar groups now run for six weeks two or three times a year. These are led by a facilitator and a rabbi. Besides that, there are lectures, lecture series and conferences.

Originally, McEwan said, participants were those who themselves had terminal or chronic illnesses. Soon, she said, people came who felt isolated or suffered with personal despair. Now, caregivers and family members are also taking part, so they can develop the strength to deal with difficult situations.

An important part of the program now is a monthly healing service, which is held at the Lipa Green Building. Through music, meditation, blessings, discussions and prayers, Weisberg said, the participants come away inspired, uplifted and comforted with what Judaism has to say.

Weisberg said many people are not aware of the emotional healing that can take place through Jewish practice. For instance, "just as the Jewish day starts at night, and so goes from the darkness of night to the light of daytime, so too we go from despair to hope."

At the healing services, each participant lights a candle and makes a mishabeirach – a prayer for the health and well-being of his or herself or of someone else.

The different rhythms of the Jewish calendar form part of the discussion at the services, Weisberg said. For instance, Tu b'Shvat, the new year of the trees, symbolizes the sprouting of hope.

McEwan is especially pleased that rabbis of all denominations, Orthodox, Conservative, Reform and Reconstructionist, take part in the monthly service, as well as in the groups, lectures and conferences. For each support group, the same rabbi comes to all the sessions, she added.

The next healing service will be held on May 6. On April 25, Rabbi Yoel Glick will speak on "The Search for Wholeness in a Broken World," which will look at finding inner strength and solace in the face of adversity. His lecture, at 7:30 p.m. at Holy Blossom, is sponsored by the Toronto Jewish Healing Project and Holy Blossom.

Most of the people who help out with the healing project are volunteers, McEwan said. For instance, Farla Klayman took an active part in the monthly service. Now that she has retired, Ahuva Mintz, a student at Ulpanat Orot, comes to assist.

For several years, the Toronto Jewish Healing Project received a seed grant from Toronto Hebrew Memorial Park. Since that has ended, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been of some financial help, and McEwan and Weisberg said they are trying to get more, so that they can expand the program.

For more information about the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, call Etta Ginsberg McEwan at 416-968-1321.

CJN staffers and friends in the kitchen

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

With their typical enthusiasm, CJN staff and friends answered a call for their favourite Passover recipes. All recipes have been tested at home and should add something extra to your holiday meals.

A seder plate as seen in Entertaining on the Jewish Holidays by Ella Banin, Modan Publishing.

COUNTRY POTATO PIE
Frances Krafi

This recipe is from my well-used copy of Cooking What Comes Naturally, a 1970s vegetarian cookbook by Nikki Goldbeck. The pie – basically, a quiche with a potato crust – freezes well and is easy to adapt. I use sliced mushrooms along with the onion and omit the dry mustard that the original recipe calls for. Because this is a year-round recipe, it's a nice change from "Passover" food. I usually make one or two in foil pie plates for my daughter to have at university when she is away for part of the holidays.

2 tbsp. butter
3 medium potatoes, peeled
1½ tsp. salt
1 cup shredded Swiss cheese
½ cup chopped onion
2 eggs
1 cup milk
½ tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. chopped parsley
½ tsp. paprika

Spread 1 tbsp. butter over bottom and side of 9-inch pie plate. Shred potatoes and drain well. Sprinkle 1 tsp. salt on potatoes. Press over bottom and side of pie plate to form crust. Sprinkle cheese over potato crust.

Melt remaining 1 tbsp. butter in skillet. Add onion and cook until tender and transparent. Spread over cheese. Beat eggs with remaining ½ tsp. salt, milk, pepper, parsley and paprika. Pour over onion and cheese in pie plate.

Bake in 375 degree oven 40 to 45 minutes until edge of pie is golden and knife inserted in centre comes out clean. Let stand 10 minutes before serving. Yield: 4 servings.

MOO SHU VEGGIES
Gloria Clamen

For pancakes:
½ cup matzah cake flour
½ cup potato starch
2 tbsp. vegetable oil

For stir-fry:
cole slaw mix (¼ bag) or 2 cups shredded cabbage fresh shiitake mushrooms, sliced
1 tbsp. fresh minced ginger
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
1 tbsp. potato starch mixed with 1 tbsp. powdered soup mix and ⅔ cup water oil for frying lime juice (optional)

Garnish:
kosher for Pesach duck sauce
scallions

Pancakes:
Add ½ cup boiling water to other ingredients, knead by hand, cover for 20 minutes. Divide into 8 balls. If too sticky, add potato starch. Roll each ball into small pancake. Put into non-stick pan and fry (without oil) until brown spots form on each side. Save cooked pancakes.

Stir-fry:
In hot pan, add enough oil for stir-frying, add sliced mushrooms, ginger, shredded cabbage, sauté until soft. Add balsamic vinegar, starch mixture, stir until thickened. Add salt to taste and perhaps a splash of lime juice.

Assemble by placing mound of stir-fry on pancake, drizzle with duck sauce. This can be eaten rolled up or with (non-Chinese) knife and fork.

Note: Go heavy on the ginger to give it a more authentic flavour. Makes 8 pancakes.

SWEET MATZAH AND COTTAGE CHEESE PUDDING

Gloria Clamen

This is a dairy bread pudding – like custard baked between layers of matzah – and is delicious for brunch or dessert.

3 (6-inch square) matzot
1 lb. cottage cheese
3 large eggs
7 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ cup pecans, chopped (2 oz.)
⅓ cup raisins
½ stick (¼ cup) unsalted butter, melted accompaniment: sour cream

Preheat oven to 325. Soak matzot in cold water until slightly softened, 1 to 2 minutes. Drain on a rack.

Stir together cottage cheese, eggs, 6 tbsp. sugar, cinnamon, pecans and raisins. Coat bottom and sides of an 8-inch square baking dish with half of butter. Put 1 matzah in dish and spread half of cottage cheese mixture over it. Top with another matzah and remaining cottage cheese mixture. Top with remaining matzot, brush with remaining butter and sprinkle with remaining tbsp. sugar.

Bake in middle of oven until golden, puffed, and set, about 1 hour. Cut into squares and serve warm.

PRUNES AND ORANGES

Eleanor Ender

In a bowl, soak overnight 1 lb. of prunes in 1 cup of Madeira wine and one cup of red wine.

Transfer to a pot and add one cup of sugar, one cinnamon stick and the peel of one orange stuck with three cloves. Bring liquid to a boil and cook prunes 10-15 minutes. Let them cool in the liquid.

Peel the rind and outer membrane from three oranges and slice the oranges crosswise. Add to the prunes with ¼ cup of orange juice. Refrigerate.

BROWNIES

Elaine Ender, from the recipe collection of her late mother Sheila.

½ cup boiling water
½ cup cocoa (make a paste with water and cocoa)
2 eggs
½ cup sugar
½ cup oil
½ cup cake meal
1 tsp. instant coffee
2 tsp. water
½ cup chopped walnuts

Beat eggs, sugar, oil. Add cocoa paste to mixture and mix well. Add cake meal alternatively with 1 tsp. instant coffee mixed with 2 tsp. water. Add chopped walnuts. Mix well. Grease 8-inch square pan. Bake at 350 for 25-30 minutes. When taken out of oven, melt a chocolate bar on top.

Perfect Passover treats

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Passover, with its (sometimes confusing) dietary restrictions need not mean dessert lovers will suffer. With a little ingenuity and imagination, sweet endings can be as heavenly and decadent as the rest of the year when a baker's pantry is given full rein. The apple cinnamon cake below is moist and as lovely at the end of a meal as it is with a cup of tea. The brownies will satisfy even the ardent chocoholics and the gingered plum compote is a sublime and sweet ending to any meal.

CINNAMON APPLE ALMOND CAKE

This cake is moist and flavourful and will be a welcome addition to anyone's Passover baking repertoire.

½ cup matzah cake meal
1 cup toasted slivered almonds
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. salt
5 egg yolks
6 egg whites
1 cup granulated sugar
1¾ cups grated apples, such as Granny Smith or golden delicious
⅓ cup butterscotch or caramel sauce

Toasted Slivered Almonds

In food processor, combine matzah meal, almonds, cinnamon and half of salt. Pulse until finely ground.

In large bowl, using electric mixer, beat egg yolks with ¾ cup of the sugar until very thick and pale. Fold nut mixture and apples into yolk mixture; set aside. In separate bowl, using clean electric beaters, beat whites with remaining salt until soft peaks form. Gradually beat in remaining sugar until stiff peaks form. Fold one-quarter of whites into yolk/nut mixture to lighten. Fold in remaining whites.

Scrape batter into greased 9-inch springform pan. Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until cake springs back when lightly touched. Cool in pan on rack. Remove from springform to serve. (Cake can be removed from springform, wrapped in plastic wrap and stored at room temperature for up to 2 days).

Drizzle butterscotch sauce over and garnish with toasted slivered almonds. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

FUDGE WHITE CHOCOLATE CHIP BROWNIES

So fudgy, don't need anything on top. But if you want to gild the lily, a simple ganache topping is all that is required. Bring ½ cup non-dairy topping (unwhipped) to a boil. Pour over 4 oz. of chopped bittersweet chocolate, whisking until smooth and melted. Cool slightly. Pour over cooled brownies, spreading evenly.

4 oz. bittersweet or semisweet chocolate, chopped
2 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped
⅓ cup unsalted butter or margarine
1 cup granulated sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
⅓ cup potato starch
3 tbsp. matzah cake meal
½ cup white chocolate chips
⅓ cup chopped pecans (optional)

In bowl set over pot of hot, not boiling water, melt both chocolates and butter together, whisking until smooth. Whisk in sugar. Cool slightly. Whisk in eggs, one at a time, whisking well after each addition. Whisk in vanilla. Fold in potato starch and matzah cake meal. Fold in chips and pecans, if using. Scrape batter into parchment paper lined 8-inch cake pan.

Bake in centre of preheated 350 oven for 25 to 30 minutes or until cake tester comes out with some crumbs clinging to it. Cool in pan on rack. (Brownies can be stored in airtight container for up to 2 days). Makes 16 squares.

GINGERED PLUM COMPOTE WITH MANGO SORBET

This compote is also divine without the sorbet. Bake up some crispy, kosher for Passover cookies and then simply mound the compote in them for a restaurant style finish to your meal.

1 lb. plums, pitted and cut into ¼-inch thick wedges
¼ cup granulated sugar
3 tbsp. candied ginger, finely chopped
2 cups mixed fresh berries
4 cups prepared mango sorbet

In small bowl, stir together plums, sugar and ginger. Let stand at room temperature for 5 minutes. Stir in 2 tbsp. water. Transfer to oven-proof casserole, arranging in single layer. Broil, 4 to 6 inches from heat, stirring once, for 6 to 8 minutes or until fruit is soft. Remove from oven. Immediately stir in berries, until warmed through. (Compote can be kept, covered tightly with plastic wrap for up to 2 days. Rewarm briefly in microwave at 50 per cent power). Serve over sorbet. Makes 8 servings.

- 16 oz. semi-sweet chocolate = 6 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 1/4 cup oil and 7 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 14 oz. sweet chocolate (German-type) = 3 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder plus 2 2/3 tbsp. oil and 4 1/2 tbsp. granulated sugar
- 1 cup confectioners' sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar minus 1 tbsp. sugar plus 1 tbsp. potato starch pulsed in a food processor or blender
- 1 cup sour milk or buttermilk for nondairy baking = 1 tbsp. lemon juice in a 1 cup measure, then fill to 1 cup with Passover nondairy creamer. Stir and steep 5 minutes
- for butter in baking or cooking, use pareve Passover margarine in equal amounts. Use a bit less salt.
- 1 cup honey = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/4 cup water
- 1 cup corn syrup = 1 1/4 cups granulated sugar plus 1/3 cup water, boiled until syrupy
- 1 cup vanilla sugar = 1 cup granulated sugar with 1 split vanilla bean left for at least 24 hours in a tightly covered jar
- 1 cup flour – substitute 5/8 cup matzah cake meal or potato starch, or a combination sifted together
- 1 tbsp. flour = 1/2 tbsp. potato starch
- 1 cup corn starch = 7/8 cup potato starch
- 1 tsp. cream of tartar = 1 1/2 tsp. lemon juice or 1 1/2 tsp. vinegar
- 1 cup graham cracker crumbs = 1 cup ground cookies or soup nuts plus 1 tsp. cinnamon
- 1 cup bread crumbs = 1 cup matzah meal
- 1 cup matzah meal = 3 matzahs ground in a food processor
- 1 cup matzah cake meal = 1 cup plus 2 tbsp. matzah meal finely ground in a blender or food processor and sifted
- 3 crumbled matzahs = 2 cups matzah farfel
- 1 cup (8 oz.) cream cheese = 1 cup cottage cheese pureed with 1/2 stick butter or margarine
- gribenes = 2 carmelized onions. Saute 2 sliced onions in 2 tbsp. oil and 2 tbsp. sugar. Cook until the onions are soft. Puree the onions once they are golden.
- 1 cup milk (for baking) = 1 cup water plus 2 tbsp. margarine, or 1/2 cup fruit juice plus 1/2 cup water
- 1 1/4 cups sweetened condensed milk =1 cup instant nonfat dry milk, 2/3 cup sugar, 1/3 cup boiling water and 3 tbsp. margarine. Blend all the ingredients until smooth. To thicken, let set in the refrigerator for 24 hours.
- 1 cup wine = 13 tbsp. water, 3 tbsp. lemon juice and 1 tbsp. sugar. Mix together and let set for 10 minutes.
- For frying: instead of chicken fat, use a combination of olive oil or vegetable oil and 1 to 2 tbsp. pareve Passover margarine.
- Eggs: Passover egg substitutes don't work quite as well as the chametz egg substitutes. For kugels, matzah balls, fried matzah and some cakes, the recipes will probably be OK. However, if you want to avoid them (and I do) you can add one extra egg white and 1/2 tsp. of vegetable oil for each yolk eliminated when baking. Use only egg whites as the dipping to coat and fry meats.
- Italian Seasoning = 1/4 tsp. each dried oregano leaves, dried marjoram leaves and dried basil leaves plus 1/8 tsp. rubbed dried sage. This can be substituted for 1 1/2 tsp. Italian seasoning.
- curry powder = 2 tbsp. ground coriander, 1 tbsp. black pepper, 2 tbsp. red pepper, 2 tbsp. turmeric, 2 tbsp. ground ginger. Makes 2/3 cup.
- pancake syrup – use fruit jelly, not jam and add a little water to thin. I always like to combine the jelly and water in a microwave safe bowl and heat it gently before I serve it.
- seasoned rice wine vinegar = 3 tbsp. white vinegar, 1 tbsp. white wine, 1 tbsp. sugar, 1/2 tsp. salt. Mix to combine. Makes 1/4 cup.
- flavoured vinegar = lemon juice in cooking or salad, grapefruit juice in salads, wine in marinades
- orange liqueur – substitute an equal amount of frozen orange juice concentrate.

Unique and boutique Israeli wines for Passover

Although Israel's wine-producing capabilities are centuries old, Israeli kosher wines have experienced an amazing evolution over the past three decades. Israeli wineries are successfully combining their state-of-the-art facilities and innovative techniques with the country's extraordinary variety of grapes and topography.

Today, Israeli wines are noted for their superiority. They win major international awards, enhance discriminating dining tables, wine cellars, wine expositions and restaurants, and the demand keeps growing.

In Rogov's Guide to Israeli Wines, Daniel Rogov, the country's pre-eminent wine critic, awarded five stars to the prestigious Golan Heights Winery, describing it as "being largely responsible for placing Israel on the world wine map from the moment it released its first wines in 1984." Currently, the winery produces five million bottles per year. For discriminating wine connoisseurs, there are Golan's Yarden label and Katzrin series, including a chardonnay released only in years that it is considered outstanding.

From the venerable Efrat Winery, the Israeli Shiraz is a full-bodied wine with rich fruit tannins, complemented by French oak. The Israeli Cabernet/Merlot is another red wine, full-bodied with dark berry fruit, as well as plum aromas and flavours.

As well, wine enthusiasts are enjoying the evolution of the "Israeli boutique winery." Using a warehouse or garage, self-taught winemakers devote great attention to detail, creating small quantities of special wines for select clienteles. Some of today's most sought-after wines evolved from humble beginnings.

For example, Castel Winery, once a boutique classification, now produces about 100,000 bottles per year and was awarded Daniel Rogov's prestigious five-star rating. The Grand Vin Castel label, an exquisite bordeaux-style blend with distinct Italian overtones, scores an exceptional 93 to 95 in Rogov's guide.

Founded in 1994, Bustan Winery is highly regarded for its French-style wines. It produces about 2,000 bottles annually and received a four-star rating. The cabernet sauvignon (92 score) is an intense wine with rich and vibrant currant as well as black cherry and mocha aromas and flavours that unfold on the palate to reveal complexity and depth. The merlot (89 score) is dark royal purple in colour and shows good balance between soft tannins, sweet cedar and plum and blackberry aromas and flavours.

The Segal Winery, established in the 1950s as Ashkelon Wines, was purchased by Barkan Wineries six years ago. The respected Segal family name remains, along with its four-star rating and outstanding products, including boutique Single Vineyard wines. The merlot, Devov 2002 (89 score), medium to full-bodied, is soft on the palate despite firm tannins and has the tempting aromas and flavours of blackberries, plums and sweet herbs.

Located on Kibbutz Yiron in the Upper Galilee, Galil Mountain Winery, a joint venture between the Golan Heights Winery and the kibbutz, produces distinctly terroir-based wines (a terroir-based wine is an expression of the unique characteristics of the place in which it originates) in two series.

Yiron, 2003 (90 score), medium to full-bodied, is a blend of cabernet sauvignon and merlot. It has well-integrated tannins and the oak is generous but not overpowering, reflecting 16 months in small oak barrels.

Golan Heights Winery series contains many superb varietal releases, including the Gamla, Sangiovese, 2003 (89 score) medium-bodied, with round tannins, tempting aromas and flavours of plums, blueberries and violets. Gentle flavours lead to a long, ripe fruit finish.

Israeli family winery competes with the best

By AVI HEIN

When you mention Israel, top quality wine is generally not the first thing that comes to people's minds. Yet, a short ride away from Jerusalem in the scenic Judean Hills, is one of Israel's best kept secrets: a world-class winery.

The Domaine du Castel winery, located in Moshav Ramat Raziel, is easy to miss. However, the small family-run business produces some of the world's best wines in the same hills in which wine was produced in biblical times.

Wine has been grown in the Land of Israel for thousands of years. The Bible often refers to the abundant wine harvests of Israel. Baron de Rothschild created the modern Israeli wine industry in the late 19th century by opening up the Carmel Mizrahi winery in two locations, Zichron Ya'akov and Rishon LeZion.

Winemaker Eli Ben-Zaken tastes the latest vintage in Domaine du Castel's underground cellar. "I finish making the wine and I already think about the next vintage," he said.

Today, the country plays host to 150 wineries of all sizes that produce wines for all tastes and in all price categories. The Domaine du Castel winery, named after a Crusader fortress located nearby in the Judean Hills, was founded by Eli Ben-Zaken in 1988.

Ben-Zaken, born in Egypt of Egyptian and Italian parents, was raised in Italy and England. In 1970, after a short stint in Israel volunteering during the Six Day War, he immigrated to Israel. Originally involved in agriculture, he later opened a restaurant in Jerusalem, but his heart was set on getting back to the land. Ben-Zaken planted his first vineyard, which was then a hobby, in an old chicken coop.

A bottle of Ben-Zaken wine, of 1992 vintage, was given in 1995 to Serena Sutcliffe, the head of Sotheby's wine department in England. According to Ben-Zaken, Sutcliffe's reply changed the course of Israeli wine.

She called it "absolutely terrific" and "quite unlike other Israeli wines," recalls Ben-Zaken. With that response, he knew he had a winning wine and decided to take a risk and pursue winemaking professionally. He planted more vineyards, converted the ramshackle chicken coop into a beautiful winery and sent his son, who had been touring in Europe, to France to learn the art of wine making.

"Nobody believed that Israel was a country where you could get the price that allows you to invest in wine, so Israel was out of this game [producing high quality wines]," noted Ben-Zaken over a sample of recent vintages in Domaine du Castel's tasting room. "I think we showed the industry that there is a market [for top quality wine]. If you make very high quality wines, you get people to buy it."

By the turn of the century, Rothschild's Carmel Mizrahi produced the first Israeli wine to win a medal at a wine show. Yet by the 1960s, Israel suffered from the reputation of producing wine too thick and sweet to appeal to wine connoisseurs, giving kosher wine a bad name. Instead, most Israeli wine was associated with sacrament and was used primarily for ritual purposes.

It was only in the mid-1970s that Israel began moving toward higher quality wines. The rapid improvement came, however, in the early 1980s, with the formation of the Golan Heights Winery, the first winery with vineyards on the Golan Heights, which imported expertise from California and brought state-of-the-art technology to Israeli winemaking.

Until the early 1990s, however, most Israeli wineries were industrial, aimed at the masses, and not the enthusiast. It's only been in the last decade that boutique wineries began to take root, and Castel is most widely credited for Israel's boutique revolution.

"I was here striving to make the best possible wine in Israel as a Zionist, to show the world that we have culture and quality," Ben-Zaken said.

At Domaine du Castel, the grapes in the vineyard are hand-picked. It is the only winery in Israel to use the French method. This "Old World" method of harvesting grapes means that the vines are in competition with one another and thus a better grape results.

By planting a high density of vines, but encouraging a low yield, higher quality grapes are ensured. Domaine du Castel is the only Israeli winery to use this harvesting method, which is favoured by the top wineries around the world.

Ben-Zaken strives for the best in all things. He imports specialized equipment not available in Israel such as new French oak barrels (in order to ensure top quality, all of Castel's barrels are retired after three years of use) and Portuguese corks.

The results speak for themselves. Castel has repeatedly been recognized by international critics. Ben-Zaken's wine is the first Israeli wine selected as wine of the month by Decanter, the world's premier wine magazine. It is also the first Israeli wine to receive 90 points in Wine Spectator and the only Israeli wine listed in the French Betteane & Desseauve's: The World's Greatest Wines, in which it is favourably compared to the best French wines. It is also the first Israeli wine to be awarded three stars by the wine writer Hugh Johnson, a rating it has received from Johnson consistently since 2004.

In 2003, Ben-Zaken decided to make all his wines kosher, saying that he felt bad that not all Jews could appreciate his wine (before it obtained certification).

Since obtaining certification, the winemaking process hasn't changed, but Castel was able to hire observant French immigrants who were unable to work in the wine industry in their native France but always dreamed of making good wine.

According to Ben-Zaken, Castel is proof that kosher wine can compete on an international level.

Daniel Rogov, Israel's premier wine critic, notes that as Israel produces better wines, "the wines will move off those shelves limited only to kosher holdings and begin to appear in a special Israeli section. Their appeal to the broader population will come from their unique qualities, reflecting their Mediterranean and specifically Israeli source."

Today, about a dozen people work at the winery, and it produces 96,000 bottles annually and three different varieties of wine. The Castel Grand Vin, aged 24 months, a premium red wine, is a smooth and luscious mix of cabernet sauvignon, merlot and petit verdot. The "C" is a fine chardonnay, aged for 12 months, in Castel's underground cellars. The Petit Castel, aged 16 months, also an exquisite red, is a blend of merlot and cabernet sauvignon.

When asked what lies ahead for Domaine du Castel, Ben-Zaken laughed and said: "Making better wines"

"I finish making the wine and I already think about the next vintage. The best is yet to come."

Traditions bring comfort during difficult days

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

It was supposed to be the best of times. I was mid-way through my pregnancy, carrying twins – two acrobatic little girls who were competing for space in my swollen belly. My little sister, engaged at long last, was putting the finishing touches on her wedding preparations, and we thought we had Passover covered, with an invitation for a seder on the first night and an invitation for the second at my mom's.

Then, God threw us a curve ball, the worst we'd ever encountered.

My mother's mysterious abdominal pains were diagnosed as cancer, an insidious ovarian variety that was to be merciless in its onslaught. Shirley Kramer was 56 at the time, and I looked around frantically, desperate for hope.

Medical websites said the chances of recovery for women under 60 were good, so I figured we'd caught it just in time. "I'm going to fight this," she told us bravely, just days before being admitted to hospital for surgery.

We all thought she'd be home for Pesach. And she'd promised to be there when my girls were born. After all, I needed her so badly.

The surgery came and left more problems in its wake. Nothing went smoothly, a pattern that was to characterize first her hospital stay, and then her time in the cancer centre. As one complication followed another, the only constant was her inability to eat. Helplessly, we watched her shrink away before us, her eyes clouded with fear and doubt, and her mind fogged by a barrage of drugs that ultimately failed to remedy her.

I have a clear memory of sitting with her during Passover and feeling shocked when she asked to nibble on a non-pesachdik cookie.

"Mom, it'sPesach!" I said indignantly. She had been the champion of the Jewish holidays, a frequent shul-goer and the family member who worked the hardest to bring the spirit of each festival home.

"Who cares," she retorted weakly.

I could see her faith was dwindling, and I was determined to keep the Jewish family flame alive. I held the second seder at my home, trying hard to mark this special holiday in the chaos and desperation of a family in upheaval. It was a laborious effort to create a pretense of normalcy, to celebrate a time when God came to the Jews' assistance.

Now, it seemed, our own cries were falling on deaf ears. My mom's health was deteriorating, and as the days progressed, her bed seemed to get larger while she got smaller.

Still, we believed the doctors when they said she'd be home soon. It was just a matter of time, they reassured us.

Thirty-eight weeks into my pregnancy, on a Friday morning, I was admitted to hospital for a Caesarian section. My two little angels popped out with no complaint, and as I lay recuperating just an hour's drive from my beloved mother's hospital bed, I called her.

"They're magnificent," I told her. "I've named them Amy and Sarah – Sarah, after you." I could hear from her voice how weak she was, but I had no idea that this would be our last conversation.

"I'm so honoured you did that for me," she said.

I was supposed to go home on Sunday, but that day, as the twins began a series of mysterious breathing problems, they were whisked from my arms into the neonatal intensive care unit.

Just hours later, we got a call to say that my mom had taken a turn for the worse.

"The end is near," I was warned by a family relative. "It could be any time now."

I was shocked.

"How is this possible?" I asked. "They said she was coming home. They promised she'd be home. Someone, tell me this is a big mistake."

It was no mistake.

Leaving the twins in ICU, I raced to her hospital, to find her unconscious and being wheeled towards the palliative care unit. Palliative care? I'd never heard of it until that moment. But as they disconnected her food and water supply, leaving her only with a solution to numb any pain, it was clear that survival was not considered an option in this wing of the hospital.

My mom clung to life, unconscious, for five days in that room, waiting for my girls to be released from their hospital and brought to her bedside. Six days after their birth, they were ready to make the pilgrimage, and so the first drive of their life took them from one hospital to another. We placed those tiny babies on her chest and cried at the cruelty of life, which can end so suddenly, yet bring such beauty in the same moment.

I hobbled around the house the next day, trying to keep busy by helping to prepare a Shabbat dinner in my home. It was early evening when the rest of the family arrived after a long day at my mom's bedside, and we'd just recited Kiddush when the call came.

"Come now!"

We left the table, the challah untouched, the candles burning and the dinner cooling in the kitchen. But by the time we arrived, she was gone.

I don't suppose anybody ever gets over losing their mom, and the scars from watching her suffer still haunt me. I look for her everywhere I go, seeing her shape in strangers at the grocery store and searching for her scent, her touch and her memory when I'm in her home.

That Pesach, now four years ago, marked a turning point in my life. No longer a child, I had to brandish the flame of Jewish continuity and work hard to keep it alight. Through the pain of my mom's ordeal, I clung to my Jewishness as an anchor, an inexplicable force that, on some level, provided comfort and a reason to forge ahead.

And, as Pesach approaches, I remember this time acutely, this Passover from hell that has made every Passover after it seem so much easier.

Torontonian donates Chaim Grade's letters to YIVO

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Readers of Jewish literature will be interested to know that a cache of about 50 letters by Lithuanian-born novelist and poet Chaim Grade (1910-1982) have surfaced in Toronto.

The letters belong to Sally Eisner, a longtime North York resident who, along with her late husband Leon Eisner, was a close friend of the New York-based author and helped to arrange many of his visits to Toronto.

Grade (pronounced Grad-duh) penned many highly esteemed works, including The Agunah, The Yeshivah, Rabbis and Wives, and My Mother's Sabbath Days, a rich memoir of his native Vilna before the war. Originally written and published in Yiddish, his books won a wide readership and glowing critical reception in their English translations.

"He's one of the great Yiddish writers, and some people think he's comparable in stature to Isaac Bashevis Singer," said Leo Greenbaum, an archivist at New York's YIVO Institute for Jewish Research, a facility dedicated to the history and culture of Ashkenazi Jewry.

"He and Bashevis Singer are of equivalent rank, and some people like him better than Bashevis Singer."

According to Greenbaum, Grade's stories "aren't as sensational – they don't have the sex or the supernatural beings" that appear in Singer's writings.

A feeling persists among some Yiddishists that Grade was more deserving than Singer of the Nobel prize in literature that Singer won in 1978. Another reason Grade is less well known is that he was published by a much smaller publishing company, Greenbaum said.

Over a "glaz tea" and cookies in the living room of her Bathurst Manor bungalow, Sally Eisner treated this journalist to the sweet story of the long, warm friendship between the Eisners and the author, whom they first encountered at a reading for the Arbeiter Ring (Workmen's Circle) in Toronto around 1970.

Some 50 letters that New York Yiddish author Chaim Grade, right, sent to Leon and Sally Eisner, left, in Toronto between 1970 and 1982 have found a new home in the YIVO Institute for Jewish Research in New York.

"When you listened to his lectures, you were butzoiberen, you became enchanted," she recalled. "You could not have a dull moment with this man."

Both Holocaust survivors from Poland, the Eisners were married in Romania in 1945 and came to Canada several years later. Leon participated in a family business and Sally was a speaker and volunteer for the Holocaust Education Centre for many years.

After meeting Grade, the Eisners and several friends essentially adopted him. They set up local readings and book-signings, and they even sold his books by the box-load and sent him the proceeds.

"We cherished his footsteps," Sally said. "When he came, it was like a yom tov. Leon and a few friends wined and dined him. They took him to Spadina and he was outfitted by his admirers. They picked him up at the airport and arranged for his stay at the hotel."

"He had most dinners here. He didn't enjoy eating in restaurants," she continued. "I used to cook for him. He became like family to us. Leon adored him and he adored Leon. Chaim Grade said he was 'vi a zun,' like a son to him."

Grade corresponded with the couple over a period of 12 years: his handwritten letters were in Yiddish and covered a range of subjects.

"Every letter has something else," Sally said, sorting through the sheaf of odd-sized pages. Her husband also assembled a small archive of newspaper articles by and about him.

Since Leon's death two years ago, Sally has given much thought to the fate of the letters, as she is determined that they find a good home. At her request, The CJN was able to play a role in the outcome of this question.

Narrowing down the field to two possible recipients, we contacted both the University of Toronto's Rare Books Library and the YIVO Institute. U of T said it would be glad to take the letters, but suggested YIVO would make a better home for them.

YIVO's Leo Greenbaum response to the offer was immediate.

"Yes, we are very keenly interested" in the letters, he said, adding that they would be "an important donation" and offering instructions for their safe delivery.

Sally expressed contentment and gratitude at the outcome. "The letters were my husband's treasure," she said. "You know how many times he read them? When he began to slow down, it was his biggest concern what would happen to them. I'm so glad to know that they're going to be in a good place."

HELLO DOLLY: The spirit of Purim was evident at the costume party held at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community. Outstanding were the Four Dancing Damsels who "brought the house down" with their hilarious performance to the tune of Hello Dolly. U.S. talks with Saudis, Israel prior to Arab League summit

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The U.S. administration is holding separate talks with Israel and Saudi Arabia ahead of the Arab League summit in Riyadh late this month.

Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni on Monday said the issue of the Palestinian demand for a right of return of Palestinian refugees was Israel's main point of contention with the overall Arab peace plan known as the Saudi initiative.

Speaking to Israel Radio from Washington on Monday morning, Livni said that "the Saudi initiative is based on a very positive idea… [but] unfortunately other sections were added to this initiative" that place unrealistic demands on Israel.

The initiative, which won the support of the Arab League during a summit in Beirut five years ago, calls for an Israeli withdrawal to 1967 lines, the establishment of a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital, and a "just and negotiated" agreement to the problem of refugees.

In return, the members of the Arab League offer Israel full normalization of relations and an end to the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Livni said the most problematic addition from Israel's viewpoint is the demand to allow Palestinian refugees to exercise a "right of return" – the unconditional migration of displaced Palestinians to all areas occupied by Arabs in pre-state Palestine, including places that today are part of Israel proper.

In its current form, the Saudi plan bases its demand for exercising a right of return on United Nations General Assembly Resolution 194. The Palestinians interpret this non-binding resolution as calling for the resettlement of refugees inside Israeli territory.

According to Livni, the right of return goes against the concept of the establishment of two coexisting national states – one Jewish and one Palestinian. "The Palestinian state should also constitute the solution to the problem of Palestinian refugees," she said.

"Therefore Israel is saying today that the Saudi initiative has positive elements, but it also has sections that are problematic," Livni concluded.

In a meeting held two weeks ago with a senior European diplomat, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert also said that "Israel will never accept Resolution 194, and this constitutes a red line for us. But anything over this red line, including creative solutions to the refugees [problem] which does not include their settlement in Israel, is open for discussion."

Israel wants to see some changes to the Saudi initiative so that it can serve as an agreed basis for the renewal of the diplomatic process. Olmert said Sunday at a cabinet meeting that the initiative should be taken very seriously.

"We hope very much that during the meeting of the heads of Arab states that will be held in Riyadh, the positive elements expressed in the Saudi initiative will be validated and perhaps will enable the strengthening of the chances for negotiations between us and the Palestinians," Olmert added.

He made the statement in front of television cameras at the start of the cabinet meeting. It was both more positive and detailed than his previous comments on the issue. Previously he only referred to "positive elements" in the Saudi initiative. Political sources in Jerusalem confirmed Sunday that diplomatic talks are being held concerning the Saudi initiative, but refused to give details.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas raised the issue during talks with Olmert in Jerusalem, the sources said.

Saudi National Security Adviser Prince Bandar bin Sultan, the main interlocutor of the kingdom with Israel, was visiting Washington this week, at the same time as Livni.

Aides to Olmert, who were visiting Washington last week, apparently held talks with their U.S. counterparts on the Saudi initiative.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was to meet with Livni this week, is expected to visit the region late next week for a series of meetings ahead of the Arab League summit in Riyadh.

It's believed that Prince Bandar has been in contact with his Israeli interlocutors, although there has been no confirmation of this.

Six months ago, he met with Olmert in Jordan and their meeting sparked the process for the adoption of the Saudi initiative as the basis for a diplomatic process.

Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres has responded positively to the growing Saudi Arabian involvement in the diplomatic process.

Peres discussed this development with Olmert in recent days following consultation with experts, and noted the positive results that a Saudi-Israeli rapprochement will have.

Also on Monday, Livni said Israel expects captured Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit to be released before Hamas and Fatah form a new PA unity government.

Livni was speaking after Hamas officials were quoted as saying that the creation of the unity government and Shalit's release were note connected.

Abbas told Olmert during their meeting Sunday that he would try to secure Shalit's release as soon as possible, and perhaps before the formation of the unity government.

Livni said Abbas now has more influence on Hamas, which is keen to form a coalition with Abbas' Fatah movement.

"If in the past [Abbas] could say that he was separate from Hamas and had no power to influence them, today his situation has changed," Livni said.

She added that Shalit's release "is an Israeli demand, and I believe it should be an international demand as well. Now we must see if [Abbas] is capable of keeping this [promise]."

SIMPLY THE BEST

Sea Opera – the one and only exclusively residential project on the Israeli beach

Considered by many as Israel's Côte d'Azur, Netanya's beachfront now houses the Sea Opera luxury-residence project. This architectural gem is an exclusively residential, privately owned project right upon the Israeli shoreline. It is also might be the last, due to recent legislation.

Strolling along the golden beach, Sea Opera makes quite an impression – two elegant towers perched upon a tall cliff, set on a plot of land measuring 129,000 sq. ft., half of which is to become a plush garden. This superb vantage point ensures a breathtaking view of the Mediterranean from every floor and apartment, as well as landscape views of the surrounding countryside.

Ascent and entrance unto Sea Opera's grounds is gained through a spacious lobby, monitored by 24hr. concierge and security service, ensuring the tenants' safety and privacy.

As befitting a truly luxurious residence project, Sea Opera features all modern amenities, including a residents' club, private spa, swimming pool, fire and smoke detection systems throughout, a security area in every apartment (air-raid shelter), ample underground parking and Sabbath elevators.

Of the two towers, the first is already fully occupied, mostly by foreign professionals and residents. The second tower is currently under construction and will open for residency as early as the end of this year.

Sea Opera is located at the beach-end of Nitza Blvd, a well-established area at the north-western reaches of Netanya. Here, one is liable to hear English spoken freely on the street, since many Jews from abroad have chosen this place as their home away from home. The reasons for this abound. To name just a few - convenient proximity to every major city and airport, the greenery and tranquility of Netanya and of course the inspiring sea itself. Among the many services available to neighborhood residents is the Anglo-Saxon synagogue, located at a 5-minutes' walk from the Sea Opera. Another attraction close-by is the Caesarea golf club, a mere 15 minutes drive to the north from Sea Opera.

Upon completion of the second tower, Sea Opera's capacity will stand at 186 apartments. Of these, about a hundred and fifty are already spoken for, since the first of the two towers is sold out, and is occupied by owners who now enjoy their respective assets. Some of them came to live here, some come to vacation, while others have already stated claims on assets in the second tower, due to open for residency at the end of this year.

Abdullah warns of Iran

Jordan's King Abdullah II told Jewish leaders that he believes Iran is trying to "hijack" the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Abdullah met with leaders of Jewish groups after addressing the U.S. Congress, where he repeated his message urging greater U.S. involvement in resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and using the 2002 "Arab Plan" as a basis. In his meeting with the Jewish leaders, Abdullah acknowledged Israeli concerns about the Arab Plan, which implies a right of return for Palestinian refugees and their descendants, but he said it should be seen as an attempt to reach out to Israel and not as a bottom line. He suggested peacemaking was urgent because of Iran's ambitions in the region, noting its affiliations with terror groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas.

Muslim birthrate higher

Israel's Muslim minority has a far greater birth rate than the Jewish majority, a government study found. According to Industry and Trade Ministry data released ahead of International Women's Day, Jewish women in Israel on average have 2.69 children each and give birth to the first at age 30. By contrast, Muslim women on average have four children each and give birth to the first at age 27. Arabs, the vast majority of them Muslims, constitute approximately 20 per cent of Israel's population. According to the Industry and Trade Ministry, Israel's dwindling Christian Arab community lags behind the Jews in terms of birth rate. The typical Israeli Christian woman has 2.15 children and her first child at age 28.

Air Force unveils drone

The Israel Air Force unveiled a new unmanned surveillance drone. The long-range Heron is manufactured by the state-owned Israel Aerospace Industries. Independent experts say the Heron already saw action during last year's Lebanon war and over the West Bank and Gaza, and that it may be capable of carrying missiles for track-and-kill missions against terrorist leaders.

Katsav spared impeachment

An Israeli parliamentary panel voted against impeaching President Moshe Katsav. Just seven of 25 lawmakers on the Knesset house committee backed the motion, far short of the 75 per cent required for approval. Katsav suspended himself after prosecutors drafted a rape indictment against him. In doing so, he preserved his presidential immunity from prosecution, which impeachment would remove. But Katsav, whose term ends in July, has vowed to resign if he is formally indicted.

Killer bacterium

Israel is trying to contain a potential health epidemic emanating from a virulent bacterium. The Health Ministry said the bacterium is suspected of killing dozens of ailing Israelis in recent months, and that emergency measures have been ordered to contain it. The main concern is that the bacterium might be resistant to available antibiotics. The crisis prompted calls for additional government funding to deal with overcrowding and supply shortages in Israel's hospitals.

Bronfman Prize

An Israeli doctor, a former fighter pilot, was selected as the 2007 winner of the Charles Bronfman Prize. Dr. Amitai Ziv is the founder and director of the Israel Center for Medical Simulation (ICMS) and deputy director of Sheba Medical Center. His experience in the Israeli Air Force led him to adapt flight simulation training to medical training. Launched in 2001, the ICMS became the first interdisciplinary institute of its kind. Today it serves as the model for training doctors and nurses in hospitals around the world. The $100,000 prize goes to an individual or team younger than 50 whose work has contributed to improving the world. "Its goal is to bring public recognition to young, dynamic individuals whose Jewish values infuse their humanitarian accomplishments and provide inspiration to the next generations," according to a statement announcing Ziv's selection.

No breakthrough at Abbas-Olmert meeting

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Another Israeli-Palestinian peace summit has come and gone with little to show, though an unconfirmed report indicated hope for the release of a kidnapped Israeli soldier.

In a sign that Israel is becoming accustomed to such low yields, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert referred to Sunday afternoon's meeting with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas as the latest in a set of "bilateral contacts" – a phrase more befitting conferences between mid-level bureaucrats than the tete-a-tetes of regional statesmen.

Yet for Israel, there was still some urgency to the 2½-hour meeting in Jerusalem, as it came perhaps days before the Palestinian Authority is expected to forge a new coalition between the governing Hamas and Abbas' more moderate Fatah.

Olmert used the occasion to stress that unless the new government accepts western conditions for peacemaking – recognition of Israel, renunciation of terrorism and acceptance of past Israeli-Palestinian accords – negotiations would remain stalled.

"A decision by [Abbas] on the creation of a unity government with Hamas that does not recognize Israel is imminent," said Amos Gilad, chief strategist for Israel's Defence Ministry.

"This being the case, there is an accentuation of the need to underscore and emphasize that there is no alternative" to the preconditions, which were set by the Quartet of foreign mediators, he said.

Abbas' aides said before the talks that he would try to persuade Olmert to soften his stance, but that apparently did not happen.

"The meeting was very frank and very difficult," Mohammad Dahlan, a senior Abbas aide, told Reuters. "Many issues were discussed, including the national unity government, which the Palestinian side stressed was an internal Palestinian affair."

Dahlan said the Palestinians called on Olmert to ease travel restrictions in the West Bank by removing roadblocks, and to release sick and elderly Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails, but Olmert made no promises.

He did, however, say that, beginning at the end of the month, the Karni goods crossing would begin operating on extended hours in order to handle the transport of goods into and out of Gaza without delays.

Olmert also asked Abbas how the $100 million (US) in tax revenues that Israel transferred to the PA in recent months was spent. Israeli officials have said that much of the money was used to pay the salaries of members of the PA security forces, instead of being used to reform the security forces.

On the Palestinian side, there may have been a surprise sweetener from Abbas. Israel's Channel 10 television reported that the Palestinian Authority president told Olmert that the release of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier held hostage in the Gaza Strip, could be imminent. The report could not be immediately confirmed.

Liberty for Shalit, who was abducted last June, could prompt reciprocal goodwill gestures by Israel, such as a mass amnesty for Palestinian prisoners, and bring rapprochement closer in spirit, if not on paper.

It would also help Olmert domestically. The prime minister, embattled by the fallout of last year's Lebanon war and a slew of corruption scandals in his government, is seen as desperate for a breakthrough.

Results from a television poll late last week showed that if elections were held today, Olmert would win just three per cent of the vote. His arch rival, opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, would take 30 per cent.

But given the deadlock with Hamas, which refuses to embrace peacemaking despite the costs of an almost year-old western aid embargo, Olmert appears set on circumventing the Palestinians by going for a more comprehensive regional peace deal.

The prime minister surprised Israelis on Sunday with a vigorous endorsement of the dormant Saudi proposal for Israeli-Arab peace.

"We are very, very vigilantly monitoring developments in the Arab world in general," Olmert told his cabinet in broadcast remarks. "We are taking note of the positive developments among the moderate Arab states.

"We said more than once that the Saudi initiative is a subject we would be willing to treat seriously. We have not changed our stance."

Israel has previously expressed cautious interest in the proposal, first broached by Riyadh in 2002, that it surrender lands captured in the 1967 Six-Day War in exchange for pan-Arab recognition.

While Riyadh formally refuses to recognize Israel, there is mounting evidence of Saudi involvement in Israeli affairs.

Olmert himself met with a Saudi delegate who is close to the Bush administration last year. And Israel Radio revealed Sunday that Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh had held brief, "accidental" talks with the Saudi ambassador to the United States, Adel al-Jubeir.

"We have many problems to solve together," the radio quoted Jubeir as telling Sneh.

But accepting the Saudi initiative in principle would mean complications for Israel, which first needs reassurance that it will not be expected to admit Palestinian refugees to its territory en masse.

Then there is the scale of withdrawals required by the Saudi initiative – especially on the Golan Heights, which Syria wants back. Accommodating Damascus at a time when it is high on the Bush administration's list of regional grievances would be a major gamble for Olmert.

So a solution for Olmert may be found in Saudi Arabia, specifically when the Arab League convenes in Riyadh at the end of the month.

"We very much hope that in the meeting of Arab leaders in Riyadh, the positive elements expressed in the Saudi initiative will be reaffirmed," he told his cabinet. "And perhaps there will be a chance of bolstering the possibility for negotiations between us and the Palestinian Authority on this basis."

'This matter will be the engine for peace'

Avraham said his late brother Maurice, who died in December, once made that appeal through Egyptian intermediaries to Hafez Assad, the late president and father of current president Bashar Assad, but nothing came of it.

Still, there has been some slight reason for hope in recent weeks, Avraham, 60, said.

He said he recently spoke to a Turkish journalist who told him that Turkey is positioning itself to mediate between Israel and Syria.

"Turkey wants to raise the issue of Eli's remains as a confidence-building measure," he said.

The topic was discussed in a recent meeting between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his Turkish counterpart, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, but Israeli officials have not confirmed that report, he said.

"I believe this matter will be the engine for peace," Avraham said. "If Syria really wants to move towards peace, this will be the engine for it."

Avraham compared such a gesture to the visit by former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat to Jerusalem, which breached psychological barriers and opened the door to a subsequent peace treaty between the two countries.

"It will be the same if they return Eli's remains," he said. "That will put the ball in our field."

For many in Israel, Eli Cohen is considered a hero and the country's greatest spy.

Posing as a Syrian businessman, he infiltrated the highest echelons of Syrian society in the early 1960s and became a confidant of the country's president. He visited the Golan Heights and reported on military emplacements. The information he provided proved crucial during the 1967 Six Day War, when Israel stormed the Golan and captured the territory from Syria.

Eli, however, did not live to see his intelligence put to use by Israeli forces. He was caught two years earlier and executed on May 18, 1965. The whereabouts of his body remains unknown to this day.

Belle Cohen, Maurice's widow, said her late husband "didn't feel anything would happen."

He had promised his dying mother that he would do everything he could to bring Eli home.

"It always bothered him that he was never able to fulfill his promise. It troubled him, but there was nothing he could do about it," she said.

'Canada also has an important role to play'

The flyer ends with an urgent message: "Support peace. Get the facts." It then lists the Israel Project's Iran Press Kit website address.

On its website, the Israel Project has set up various information sections for readers, under an "Iran Press Kit" link, in order to further hammer home its warnings about Iran. Readers are provided with resources for terror-free investing, as well as a list of the "Dirty Dozen" companies that help fund terror worldwide.

Another section allows viewers to watch video clips or read summaries of presentations made at the Israel Project's conference on Iran at Hebrew University this past January.

Other reading material includes various histories and biographies of Ahmadinejad's rise to power and his extremist philosophies, as well as information on Iran's weapons arsenal and a list of its human rights violations.

As reports emerged last week that Iran remained intransigent in the face of the International Atomic Energy Agency's latest sanctions intended to halt Iran's uranium enrichment programs, Laszlo Mizrahi said Americans want "very significant diplomatic activity and very strong economic sanctions.

"They want weapons bans and [guarantees] that American is not buying or investing in companies that are helping the Iranian regime with their… support of terrorist groups around the world."

To that end, Laszlo Mizrahi said her organizations's terror-free investing resources are crucial to the fight against Iran. Though the Israel Project works with affiliates in other western countries, the focus for this campaign is strictly on America. That choice was made "because 50 per cent of the world's capital markets flow through our stock markets," Laszlo Mizrahi said.

"So if we can influence the behaviour on the U.S. stock market, we know that it will exert tremendous pressure on the Iranian regime, which hopefully will get them to change their ways."

She said Canada also has an important role to play.

"Canada has been pretty productive on the Iranian issue," Laszlo Mizrahi said. "From what I understand, Canada has good relations with Russia, and has been open in telling Russia that they need to be more engaged on the [UN] Security Council [with issues concerning Iran]."

Founded in 2002, with offices in Washington and Jerusalem, the Israel Project provides journalists with resources when covering the Holy Land.

Laszlo Mizrahi said the Jerusalem office "works with more than 400 Israel-based journalists to get them the facts they need before they do their stories about Israel."

Report: Missing Iranian official being questioned

By YOAV STERN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The former Iranian deputy defence minister who disappeared in Turkey last month took with him documents that prove there is a link between the Iranian military establishment and terror groups including Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah, the pan-Arab newspaper Al-Sharq al-Awsat reported Friday.

A former colleague of Ali Reza Asghari, 63, told the newspaper, which is published in London, that the document also cites groups such as the Mahdi Shiite militia operating in Iraq.

Asghari, a retired general in the elite Revolutionary Guards, went missing in what may have been a western intelligence operation. Turkish newspaper Hurriyet said in an unsourced report that Asghari was involved in Iran's nuclear program. If so, he would be a major asset for western or Israeli interrogators.

Ram Igra, a retired official with Israel's Mossad espionage agency, said this week that Asghari is best known to Israel as the "founder" of Hezbollah.

Igra said that before Asghari took up the Defence Ministry post, he had been a commander with the Iranian Revolutionary Guards, the main sponsor of Hezbollah.

"In the 1980s and early 1990s, Asgari was responsible for the Iranian Revolutionary Guards in Lebanon. This is his real importance, not his connection to the Iranian Defence Ministry," Igra told Israel Radio.

"He lived in Lebanon and, in effect, was the man who built, promoted and founded Hezbollah in those years," Igra said. "If he has something to give the West, it is in this context of terrorism and Hezbollah's network in Lebanon."

The Washington Post reported last week that Asghari was giving western intelligence agencies information on Lebanon's Hezbollah and Iran's ties to the group.

Citing a senior U.S. official, the Post said in its Thursday edition that Ali Reza Asghari, who disappeared while on a trip to Turkey last month, had left his country and is willingly cooperating with the West.

Iran has suggested he was kidnapped by western intelligence.

Another U.S. official denied an Israeli newspaper report that Asghari is in the United States and suggested that his disappearance was orchestrated by Israel, the Post said. It said a representative of the White House National Security Council did not return a call for comment.

It quoted Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev as saying: "To my knowledge, Israel is not involved in any way in this disappearance."

A British newspaper has reported that Asghari is also likely to possess information on missing Israel Air Force navigator Ron Arad.

Asghari is not being questioned about Iran's nuclear program, a major point of dispute with the United States, the Post said.

It reported that the senior U.S. official did not disclose Asghari's whereabouts or specify who is questioning him, but said the United States has full access to information obtained from Asghari.

Golfer proves career can get second wind after 50

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

BOCA RATON, Florida — Life can begin at 50 and get better. At an age when most of us are thinking about slowing down, pro golfer Bruce Fleisher proved to himself in 1999 that he could finally earn a living in golf when he won the Royal Caribbean Golf Classic in Key Biscayne as a rookie on the senior professional golf tour.

"There is an angel on my shoulder," Fleisher said after winning the tournament. "It is hard to believe a 50-year-old man can stand here and cry."

Fleisher's angel returned as he won the Royal Caribbean Classic again in 2000 and a record third time in 2004.

In fact, the only thing that stopped Fleisher from winning the tournament for a fourth time was not the competition, but the sponsor. The Royal Caribbean Classic folded after 2004 when cruise operator Royal Caribbean pulled out as sponsor and was not replaced by another company.

The king of the Royal Caribbean Classic returned to South Florida to a new gold course with a new sponsor – the Allianz Championship at Broken Sound Club in Boca Raton, held Feb. 9 to 11.

Fleisher didn't adapt well to the course at Broken Sound. While Mark James won the tournament with a score of 15 under par, Fleisher trailed badly – finishing at even par 216 with rounds of 73-69-74, with a score closer to the last place finisher than the winner.

"I've had a few birdies but for the most part, I played horribly," said Fleisher.

"But for all I have been through in my life, I can't complain, really. I have my biggest fan right here," he added before picking up his grandson, 10-month-old Jacob Kutner, and kissing him.

Although Fleisher, now 58, is having trouble rebounding from foot injuries that kept him off the course for most of 2006, he still showed that his best years still may be ahead of him.

Following another poor showing at a Tampa tournament the week after the Allianz Championship, Fleisher rebounded with an impressive eight under par finish at the Ace Tournament in Naples, Fla., held Feb. 23 to 25, finishing 11th overall.

In seems a lifetime ago that Fleisher doubted he would ever make a living on the pro golf tour. Prior to 1999, Fleisher had won only one tournament (in 1991) in more than 20 years of competition on the PGA tour.

After turning pro in 1971 (following his marriage to Wendy in 1970), Fleisher laboured anonymously, never making it into the top 10 annual money leaders on the PGA Tour.

But since his first victory on the Champions tour in 1999, Fleisher became the circuit's dominant player through 2005. Winning 18 tournaments, he earned more than $15 million (US), including the prestigious U.S. Senior Open in 2000, and is on the top 30 on the all-time money list on the Champions tour.

It's hard to believe that Fleisher is the same man that had doubts about earning a living in golf 10 years ago.

"For many years, Bruce never believed he was as good as everybody said he was," his wife Wendy said. "While he was competing on the PGA Tour, he never felt that he was that good. He felt that he was lucky."

Fleisher's thoughts were not on making birdies or winning tournaments in 1980, when Wendy developed complications under anesthesia while giving birth to their daughter Jessica.

Although Jessica was healthy, Wendy was only given a 20 per cent chance to live. Another year would pass before Wendy's health was restored.

Bruce became the family's cook, nurse, babysitter and custodian while Wendy recovered. Fleisher quit the pro tour, taking jobs as a teaching pro.

His desire to pursue the life of a golf pro returned in 1989, when he entered local tournaments and won the Club Pro Championship at PGA West-Boca Raton. That victory gave Fleisher the confidence that the future would be better than the past.

Fleisher's good fortune in golf led him to set up the Bruce Fleisher Foundation last year to raise funds for charities that help children. He is grateful that his own daughter Jessica gave birth to his grandson without any complications.

"After all this time, I still have an angel watching me over my shoulder," said Fleisher.

Spinning to California

A spin-a-thon held recently at Extreme Fitness' Thornhill location attracted 43 participants and raised $4,300 for Maccabi Canada and Toronto's team at this summer's JCC Maccabi Games. The spin-a-thon was organized by Michal Capland, whose son, Cory, a basketball player, is a member of the 40-athlete Toronto team. The JCC Maccabi Games are an Olympic-style event, with 6,000 athletes aged 13 to 16 from around the world participating, usually in three or four cities. Funds from the spin-a-thon will help send Toronto athletes to the games in Orange County, Calif.

Time to rethink resuscitation in the elderly

By MICHAEL GORDON

The daughter insisted, "You have to do everything for my mother including CPR. I cannot forgo any chance that might keep her alive."

The Senior Side of Life

This occurred during a meeting with her mother's health-care team where the reality of cardio-pulmonary resuscitation (CPR) in the frail nursing home population was discussed. Similar conversations occur with families of nursing home residents across North America, to demystify what CPR is and what it potentially can and realistically cannot accomplish for their loved one.

One common misunderstanding is that CPR brings a person who has died back to life, and for some families, this is a religiously based imperative and obligation. Another misunderstanding is that CPR is very successful in reviving people who have suffered a cardiac arrest. A third is that CPR itself is relatively innocuous, and therefore, there is no reason not to attempt it.

In some circumstances, CPR, when undertaken rapidly with relatively younger and healthier people, can prevent a death from occurring as a result of a cardiac arrest (stoppage of the heart), if that happens in the context of a healthy or at least effectively functioning heart. For example, CPR may be successful in cases of electrocution or drowning, when the person is retrieved quickly, or during a heart attack when the heart muscle is injured, but potentially retrievable and functional through rapid medical treatment.

In frail elderly people, however, the event causing cardiac arrest is usually due to multiple serious diseases that, combined, result in the heart's stoppage, which cannot be reversed by CPR.

As for CPR survival, some years ago, the highly reputable New England Journal of Medicine published an article titled, Cardiopulmonary resuscitation on television: Miracles and misinformation, in which researchers analyzed CPR on three popular television programs – ER, Chicago Hope and Rescue 911. All instances of CPR in 97 episodes were recorded. There were 60 occurrences of CPR in those episodes. Seventy-five per cent of the patients survived the immediate arrest, and 67 survived to hospital discharge. The study's authors noted that the survival rates were significantly higher than the most optimistic actual survival rates in the medical literature, and the portrayal of CPR on television has led the viewing public to have an unrealistic impression of CPR and its chances for success.

From this and other studies, it is clear that the public is not accurately informed about the effectiveness of CPR. This creates a situation in which people may choose CPR for themselves or for family members when survival, not to mention recovery, is unlikely. In the frail elderly in a nursing home, the actual survival rates hover close to zero, with only rare instances where survival of CPR and recovery occur.

The last important question that families often ask is why not try anyway, on the remote chance that success will be achieved? CPR is an invasive, traumatic and undignified procedure. If survival is a meaningful or substantial possibility, of course it is justified. But if not, why subject your loved, frail elder to a dreadful end-of-life experience? Even for those for whom sanctity of life for religious reasons is paramount, the likelihood of a life being saved is very remote. CPR in this population contradicts the concept of a gentle death, which should be one of the major goals of families and of medical practitioners.

For caring families, the long-term care experience should focus on interventions that can assure comfort and a sense of worth. Looking to high-tech miracles to avoid inevitable death is unlikely to succeed and may impose an ineffectual technological intervention into what should otherwise be the naturally occurring and dignified process of dying.

Matzo Mushroom Lasagna

3 tblsp. olive oil
2 lg onions, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 1/2 lbs. mushrooms, chopped
1 c. chopped tomatoes
1/2 tsp. oregano salt pepper
5 matzohs
1 c. grated hard cheese
1/2 c. grated parmesan cheese
1 c. tomato sauce

Preheat oven to 350°F; grease an 8" square baking pan. Heat oil in large skillet. Saute onions, garlic, mushrooms until soft. Stir in tomatoes, oregano; simmer 10 min. Add salt and pepper to taste.

Soften matzohs by holding under warm running water for a few seconds. Spread 3 tblsp. tomato sauce on bottom of baking pan. Layer matzohs alternately with mushroom-onion mixture and shredded cheese, ending with layer of matzoh on top. Cover with remaining tomato sauce, sprinkle with parmesan cheese; bake 30 min. or until bubbly. Let cool slightly; cut into squares to serve.

Epi on Education

Keeping the forest in view

Seymour Epstein

There is a fundamental difference between a central community agency for education and any one of the constituent elements of Jewish education in the community. The individual elements – be they day schools, supplementary programs, youth groups, camps, or Israel experiences – are separate and private entities based on the particular ideology of their respective associations. This is as it should be, since the ideology and pedagogies of any one educational element are its raison d'etre. One expects that all such entities will have a community spirit of Klal Yisrael that values the organized community and aspires to be an active part of it, but the driving force behind each and every school and program is its own educational plan. This is how it serves both its clients and its vision.

The central agency, in contradistinction, has a different client base and a different set of goals based on its particular position in the community. Its client base is the entire Jewish population of the city, including the many tens of thousands who are presently not taking full advantage of the available educational resources, for whatever reasons.

If in Toronto, for example, we presently have about 60 per cent of the school-age cohort in some form of Jewish learning, those young people command a great deal of our attention, but not all of it. They may be eligible for tuition assistance, their schools and educational programs deserve and get professional development and program enhancement, and their teachers can take advantage of many assisting services at the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education.

But a central agency must also concern itself with the 40 per cent of children who are not present in our educational settings. It must struggle for government aid to bring down day school tuition. It must search for new options in the high school years where the percentage of cohort is even lower. It must outreach to the less affiliated and disaffected sectors, with a view to finding new portals into Jewish life that are meaningful to Jews on the periphery. These are the orders of the day from a communal perspective, and all of this must be done with the kind of pluralism that shows deep respect for all reasonable forms of Jewish expression.

Shalom… peace

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I frequently write about peace. It's a theme that never leaves my mind, although I often feel compelled to write about flamboyant community members or slices of life.

Sensing the growing need for a revolution of peace where the voice of decency and respect rings loudly from every corner of our world, I am at it once again – my words to you today are about shalom.

URBAN WRITER

I believe the desire for peace and goodness exists inside most of us and can be harnessed to create a world where genocide, torture and bigotry are squelched and respect is king.

"Am I my brother's keeper?" Cain asks God in Genesis 4:9. Of course, God answers. All people must watch over each other, respect and care for their neighbour, regardless of their colour, ethnicity or nationality. Similarly we are told in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers): "Who is honoured? He who honours mankind."

But the voice of peace is quiet. It is often stilled. It must be louder! We must cry from the rooftops – I reach my hand out to you. Grab it. Inspire me. Wonder with me. Wander with me. If this is not our goal, then something much more sinister will continue to creep into our souls.

In truth, there have been important pockets of peace over the last few decades, when nations and citizens returned to a meadow where hope sprang forth. Apartheid was defeated, and the wall dividing East and West Berlin came down with a thud. These were milestones in history, and we must consider deeply what forced such a movement forward.

Were these activities precipitated by respect? Were they in some way in sync with the words of Simeon Ben Azzai, one of the authors if the Mishnah in the second century, who wrote: "Despise no man and consider nothing impossible. For there is no man who does not have his hour, and there is nothing that does not have a place."

Is it not possible that most of the world community wants to live on a planet where unity and friendship prevail? Why not? Certainly there are those who will not accept the fact that peace is achievable, but on the other hand, few will tell you they aspire to getting the cuts and abrasions of war, the lifelong trauma caused by brutality.

At our core, we must believe in the sentiment of Samson Raphael Hirsh, the 20th-century Jewish scholar who said, "One glorious chain of love, or giving and receiving, unites all creatures."

We must know there are good human beings who play seriously in the playground of brotherhood and sisterhood, encouraging and enabling us to see the righteous among us and the goodness within us? These people exist on every street and in every continent.

Judaism adheres to the idea that in every generation, 36 righteous people exist whose task is to ensure the continuity of our existence. But I say there are more, or at least junior righteous people. We could be them. We could be the ones who tip the scale of hardship, dissension and inaction to make blessing, co-existence and action weightier. If we subscribe to this possibility can we not make it so?

If we accept that what we have today will be forever, then tomorrow we will fight, and it will be a bloody and shameful day. How much more hopeful it would be if we were to embrace another of Ben Azzai's ideas: these are the generations of mankind; this world is ours, and as in previous and future generations, we hold the key to unlocking door number 1, where we will find peace, or door number 2, where we will find war. Shalom!

MOTHER AND CHILD REUNION

The mothers of many of Israel's "lone" soldiers – soldiers whose families live abroad – recently had the opportunity to visit with their sons and daughters. They were brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency and by the Friends of the Israel Defence Forces. [Israel photo]

Sderot children 'traumatized' by rocket attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Although he's only the mayor of a small Israeli city, Eli Moyal knows what it's like to be the defence minister, or even the prime minister.

He knows because as part of his daily routine, he has to bear the brunt of complaints from his constituents in the southern development town of Sderot that more properly should fall in the laps of the two senior government ministers.

Eli Moyal

Faced with an unrelenting barrage of Qassam missiles from Palestinian controlled Gaza, the residents of Sderot "talk to me and see me like a prime minster, chief of staff or the defence minister," he said.

"They tell me, it's your job to do something. When I explain I can't give orders to the army I stand there and get shouts and criticism in place of the government. I don't mind, because they can't see or talk to [Prime Minister] Ehud Olmert or [Defence Minister] Amir Peretz."

> 'We stopped counting after 4,000'

Though he tells this story in measured tones, it's clear Moyal is quite angry at the Israeli government. He feels it has let down the community of 24,000 that is situated only one kilometre from the border with Gaza. As a result of its location, the town, as well as nearby kibbutzim, have been hit with numerous primitive, though deadly, missiles.

"We stopped counting after 4,000," Moyal said last week following a breakfast briefing for a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto leadership group.

The missiles started raining down on Sderot in 2000 but the frequency increased markedly after Israel pulled out of Gaza in August 2005. Since the Palestinian "ceasefire," more than 600 have been fired and in the period following the Mecca accord, the average has reached nearly two per day.

So far, seven residents of Sderot have been killed, hundreds wounded and hundreds of homes have been damaged.

Those are the statistics. But what is really affecting the quality of life in the town is the impact the missile attacks are having on children. As for the adults, "we'll manage," Moyal said stoically. "We served in the army and we know how to manage. We're talking about the children, the soft souls."

In Sderot, as in nearby kibbutzim, many "go into shelters at night.

"We're talking about traumas and fears of children who cannot sleep. Kids who refuse to go outside after sunset. You have children sleeping in shelters, sleeping with parents, peeing the bed again."

Interfaith Seder Held

CALGARY— The Calgary Jewish Community Council held the city's first community-wide interfaith Passover seder in recent memory last week. The March 15 invitation-only event was attended by some 100 Jewish leaders, and politicians and leaders of other faith and community groups. Hanita Dagan of the council's community relations committee said the holiday has a universal message. "Passover represents the Jewish people's assertion of freedom and the right to live an ethical life. This is the story we want to share with others," she told Calgary's Jewish Free Press.

Pearl's Killer Confesses

WASHINGTON — It's impossible to know if a top Al Qaeda terrorist's claim that he killed Daniel Pearl is true, Pearl's parents said last week. "We prefer to focus our energy on continuing Danny's lifework through the programs of the Daniel Pearl Foundation, which aim to eradicate the hatred that took his life,"Judea and Ruth Pearl said. Pearl, a Wall Street Journal reporter, was kidnapped in 2002 in Pakistan and beheaded after being made to affirm his Jewishness. Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, the suspected mastermind of the Sept. 11 attacks, took responsibility for Pearl's killing, as well as 30 other attacks and plots. He was speaking at a hearing in a U.S. naval prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the Pentagon said March 15. "I decapitated with my blessed right hand the head of the American Jew, Daniel Pearl, in the city of Karachi, Pakistan," he said. "For those who would like to confirm, there are pictures of me on the Internet holding his head."

Hitler Denaturalized?

BERLIN—Germany might revoke Adolf Hitler's citizenship. Isolde Saalmann, a Social Democratic member of Lower Saxony's parliament, is seeking to rescind the Austrian-born dictator's naturalization, given by Germany in 1932. She said it would be a key "symbolic step," especially for Lower Saxony, which still feels the stigma of its former identity as Braunschweig, the Nazi stronghold that helped the stateless Hitler obtain citizenship, paving the way for his presidential candidacy. State attorneys are checking if the revocation would be legal.

Ambassador Fired

SAN SALVADOR — Israel fired its ambassador to El Salvador. Jerusalem sources said last week that Tsuriel Raphaeli has been recalled after El Savaldor police a couple of weeks ago found him outside his residence drunk, bound and wearing only sex bondage gear.

Anti-Zionist Beaten

WARSAW— An Austrian Jew who embraced Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was assaulted by a group of Israelis in Poland. Ma'ariv reported that Moshe Aryeh Friedman, a member of the fringe, anti-Zionist sect Neturei Karta who attended the recent Holocaust denial conference hosted by Ahmadinejad in Tehran, was spotted this month while visiting the former Auschwitz and Birkenau camps. A group of haredi Jews from Israel also touring the sites set upon Friedman, who is orginally from Monsey, N.Y. "We gave him a good beating, the kind we have not given in a long time," one of the Israelis, Yehuda Meshi-Zahav, said.

Seminary Admits Gays

LOS ANGELES — The Conservative movement's rabbinical seminary at the University of Judaism has accepted its first openly gay students after a recent vote by the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards to permit the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis. One gay man and one lesbian have been admitted for next fall, the Forward reported. Conservative Judaism's flagship rabbinical college, the Jewish Theological Seminary, is expected to decide in the next few weeks whether to follow suit. In December, the law committee passed a tshuvah allowing gay ordination and same-sex unions, but it also passed two others upholding the ban on gay ordination, which means institutions can set their own policies.

Man Charged After Chabad Centre Attacked

TORONTO— A man has been charged with mischief after being caught throwing an object through a window at the Chabad Midtown Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street south of St. Clair Avenue.

Police are treating the incident as a hate crime, and the investigation is ongoing.

A passing TTC driver saw a man throw an object at the centre in the early morning of March 15 and called police. They searched the area and located a man nearby "wearing clothing and items representative of neo-Nazi and white supremacist groups," including swastikas.

The suspect, an unemployed high school dropout, was reportedly found with two other men who were not charged.

Rabbi Nechamia Deitsch, spiritual leader of the centre, said that four windows in total were broken and three young males were involved. He added that "police acted quickly and had the boys clean up the mess they made."

The suspect was released on a promise to appear in court, to abide by a curfew and stay 100 metres from Jewish institutions, the National Post reported.

Frank Bialystok of Canadian Jewish Congress said of the release that "we've had a good relationship with the police and they've helped us. We have to trust them on this."

Jason Belfiglio, 20, of Toronto has been charged with mischief under $5,000.

Livni thanks Canada, talks trade during visit

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni was in Ottawa last week where she publicly thanked Canada and its government for showing strong support for Israel, especially during last summer's war in Lebanon, and for Canada's stand against terrorist organizations.

During her 24-hour visit, Livni met with Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay and Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day for talks on diplomatic, trade and security issues. As well, she visited Library and Archives Canada and its Jacob M. Lowy Collection of Hebraica and Judaica.

Livni, the first Israeli foreign minister to come to Canada in 10 years, also addressed the recently established Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce on March 13, imparting the message that Israel is a good place to invest.

She encouraged the businesspeople in attendance to visit Israel.

"Take it as a personal invitation to come to Israel, first as tourists and then to invest in Israel – not for the sake of Israel, but because there are real business opportunities in Israel," she said.

"Please come. We have so much to offer, to make the friendship between our nations more concrete in terms of business numbers."

Formed last May with the goal of aiding and increasing bilateral investment and trade between Canada and Israel, and to encourage Canadian companies to do business with Israeli ones, the group has the guidance and support of Israel's Ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

Livni's breakfast address was held in the offices of Gowling Lafleur Henderson, a national law firm that is actively promoting Canada's increased engagement with Israeli business and investors.

Gowlings partner Jacques Shore welcomed the members of the group, as well as Canadian MPs Royal Galipeau and Bernard Patry; and the Jordanian Ambassador to Canada, Nabil Barto. Also among the 50-plus attendees were Christine Wong from Canada's International Trade Department; Nicole Dufresne Baker, incoming chair of the Ottawa Chamber of Commerce; and Richard Remillard, executive director of the Canadian Venture Capital Association.

Introduced by Shore as "a star within Israel's political constellation," Livni expressed dismay that Israel's image abroad is mainly linked to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Countering misperception

From the editor's desk

Last week, in this space, we lamented the cavernous disconnect between the widely held perception of Israel and the day-to-day, living reality of Israel.

The catalyst for that lament was the publication of the results of two recent polls conducted by international marketing houses each of which found, essentially, that Israel was among the least-liked, if not the least-liked, countries in the world.

In commenting on the results of one of the polls, Steven Kull, director of the University of Maryland's program on international policy attitudes, which undertook that poll alongside the international consulting firm GlobeScan, said: "It appears that people around the world tend to look negatively on countries whose profile is marked by the use or pursuit of military power."

If Kull's observation is true, then it is equally true to observe that, to a large extent, it is Israel's enemies who control the image of the Jewish state around the world. In an irony as surrealistic as it is painful and maddening, the more Israel responds to the unceasing and variously vicious assaults upon its citizens, the more its image around the world suffers.

We have seen this phenomenon time and again in Israel's conflict with its neighbours. The more Israel says we are determined not to die, but to live, the more the world sneers in heavy condemnation of it.

Thus, to cite but a few examples, we saw the distorted, dishonest, but effectively accusatory media coverage that shouted "massacre and war crimes" in Jenin, after Israel raided the terrorist nests responsible for the slaughter in the Park Hotel in Netanya on Passover night some three years ago. Or we saw the coverage of the war last summer against Hezbollah-Iran-Syria in which "disproportionality of response" was the recurring effectively condemnatory theme of the accusations against Israel.

And to this very day, Israel is vilified for the roadblocks along its border with the Palestinian territories or for the security fence without any counterbalancing reference for the reason that necessitated the roadblocks and the fence. There is no doubt that the roadblocks are intrusive and often humiliating; or that the fence has physically blighted a land that is beautiful and now weeping. But Palestinian leaders continue to send suicide bombers to kill Israelis. Defending one's people against those intent on their murder is the highest obligation of any government, anywhere on earth.

The enemies of Israel thus even "win" when they lose. Those leaders of the Palestinians more intent on destroying Israel than on building Palestine have a vested interest in perpetuating the constant suffering for their people that flows from their constant warfare against Israel.

For they know that when Israel fights back, the world frowns.

And worse. So many people, now either worn out and won over by the negative portrayal of Israel, or ill-disposed from the very beginning to a sovereign Jewish state that fights hard for its survival, blame Israel and its unresolved conflict with the Palestinians for being the cause that the large list of other Mideast and related conflicts remain unresolved.

The gravest example of this thinking was the recommendation last year in the Baker-Hamilton report to U.S. President George W. Bush suggesting that the outcome of the Iraq war hinged on the outcome of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Therefore, as we wrote last week, the conclusion is inescapable and so very sad.

"The propaganda campaign waged against the Jewish state – since the creation of the Palestine Liberation Organization in 1964, that was refocused after June 1967, that inexplicably gained more supporters after October 1973 and that has reintensified each year after every battle Israel has had to wage in defence of its people and sovereign existence – has been successful."

What's to be done, I ask myself?

My answer is quite personal and directed primarily inward, mostly to calm the roilings of a worried, stirring soul. I offer no suggestions to the government of Israel. Its diplomats and government officials are fully aware of the myriad difficulties yet profound significance in representing the Jewish state on the international stage.

First and foremost: though it is very hard, sometimes lonely, always frustrating and occasionally frightening, we must never despair of the ultimate triumph of truth over falsity or lose our sense of purpose. That purpose, of course, is many layered: for the sake of the Jewish people, Jewish life, our own senses of contribution and involvement and for the example and confidence with which we want our children and grandchildren to grow.

Indeed it is in the timelessness of these many layers that one finds the company of many ages and, of course, strength.

As much as we can, we must become informed and educated about the truth of Israel, its unabating efforts toward peace with its neighbours, the fabulous diversity of the people who live there and the cacophonous but exciting society those people have created.

The antidote to propaganda is truth.

As at the Pesach seder, we encourage questions, for every question has an answer. We must see ourselves therefore as we do at the seder, discussing and answering, bearers of truth and hope for a more redemptive future.

FOOD DRIVE HELPERS

Associated Hebrew Schools students from the Danilack Middle School on Finch Avenue fill boxes for the National Council of Jewish Women Toronto Section's 24th annual Passover food drive. The kits include kosher chicken, wine, candles, matzah, juice, candles, vegetable soup mix, gefilte fish and matzah farfel, as well as other supplies to help some 2,400 recipients during Passover. Food drive chair Paula Frisch said that as Passover approaches, the council appreciates donations of kosher for Passover food, but it also needs money to buy food. And because it's able to buy goods at wholesale prices, its dollar goes further, she said. The council is also seeking volunteer drivers to deliver boxes on March 25. Volunteers can show up at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., at 9 a.m. Donations can be made by calling Council House at 416-633-5100.

Lecture explores range of Jewish medical ethics

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish medical ethics address real-life situations that are so new they are still in the realm of theory, and so basic that they have been relevant for centuries.

Three lecturers covered that spectrum at York University's annual Leonard Wolinsky Lecture on Jewish Life and Education Mar. 11. Susan Kahn, a professor at Harvard University; Edward Reichman, a physician and ordained Orthodox rabbi who teaches emergency medicine and Jewish medical ethics at Yeshiva University's Albert Einstein College of Medicine; and Rabbi Elliot Dorff, rector of the Conservative movement's University of Judaism in Los Angeles, spoke at the Sunday afternoon on-campus event, sponsored by York's Centre for Jewish Studies, faculty of arts and faculty of education, in cooperation with the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

As an example of a cutting-edge issue, Reichman raised the question of whether one woman can have two first-born children, an issue that would affect the necessity of having a pidyon haben ceremony for a first-born son. The question could arise now that uterine transplantation is becoming a reality, he explained, outlining a scenario in which a woman could give birth, have her uterus removed for medical reasons, and subsequently give birth to a second baby who had developed in a uterus transplanted from a woman who had never had a child.

"I trust that whatever new issues will develop, the rabbis will address them with the vigour and comprehensiveness they have in the past," he said.

Reichman, who was ordained at Yeshiva University, drew on obscure historical examples to illustrate how long-gone rabbis addressed their own contemporary medical issues, including the use in the 16th century of mumia, a medicinal substance used to embalm mummies and later derived from mummified remains. The Egyptian chief rabbi of the time, David Ben Zimra, permitted its use, stating that it was "far removed" from its original source, and that one is allowed to violate certain prohibitions [in this case, against deriving benefit from a corpse] for the sake of saving a human life.

The issue, in general terms, is "a very real and contemporary problem," Reichman said, referring particularly to life-saving organ transplants from deceased donors.

Another historic case that resonates today has to do with early attempts at smallpox vaccination. Reichman cited Rabbi Israel Lipschitz, who lived from 1782 to 1860 and said that inoculation was permitted despite the "great risk" because the risk of dying from spontaneously acquired smallpox was even higher.

A contemporary tshuvah issued by the Conservative movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards goes further, stating that vaccination is "required for things that have been proven," said Rabbi Dorff.

In response to a question about the ethics of a community using halachah to force parents to vaccinate their children, Reichman said the question is not an easy one. The success of preventing disease depends very heavily on the entire community receiving the vaccination, he said. There are haredi communities that refuse to undergo vaccination, he noted.

Although "our ancestors were not nearly as good at curative medicine, they were much better than we are at psychosocial support," said Rabbi Dorff, comparing today's hospitals, nursing homes and hospices to the home environment that used to be common for people who were sick, "in familiar surroundings [with] all kinds of people you knew and loved around you."

Rabbi Dorff said that visiting the sick is an "important commandment," and outlined tradition-based recommendations on how to do it:

• For a patient who is in bed, a visitor should sit down. "Physicians here, take note," he admonished, adding that standing emphasizes a power imbalance between visitor and patient, and the difference in their states of health.

• Allow the person to talk about the illness if he or she wants to. If the prognosis is good, you can celebrate that and talk about what you can do in the meantime [like helping with] carpools and food. If it's not, you talk about what you can realistically hope for, like a reduction in pain, or seeing family members you haven't seen in years, and maybe reconciling.

• You can also talk about "the exact same thing you would talk about if the person were well – novels, movies, sports, show business, politics... It says, 'You're still here, and your opinion still counts for me.' " It also reinforces the person's sense of being adult, which may be compromised due to limitations imposed by illness, said Rabbi Dorff.

• Another idea is to help the person create an ethical will, which is a document – or sometimes an audio or videotape – articulating values, hopes for the future and family history. This does not have to wait until someone is dying, he added.

He also said that visitors should be aware that body language at the end of life, although different, is not necessarily an indication that the person's mind is not working. "People can have their eyes closed and not be asleep," he said.

All three speakers addressed reproductive issues, and Kahn noted that the incidence of genetic diseases in the ultra-Orthodox world has been dramatically reduced as a result of prenatal genetic testing for Tay-Sachs and other diseases that "seem to be more prevalent" among Ashkenazi Jews.

She credited the New York-based organization Dor Yesharim, which cross-checks lab results to prevent "genetically incompatible" matches between prospective marriage partners.

Rabbi Dorff noted that his family has been affected twice by prenatal genetic screening issues.

When his daughter was tested for Tay-Sachs about five years ago, results were inconclusive even when the test was repeated. The rabbi and his wife then went for testing to determine whether they could have passed a carrier gene to her. "I still remember the look on the nurse's face!" said Rabbi Dorff, referring to the age gap between the couple and more typical patients.

On a more serious note, he said that one of his grandchildren was diagnosed at age 1 with Fragile X Syndrome, the most common cause of inherited mental impairment, according to the website of the National Fragile X Foundation. Rabbi Dorff's son and his wife had been tested for "the panel of Ashkenazi Jewish diseases and came out with a clean slate, so this was a real surprise."

The syndrome is a common abnormality among Jews and non-Jews, he said. "If you know of young couples being tested for Jewish genetic diseases, I would recommended being tested for Fragile X in addition."

Tenant barred from erecting sukkah at building

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A resident of an apartment building in the Annex is challenging his landlord's refusal to permit him to erect a sukkah in a common area on the building grounds.

David Moyal has filed a complaint to the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC) alleging harassment and discrimination at the hands of the property manager and building owner.

At the same time, he has started an action before the Ontario Rental Housing Tribunal, alleging that by refusing to permit the sukkah, the landlord interfered with his enjoyment of his unit.

Moyal is asking the tribunal for a rent abatement of $378 as "compensation for not being able to celebrate our seven-day Jewish holiday" and for instruction to the landlord to stop the activity which led to the application.

He is asking the Human Rights Commission to require of the landlord "the right to practise our religious rights [sic] not only without harassment or discrimination, but with accommodation," as well as a $10,000 fine.

Moyal's human rights complaint is set for mediation on May 1 while the hearing before the Housing Tribunal will resume on April 30.

The case is complicated by an earlier run-in involving Moyal and the building superintendent over an alleged defamation by Moyal that landed in small claims court and over other tenant claims not specifically related to the sukkah.

Moyal said he has been living in the same building on Walmer Road, near Spadina Road and Bloor Street, for 13 years, and for the last 10, he has been putting up a sukkah that he and other Jewish residents use during the autumn festival. He has had as many as a dozen visitors in the sukkah at any one time and he's made it available to a homeless Jewish woman from the neighbourhood.

Files complaint with OHRC

"It's a very communal sukkah used every day for the [duration of the holiday]" he said.

Moyal said his problems began in November 2005 when the new property manager forbade non-artificial Christmas trees in apartments. Shortly after that, Moyal helped create a tenants' association.

In December 2005, Moyal was informed he would no longer be permitted to build a sukkah on the building's common ground.

In September 2006, he sent a letter to the Victoria-based property manager informing him he would be erecting the sukkah as he had in years past. The property manager wrote back saying that no temporary structure constructed by any faith group is permitted on the property, but he would make a "conditional exception" for a balcony sukkah.

In his complaint to the OHRC, Moyal requests "that we can build our sukkah every year in the same place."

Documents filed with the OHRC tribunal by the property manager state that "Mr. Moyal may have been permitted for the previous 10 years to build a sukkah on the property of 22 Walmer, but that in itself does not entitle him to continue doing so indefinitely. The respondents (the superintendent and property manager) were concerned with safety and liability issues in connection with Mr. Moyal's erecting a temporary structure (the sukkah) on the property. They had already experienced serious problems in that regard."

The property manager also stated that during the fall of 2005, the structure collapsed during a rain storm and a power line was found coursing through puddles, creating a fire hazard. In addition, there was a problem of homeless people sleeping in and around the sukkah, with some tenants voicing complaints.

Furthermore, the property manager stated, efforts had been made to accommodate Moyal's request "while balancing the concerns of safety, liability and the peace of the other tenants" by permitting a balcony sukkah.

In his complaint, Moyal referred to the 2004 Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Amselem case, in which the court ruled that a condominium association could not prevent co-owners from constructing sukkahs on their balconies.

The court ruled the prohibition of balcony sukkahs abridged the religious rights of Jews and that the property rights and safety issue raised by the condo association were trumped by those religious rights.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "landlords should be cognizant of their rights and responsibilities under a number of statutes, including the Human Rights Act, to allow minorities to participate fully in society."

He said the law attempts to balance accommodation of minorities by a service provider (a landlord) with the hardship that might result for that service provider.

Human rights case law "indicates that when balancing the principle of undue hardship versus reasonable accommodation, the base for proving undue hardship tends to be set high," he said.

Quebec's election

Not since 1970 have the voters of Quebec had three viable parties from which to choose their new government. As of this writing, the Liberal party of Jean Charest, the Action Démocratique du Québec led by Mario Dumont and the Parti Québécois of Andre Boisclair were essentially in a three-way tie among declared voter support.

As ever, voters must vote according to the call of their conscience. The best prospect of "good government" – that champions economic growth and development; high quality education; social, health and environmental well-being; and cultural opportunity – should be the most persuasive and forceful of all the campaign promises to which voters, like loose iron filings on a hard-surface table, should attach themselves.

But, as in all elections in Quebec in recent times, there is the additional dimension of accommodating Quebec's nationalist aspiration. It is an aspiration that dare not be overlooked.

The Jewish community of Quebec has long been part of the evolving rich fabric of the province. The first Jews came to Quebec in the 18th century. Long and dutiful has been the participation of Jews in building a prosperous, caring, exciting and welcoming society in Quebec. The Jewish community in Quebec today, as yesterday, is neither monolithic in its voice nor homogenous in its multi-textured composition. Our diverse co-religionists respond to a wide array of different causes and support parties of every political stripe.

But it is the considered view of this newspaper that the greatest protection for French-language culture, the most effective nurturing of its distinctiveness, the most long-lasting promotion of its unique place in Quebec, Canadian and world society, is through the far weightier mechanisms and instruments – at home and abroad – of an officially bilingual federalist country. Quebec within a Canadian federalist framework is the surest way to accommodate Quebecers' nationalist aspirations in a world increasingly anti-nationalist, where political borders are being increasingly subordinated to the invisibilities of the Internet and to the commercial and educational imperatives of global trade and common global enemies.

It is also our belief that Quebec within a federalist framework is the surest way to accommodate the reasonable aspirations of minorities within Quebec society, of which a great deal has been recently said and over which a great deal of emotion has recently been expended in Quebec.

The exhilarating societal example and supple legal spine of a charter of rights and freedoms from coast to coast, along with the enshrinement of the multicultural ideal within the Canadian constitution, can only strengthen and buttress the application of Quebec's code of human rights.

People who exchange a dollar are left each with only a single dollar but people who exchange an idea, a song, a poem, cultural markers of any kind, are left each with two ideas, two songs, two poems, two cultural markers. Such is the deep and long-lasting enrichment of true, tolerant multiculturalism and of the abiding, uncompromisable respect for the others' human rights.

The vote by Quebecers on March 26 is an important one.

25 years ago in The CJN

After an acrimonious dispute between B'nai Brith and Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region that led to the dissolution of their Joint Community Relations Committee, Rose Wolfe, chair of Congress' new external relations committee, said there is nothing wrong with having more than one such community body. But, she said, on serious matters such as fighting anti-Semitism and maintaining harmony between Jews, and between Jews and the outside world, a unified front is paramount.

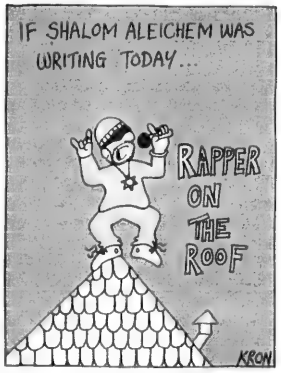
Jewish political assassinations

In "A radical turning point in Jewish history" (CJN, March 8), about the murder of Rabbi Abraham Kohn, Sheldon Kirshner quotes the historian Michael Stanislawski's implication that political assassinations are empirically, or even intrinsically, associated with "Orthodox (and other forms of traditionalist Jewry)." Yet in the examples of modern assassinations mentioned in the article, there is a glaring inconsistency that undermines this very thesis.



Jacob de Haan was a capable and effective spokesperson for the Orthodox Agudath Yisrael party during the 1920s and fought for haredi independence from the growing hegemony of the secular Zionist establishment. He was assassinated just after leaving shul a few days before he was to leave for England to argue the Old Yishuv's (the term used in the Zionist movement before the establishment of the State of Israel for Jewish residents in Palestine) case for autonomy from the Jewish Agency. Notably, in contrast to all the other political assassinations of modern Jewish history, de Haan was not murdered by a lone zealot who was radicalized and emboldened by a climate of extreme rhetoric.

Historians have conjectured that de Haan was probably shot by members of the Haganah who certainly would not have acted alone, but only on "orders" from superiors in the Jewish Agency. How high up the hierarchy these "orders" originated, we will never know, for in the conspiracy of silence surrounding his murder, no one was ever brought to justice.

So unfortunately, de Haan's murder makes it apparent that, to all of Jewry's great shame, political assassinations have no particular ideological home.

'We are destroying ourselves from within'

We have always viewed The CJN as a community newspaper, and as such, the paper should play an important role in supporting the Jewish community. As you are well aware, one of the largest problems we as a Jewish community are facing right now is the declining enrolment in Jewish day schools.

How you can feature an article slamming the Jewish day school system without any constructive resolutions or suggestions – in the very supplement where you enlist paid advertising from these same schools ("Do Jewish day schools make the grade?" Live and Learn, CJN, March 1). How can you sing the praises of public and not Jewish private schools in the face of our community's crying need for Jewish education?

Are you proud that you – as a community newspaper – have promoted lashon hara about the schools involved in the article? The people interviewed left those schools more than three years back, meaning the comments are likely not relevant, and there was no constructive feedback, no insightful recommendations or wonderful enlightening suggestions, and certainly nothing thought provoking about the article. While I am by no means suggesting that the Jewish day school system has no problems, no school is perfect; Jewish or not, private or public. If you wish to use this paper to openly discuss and resolve issues, then please do it in a constructive manner in which there is an even argument portrayed and a discussion point left for people to think about.

While I am a parent of children at the Toronto Heschel School, of which I am proud, I am writing this to you not out of concern for the defamation against my children's school, but at my bitter disappointment for this example, not only of a terrible editorial decision, but a clear spotlight on how we are destroying ourselves from within our own community.

At the Heschel School, we pride ourselves on building bridges and encouraging our children to make a contribution to the world we live in. Your article has made our job that much more difficult.

Dion responds to hate attack

I was deeply saddened to hear of last week's hate-motivated attack against a midtown Toronto Jewish centre.

Hate crimes such as this are an affront to the values of tolerance and diversity that define Canadian society.

Canadians take great pride in our nation's diverse communities, and our society must be safe for citizens of every culture, religion and ethnic background. We will continue to fight anti-Semitism and all forms of discrimination as we strive to ensure our communities are both welcoming and safe for all Canadians.

The evolution of Canadian Jewish advocacy: CIJA shifts the focus

By HAROLD M. WALLER

(Final of three parts)

There are advantages to the new, more bureaucratic structure of the organized Canadian Jewish community, namely that both the Canada-Israel Committee and Canadian Jewish Congress are now under tighter control and consequently are more accountable to those who provide the funds. Moreover, both bodies have clearly defined roles and can be kept within the bounds that have been set for them because of the discipline of the funding process.

Adjusting to this new reality has been more difficult for Congress than for CIC, because the former traditionally has been engaged on a wider range of issues than the latter. Taking the long term view, Congress has probably had to adapt to a more reduced scope than any other national Jewish organization. Needless to say, this has proved a difficult task for Congress, especially for people who have been involved in the organization for many years and are not accustomed to the tight rein of Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy.

CIC, in contrast, has always had a more focused agenda and has a shorter history. As a result, it has adapted more easily. As well, it has probably found the adjustment easier, because its budget has been increased substantially, in line with the emphasis that CIJA places on Israel-oriented advocacy. Certainly, the new structure has made both CJC and CIC more accountable and transparent to their funding bodies.

The main advocacy focus since the reorganization has been related to Israel, because of the widely held perception among community leaders that Canada's foreign policy needed to be oriented in a more positive direction than it had been.

Despite overt expressed support for Israel on the part of the Liberal Party, there was a perception among many Jews that the government toward the end of the Chrétien period and during the period of Paul Martin's leadership was not sufficiently supportive when the chips were down. This was especially true in terms of votes at the United Nations, where Canada appeared to try to keep in step with the western European countries, which were noticeably more willing to take pro-Palestinian positions than Canada's other main reference point, the United States.

There were a number of factors at work that concerned Jewish community leadership, including the growing clout of Muslim voters (especially in some key areas), an entrenched foreign affairs bureaucracy that tilted toward the Arabs, and declining enthusiasm for Israel among party elites as Israel struggled to combat Palestinian terrorism through the use of techniques that were controversial in some circles.

In order to help it plan strategically, CIJA commissioned a national attitude survey about Arab-Israeli issues. The conclusion, based on the data, was that the traditional emphasis on the positive aspects of Israel's actions and policies and the negative nature of Palestinian actions was not working. Hence the CIJA leadership decided to change approach.

The new approach had two particular elements: to underscore the shared values of an enlightened democracy between Canadians and Israelis and to downplay the significance of whatever the Palestinians were or were not doing. For those who had been involved professionally in pro-Israel advocacy for many years and who personally believed that Israel's cause and actions were just, this required a challenging adjustment. Nevertheless the new strategy was implemented. Subsequent surveys conducted for CIJA indicate that the strategy is working.

Of course, public attitudes are not the only measure of success in advocacy efforts. Attitudes and policies in government are at least as important – and arguably more so.

Clearly the community had many issues of concern with recent Liberal governments in addition to the UN votes. For example, there had been several problematic comments coming from prime ministers or foreign ministers. On the other hand, Liberal governments had been helpful to Israel behind the scenes, something that Israeli governments certainly appreciated.

Getting the Liberals to move closer to the position of the Jewish community on Israel required a lot of effort, much of it involving quiet lobbying behind the scenes. Sympathetic members of Parliament were also helpful. In its last year in office under Martin, the Liberal government did move noticeably toward expressing stronger support of Israel, thereby validating CIJA's approach.

Since the formation of the Conservative minority government last year, official positions have been much more in line with what the community has recently sought. This was particularly true during last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah. Prime Minister Stephen Harper's personal commitment to Israel has certainly made the community's task easier. Ironically, there is some danger that Harper's Conservatives could face a backlash in the next election if some voters perceive the government as being too closely identified with Israel. That conundrum confronts community policy leaders with some difficult choices, though presumably of a different character than what they faced while the Liberals were in power.

Harold Waller observes that the main advocacy focus of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) relates to Israel. In keeping with this shifted focus, CIJA members met with Prime Minister Stephen Harper at the CIJA conference and parliamentary dinner in Ottawa last month. Seen with the prime minister are, front from left, Stanley Plotnick, president of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC); Lawrence Zimmering, chair of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC); Barbara Farber, president-elect of UIAFC; Julia Koschitzky, CIJA board member; Nelson Halpern, Calgary Jewish Community Council president; and Hershell Ezrin, CEO, CIJA. Standing, from left, are Brent Belzberg, CIJA co-chair; Jerry Lampert, British Columbia CJPAC board member; Larry Tanenbaum, CIJA board member; Harper; Moshe Ronen, chair, Canada-Israel Committee; and Steven Cummings, CIJA co-chair.

As with any structural reorganization, the changing face of Jewish community advocacy in Canada presents both gains and losses. On the plus side, as the result of the initiative of the members of the ad hoc committee that led to the formation of CIJA, there has been a revitalization of the advocacy effort and an infusion of additional funds.

Community organizations are also now more tightly focused on their objectives than was probably the case 10 years ago. There are clearly identified goals, both short-term and long-term, for relationships with government and with the public at large. These changes have already begun to pay off in terms of government policy toward Israel, though it is difficult to quantify just how much of the observed change resulted from community efforts and how much can be ascribed to the change in government. Certainly, there is a perception on the part of those involved that they are now better positioned to influence the government than they were in the past.

The other side of these developments is the emergence of influential leadership that is outside of and substantially independent of the normal community structures – namely the people who organized themselves to reorient community efforts and are continuing to supply the additional funds that the new initiatives require.

Although the federation leadership is not chosen through large-scale elections, it does enjoy legitimacy because of its official representative status. On the other hand, groups outside the official structure do not enjoy the same legitimacy.

This leadership, through the personal prestige of the people involved and the use of newly available funds, is demonstrably able to redirect community energies along the lines that it has determined are necessary. Until now, this approach appears to have worked. But the potential for possible future abuse is obvious. Essentially, the community is counting on this new leadership to act responsibly and to point the community in the right direction.

Another feature of the new structure is that once the appropriate position is determined at the upper levels, it has to be followed by the lower echelons. There are obvious advantages to promoting a centralized message, but there is a risk that dissenters may find no outlets in the existing structure and may seek alternative forums instead. Given that the unity of the community is a vital component of advocacy efforts, any substantial divisions would be very harmful. There is no doubt that the community has long sought to speak with one voice on matters concerning Israel in the belief that that is the most effective way to send a message. But the reality is that there are divisions among Canadian Jews and that these cannot simply be papered over.

Looking at events with some perspective, the changes of the past few years have produced a new face for the Jewish community vis-à-vis governments and the public at large. The organization chart has changed and the various community bodies have taken on new or modified responsibilities. And all of this is happening in a more businesslike environment.

Insofar as these changes have made advocacy of the Jewish community position more effective, they are all to the good. Dissatisfaction comes mainly from two sources. The first source is people who lament times past when organizational life was not as tidy but was perhaps more spontaneous, while the second consists of those who find themselves outside the consensus that CIJA-directed organizations promote and advocate. Undoubtedly, there will be continued grumbling from both directions in the future. Nevertheless, the success of the CIJA structure during the last few years means that the future direction of Jewish organizational life in Canada is now quite clearly defined.

Opinions

Canada good, Israel bad?

Ben Gurion's dictum that it doesn't matter what the gentiles say, only what the Jews do, rang true when the Jews were viewed as little David fighting the mighty Goliath. His admonition encouraged Israelis to style themselves as victors, not victims.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Today, Israel is regarded as Goliath and the bully of the Middle East. Now, it does matter what the gentiles say. In a BBC World Service survey of more than 28,000 people in 12 countries, 56 per cent of respondents had a negative image of Israel, while only 17 per cent had a positive one. Even Iran and North Korea fared better.

Of course, the current political leadership in Israel doesn't help. In the hopes of improving it, even impartial critics point to its many faults. The bad publicity contributes to Israel's poor image. On the other hand, there's little to suggest that the political leaders in other countries, including Canada, are that much better. Yet Canada came out on top in the survey: 54 per cent viewed it positively and only 14 per cent negatively.

MP Irwin Cotler says that Israel's bad image is due to the "new" anti-Semitism. Under the "old" anti-Semitism, Jews were pariahs wherever they lived. Under "new" anti-Semitism, the situation of individual Jews may have improved, but the Jewish state has become the new pariah among the nations.

Another reason for the poor showing is that Israel is in a bad neighbourhood. To protect itself from its many enemies, it must use force, and that is always ugly. The old David is now dressed in full battle gear and standing at checkpoints in the West Bank or rounding up militants in Nablus.

Israel's supporters believe that if it only had better PR, the nations would understand and approve. That's why many Diaspora communities, including Canada, persevere with initiatives of their own. Does it really make a difference, or does it only make Jews feel better about being Jewish?

Had Canada been forced to build a fence along its border and deploy commandos to intercept terrorists, its image may also have been tarnished. But Canada is in a good neighbourhood. Even the embarrassing moral lapses of Canadian soldiers abroad don't seem to have made a difference to its standing.

Remarkably, despite Israel's tarnished image and internal difficulties, the overwhelming majority of its Jewish citizens and a substantial majority of its Arab citizens don't want to live anywhere else. They know better than 28,000 respondents in 12 countries.

As someone privileged to be a citizen of both the best and the worst country in the survey, it seems to me that surveys should always be taken with a grain of salt. Public perception is not exactly divine revelation.

My brush with mindless anti-Semitism

I would have never imagined that playing the Tiger Woods 2007 video game could produce anti-Semitism.

Yet as I watched the virtual Tiger delicately stroke a long birdie attempt on a friend's Playstation 2, my ears perked up when that friend spouted derogatory slander that was somehow meant to help his cyber ball drop into the cyber hole.

Jonah Bratman in Ottawa

"Come on. Get there, you little Jew!" he said.

Now Tiger Woods, himself the son of an African-American father and a Thai mother, is the product of a racial melting pot, but "Jew" is definitely not one of the ingredients. Was my friend calling the spotted white virtual sphere Jewish?

Failing to see what would make this particular golf ball Jewish, I looked around to assess the situation. Everyone else in the room seemed to squirm awkwardly in awareness of my Jewishness. Feeling no need to respond because of the obvious transgression, I felt a palpable tension emerge in the room, only to be pierced by an even larger admission of ignorance.

"Sorry man. I didn't mean for you to hear that."

Are you serious? Would it be OK if I hadn't heard it? If a Jewish tree falls in a forest of gentiles, does racism make a sound?

It seemed odd to me that my friend displayed such a lack of tact in my presence. More surprising, though, was my own reaction: silence.

My Jewish heritage has always been a source of pride. Yet wearing the cloak of Jewishness may be easy and enjoyable in the safe confines of Toronto's Jewish community, but that same cloak becomes Joseph's Technicolor dreamcoat of "other"-ness at my university.

When I ventured out into the world of university, my downtown Toronto Jewish upbringing became a noticeable marker in my new environment. Think rural, white, and Christian, with a heaping spoonful of Muslim tossed in.

What's a Jew to do? The Muslims hate me before they meet me, and the Christians hate me for not being "normal" like them – as if hiding chocolate eggs on Easter or a Coca-Cola-inspired Saint Nick is truly Christian.

Not to be too stereotypical, but most of these white, Christian, rural students are just plain ignorant of the Jewish faith. And I'm totally fine with that. One of the great things about university is meeting people from other cultures and coming to understand their views of Canada – a process that's crucial to our multiculturalist ethos.

Many of my friends have only recently discovered Jamaican patties and falafel, ethnic delicacies that I enjoyed for years in Toronto's diverse food universe. But accepting another culture's food isn't the sole marker of racial tolerance.

Various encounters with anti-Semitism have marked my time here at Carleton University, but speaking with Jewish friends at many Ontario universities, I get the feeling that my experience is surprisingly universal.

Granted, we are not in 1930s Europe – thank God – but rather in 21st century Canada, a bastion of multiculturalism that's at the forefront of the information age. And I am eternally grateful for the opportunity to study in relative freedom, to learn through open dialogue and face oppositional ideologies with well-thought-out words rather than thought-less bullets.

Yet in many universities in this great country, ignorance often rears its ugly head.

It usually entails the occasional question – yes, Jews do stuff on Saturdays, and no, I don't own any banks or the media or Hollywood, though I wouldn't mind it if I did.

These inquiries are more about apathetic ignorance than embedded hate. But where is the fine line between ignorance and hate? One can never know until one experiences confrontations like the one on the virtual fairway with Tiger.

In that case, silence was my weapon, but sometimes I wish I would use fists to defend honour with blind-faith bravery.

That's been my dilemma throughout university; what is the correct response to an anti-Semitic comment?

From a friendly religious jab to a spray-painted swastika on a residence elevator, each situation requires a different response.

Dialogue is one option, violence is another.

But as much as I would like to champion the Jewish cause à la the Macabees, we must all pick our battles. Not everyone can be won over, but everyone should at least have knowledge. For that, we must educate.

Things I've learned from my friend Max

As I often do, I took a break from studying this past week to visit my good friend, Max. Max is known in the Halifax Jewish community for his characteristic sharpness and wit, of which there are no parallels in this great province of Nova Scotia (I'm not kidding).

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

Max moved to Halifax in the early 1920s from Brooklyn at the age of five and three-quarters, and he has witnessed and participated in the great transformations that this community, city and country have experienced since then. And Max can recount it all with the kind of verve, excitement and epic quality that makes you feel like you are part of the story.

Max and I enjoy the fact that, while 70 years separate us, we have much in common. In his words: "We have a similar background…our birthdays are very close, our names are founded in a close fashion," but, as he never ceases to point out, "we don't think alike."

Max refers to our rather divergent educational paths. While he left high school after grade 11 to study engineering at Dalhousie University, I have stuck it out studying useless things like philosophy and literature. As Max puts it: "You don't think mechanically like I do…You don't put two and two together and expect to get four…you expect to get 2½ or something in between, like a shade. And then you want to discuss it to say why you did it… that's philosophy isn't it?"

And with these few words, Max has aptly summarized the age-old debate between the fixity of the scientist and eternal skepticism of the philosopher.

But I wouldn't concede the point too easily. Anyone who has come into contact with Max – at shul or elsewhere – knows of his zest for asking questions, and indeed he is extremely adept at striking up a conversation with anyone, because of his sheer curiosity and willingness to probe anyone and everyone to their depths.

"I think you're a philosopher," I said to Max.

"In what way?" he retorts.

"You're always asking questions. That's what a philosopher is!"

"Questions? I guess that's true… but I never had any formal study in philosophy, except for a course in logic. And that was also quite mechanical – all we were looking for was some kind of answer or deduction."

"But I think that the way you comport yourself is very philosophical… That's what Socrates did – he just questioned people from morning until night."

"Yes, I suppose you're right" said Max. "Even when I was in school, I used to drive the teacher crazy with all my questions."

I was fascinated to hear Max describe one of his favourite childhood pastimes.

"I remember when my parents bought me a watch… they used to buy it for a dollar way back then… and eventually it would stop, and I would be inclined to try to open it up to see what's inside… and why it stopped."

Max has always loved picking apart machines to see how they were built. This, he admits, is much more enjoyable than putting them back together again. And it struck me that this is precisely what I do in my studies: I dismantle thoughts, ideas and texts to see how they are constructed. And I am certainly in agreement that it's far more exciting to break down an idea than to rebuild it, though both are obviously necessary.

Max often chides me for being stuck in my thoughts, unable to do anything practical – that is, with my hands. He sees this as being endemic to my generation: "Today people go into the Canadian Tire and they do everything for you… only a few people like to do things for themselves."

I hate to admit it, but he is absolutely right. Few of my peers can fix a clogged toilet or a broken window. Why should we when we have our landlords or residence managers at our beck and call? But Max has taught me that in order to be my own boss and have my own home some day, I need to learn to do things with my hands.

Though we may have chosen different paths in life, underneath our minor quibbles is a whole lot of mutual respect, and these differences of opinion provide fodder for good discussions over tea. That, after all, is what a friendship is all about.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Sunny Isles Beach

Sunny Isles Beach, a showcase for high-rise luxury condominiums and a redoubt of Canadian snowbirds fleeing the wrath of winter, was once little more than a sandbar and a mangrove swamp, the refuge of alligators, cranes and pelicans.

Incorporated as a city in 1997, Sunny Isles Beach, with a population of about 18,000, is scheduled to celebrate its 10th anniversary as an independent municipality on June 16. Tucked into the northeast corner of Miami-Dade County and bounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the east and the Intracoastal Waterway on the west, Sunny Isles Beach stretches from the seaside mansions of Golden Beach in the north to the marina of Haulover Park in the south. Sunny Isles Beach's main thoroughfare, Collins Avenue, bisects the city boldly, running northward to Hallandale, Hollywood and Fort Lauderdale and southward to Bal Harbour and Miami Beach's justly alluring Art Deco National Historic District, which, until the mid-1980s, was in a state of neglect and disrepair.

Sheldon Kirshner in Florida

Formerly part of North Miami Beach, Sunny Isles Beach is something of a Tower of Babel, with substantial Jewish, Latino and French Canadian populations, all mixed together seamlessly in a multicultural mosaic.

Twinned with the Israeli town of Netanya in 2005, Sunny Isles Beach – which proclaims itself as "Florida's Riviera" – is home to some 300 Holocaust survivors, the majority from Poland. At the initiation of Norman Edelcup, its second elected mayor, Sunny Isles Beach honoured them in a special ceremony at Temple B'nai Zion in 2004. A number of the survivors, including my parents, David and Genia, live in Winston Towers, a massive condo complex at 174th Street and Collins Avenue constructed in the 1970s and consisting of six tall beige buildings, a five-minute stroll to the beach.

One morning, as I walked through the squeaky clean marbled lobby on my way to the ocean, I overheard a brief conversation in Polish-inflected Yiddish between two elderly men in shorts, jerseys and baseball caps that spoke volumes about the character of Sunny Isles Beach."Were you in Theresienstadt?" the first asked out of the blue, referring to the Nazi concentration camp near Prague. "Yes," he answered. From there, the talk drifted to news of children and grandchildren.

Apart from Yiddish, this particular building in Winston Towers resounds to the sounds of New York- and New Jersey-inflected English, Spanish and Russian. The bulk of Winston Towers' inhabitants were and are first and second-generation Jewish Americans who bought apartments here to escape the cold weather on the East Coast. They were soon joined by European Jews, such as my late uncle Simon, who survived Hitler's onslaught. Simon, a clothier who settled in the United States after the war, persuaded my parents to purchase a condo in the vicinity. They subsequently moved to Winston Towers, a few years before Simon's sudden death.

Latin Americans, principally Cubans who left after Fidel Castro's takeover, came next. Unlike the Americans and the Holocaust survivors, they tend to be much younger and have school-age children.

The latest denizens, dating back to the late 1990s, are Russian Jews, who flock to the beach in droves and whose culinary needs are met by two delis within easy walking distance, the St. Petersburg and the Kalinka.

To the best of my knowledge, there are no French Canadians in Winston Towers. But a Québécois colony can be found on nearby North Bay Road, a pleasant, palm-fringed artery lined with elegant condos bearing such quintessential French Canadian names as Maisonneuve, Laurier, Montcalm and Cartier. The French Canadians in this sedate residential enclave, whose readily identifiable joual accents immediately mark them off as snowbirds of a certain kind, buy their provisions and their daily newspapers – La Presse and Le Journal de Montreal – at the local Publix supermarket and at Walgreen's, a national drugstore chain. The religiously observant among them attend Sunday services at St. Mary Magdalen, supposedly the only church in Sunny Isles Beach.

This Catholic church is several blocks from Temple B'nai Zion, one of four synagogues in Sunny Isles Beach, all of which are Orthodox in orientation. Aside from Temple B'nai Zion, which is located at 178th Street and Atlantic, there is Young Israel and two Chabad shuls. A Protestant church until about 35 years ago, Temple B'nai Zion was originally established by Ashkenzim, mainly Holocaust survivors, as a Conservative synagogue.

Converted into an Orthodox shul around 2004, Temple B'nai Zion has a largely Sephardi membership, its congregants hailing primarily from Syria, Iraq, Turkey and Israel, said Ahuva Franco, its executive director. The rabbi, Rafael Muratov, is from the Bukhara region of Central Asia, and has been here for a year.

Asked about the size of Sunny Isles Beach's Jewish community, Franco, an Israeli American, looked genuinely puzzled. She picked up the phone and called one of the directors of the synagogue.

"About 2,000 families," she reported back.

Rabbi Yisrael Baron, the director of a Chabad branch here and a former resident of Brooklyn, did not have any data either about the size of the community. "There are no real numbers, but we're probably the most densely populated Jewish area outside New York and Israel," he said.

Miri Moav, an Israeli from Rishon Le Zion, is one of the newest Jewish residents of Sunny Isles Beach, having arrived in 2004. She is one of the proprietors of the Bissaleh, a cafe and restaurant near the Winston Towers specializing in kosher Mediterranean fare and fresh fish. One of her partners, Julius Klayman, is from Toronto.

The Bissaleh, on Collins Avenue, is adjacent to the King David condominium, and lies directly across the street from the Pinnacle, the first modern high-rise luxury condo in the neighbourhood. Since then, a profusion of pricey condos has sprouted along the coastal side of Collins Avenue, from the Acqualina and the Florida Ocean Club to the Double Tree Ocean Point Resort and Spa to the Trump International. The newest "kid" on the block, the 27-storey, 69-unit Da Vinci on the Ocean, where "residences" start at a cool $1.7 million (US), will be ready for occupancy in 2009, said French Canadian sales agent Marie Auger. These stylish condos, which generally attract a clientele of European and North American buyers and investors, have obliterated most of the charming low rise motels, including the Dunes and the Aztec, which sprouted along the Atlantic shore from the 1940s onward. A few holdouts remain, notably the Monaco, the Golden Strands, the Thunderbird and the Sahara.

Interestingly enough, the chief developers of this vibrant section of Collins Avenue, a landmark of which is Wolfie Cohen's once renowned but now down-at-the-heels Rascal House restaurant, are two ex-Israelis, Michael Dezer and Ranaan Katz. Sunny Isles Beach's original developer, Harvey Baker Graves, was a Rochester furniture magnate who purchased a virgin tract of land in 1920, a century after the United States bought Florida from Spain for the then-grand sum of $5 million. A 1926 hurricane played havoc with his ambitious plan to transform Sunny Isles Beach into the "Venice of America," said municipal historian Richard Schulman. But by the 1950s, Sunny Isles Beach was booming.

Judging by the frenetic construction activity along Collins Avenue today, Sunny Isles Beach's future looks quite promising.

Gallander family celebrates 100th seder in Canada

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When a child asks the age-old Passover question, "Why is this night different than all others?" at the Gallander family's upcoming seder, it will be especially sentimental.

That's because this year marks the family's 100th seder anniversary since arriving in Canada at the turn of the last century.

"It's remarkable this family has been together at seders for 100 years," said Maxine Gallander Wintre.

The festive meal in Toronto will bring together 70 relatives and four generations of the Gallander family, hailing from such far-flung places as London, Miami, San Francisco, Pittsburgh, Victoria and Las Vegas.

Gallander Wintre estimates it will take four hours to complete the celebration.

As is the tradition, several members of the clan held a pre-seder meeting to organize the event and will also hold a post-seder gathering.

"We set up tables and assigned seats with name cards. After the seder, we have a meeting where everyone brings receipts, we total up all the costs and we divide it up so everyone pays their share," said Gallander Wintre.

"That's how it works every year."

Because of the huge turnout, the family will, for the first time, hold the meal outside of a relative's home.

It will be a catered affair at Edward's Gardens.

The origins of the Gallander's in Canada date back to the early 1900s, when Benjamin Gallander – Gallander Wintre's grandfather – immigrated to Toronto from Poland.

A few years later, he sent for his wife, Ida, and the couple's children.

Later, Benjamin brought over his wife's large, extended family from Poland.

"Initially, I assume my zaide conducted the seder," said Gallander Wintre, a psychology professor at York University.

"As the family grew, my uncle, Lou Harris, conducted the seder, then my cousin's husband, Howard Tishman, did it and now my kids, Stacey and Mattea, are very involved."

The seder participants have traditionally taken on various preparatory responsibilities, from cooking up delicacies like brisket and matzah balls, to bringing in loads of tables and chairs.

"We figure out who is coming and then everyone takes on certain chores," said Gallander Wintre.

At the Gallander seder, which is always reserved for the first night of Passover, the Haggadah is closely followed.

"We do the whole thing, from beginning to end," noted Gallander Wintre.

Reflecting on how the annual family event has endured over the years, Gallander Wintre points to strong family ties.

"I think it's endured in part because we're still in touch with each other," she said.

"We also all love each other [and share] a sense of commitment to family."

If the family patriarch was alive to see the entire clan together for this milestone seder, Gallander Wintre believes he would be immensely proud.

"He was a real soft-spoken man of few words, but it would light up his face and I think he'd kvell," she said.

"We're hoping that it will continue, and I suspect it will because we're all committed to it."

Come sun or snow El Al delivers

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts and Travel Editor

My El Al flight to Israel on Thursday, March 1, scheduled to leave Pearson International at 7 p.m., was delayed by a snowstorm and may have cost the airline $150,000 (US), according to a report in Globes, an Israeli business publication.

The flight was scheduled to arrive in Tel Aviv at 1 p.m., but the long delay and subsequent transfer in Zurich meant the flight didn't arrive until 11 p.m., more than five hours after the start of Shabbat.

The flight, originating from Chicago, was already delayed leaving O'Hare Airport due to an ice storm.

In Toronto, when we still hadn't boarded the plane by 9 p.m., observant Jewish passengers were becoming concerned about not arriving before Shabbat.

They were assured, however, that the flight would make up the time and that we would land at Ben-Gurion International Airport before Shabbat.

By agreement with the haredi community, El Al is prohibited from landing at Ben-Gurion on Shabbat.

We boarded the plane a reasonable three hours after the scheduled departure time, but after de-icing, the captain announced that due to harsh winter conditions, we would be heading back to the gate, where we remained on the plane for five hours.

A few hours later, the captain announced that we would be taking off shortly, but would not reach Israel before the start of Shabbat. He then told observant passengers that they would have to leave the plane.

Moments later, there seemed to be a change of plans and the observant passengers returned to their seats. The captain said we would be stopping "somewhere in Europe" before the start of Shabbat instead.

At close to 4 a.m., nine hours after the scheduled departure time, we finally took off. In order to avoid landing at Ben-Gurion during Shabbat, and risk irritating haredim who have threatened to boycott El Al several times for its desecration of Shabbat, El Al implemented what's been called the "Sun D'Or loophole."

We flew to Zurich, and El Al paid for overnight accommodations for observant passengers at hotels in the city. The rest of us were transferred onto a waiting plane from Sun D'Or International Airlines, a charter airline and subsidiary of El Al that can avoid the Shabbat restrictions because its planes don't say El Al anywhere on them.

That this was an El Al flight in all but flight number was made obvious to us when we landed at Ben-Gurion and the captain said, "Thank you for flying El-Al, I mean Sun D'Or."

It was the second time the Sun D'Or loophole has been implemented this year. In February, another flight from Toronto was diverted to London and non-observant passengers continued their journey on a Sun D'Or-operated flight, the Jerusalem Post reported.

After that flight, El Al took out an advertisement in two newspapers saying it intends to continue honouring the agreement it signed with the "Committee for the Sanctity of Shabbat."

A spokesperson for El Al told Globes that "if this continues, we'll have to close the airline. Ten such incidents a year will cost us $1.5 million."

Canadian honoured with mobile gym in Israel

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Shocked by the recent death of 59-year-old Joseph (Joe) Smith, family and friends have raised more than $40,000 for humanitarian and recreational programs in Israel through the Association for the Soldiers of Israel (ASI-Canada).

In gratitude, ASI-Canada's Wilf Shiff announced at a March 6 memorial at the Richmond Hill Country Club that Smith's lifelong commitment to Jewish physical and spiritual well-being will be honoured with the dedication of a bulletproof mobile gym.

Born in Poland in 1947, Smith arrived in Canada when he was seven. Trained as a math and history teacher, he spent the last 30 years running the business he founded, The One & Only Jewellery Company, with his wife Esther and daughter Shayna.

A longtime weightlifter and runner, Smith recently participated in the 10-kilometre Terry Fox Run and hoped someday to join the Boston Marathon. He died in November while jogging at the Richmond Hill Country Club, where he had worked out every morning for years.

More than 150 friends and family gathered as Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda's Rabbi Howard Morrison spoke of Smith's "total commitment to the Jewish people." As a lover of athletics and a lover of Israel, the gym dedication is a perfect tribute, Morrison said.

The portable gyms are a unique solution to the problem of soldiers' morale, offering a safe, bulletproof and air-conditioned environment for soldiers after a gruelling and frightening day on the front lines. The gyms, which look like small portable classrooms, hold standard exercise equipment and can accommodate 15 to 20 people.

Joseph Smith

ASI-Canada's Israeli counterpart, Friends of the Israel Defence Forces, offers other portable facilities, such as synagogues and satellite television tents, welcomed during recent World Cup soccer games. The organization itself was founded by David Ben-Gurion in 1942, prior to the State of Israel, when little support was available for the young freedom fighters.

Here in Canada, ASI raises funds and awareness for social, spiritual and recreational projects such as camps for soldiers' widows and orphans, plus food and educational assistance for soldiers in need and their families, including "lone soldiers," who have no family support in Israel.

An Israeli surgeon, paratrooper and longtime reservist (name withheld for security reasons) speaking at the event said he's seen many facilities in Israel named for Diaspora families. He told The CJN it was a pleasure to finally meet, in the Smith family and friends, "the faces behind the donations."

He said the portable gyms are so important for "keeping our mind busy with something other than fighting." To soldiers and their families, on the front lines or at home, he said, it is also meaningful to feel that Jews outside of Israel really do care. "We have only one country."

Longtime Smith family friend Harvey Frisch said on a recent trip to Israel, he heard soldiers saying, "I can't believe people in another part of the world care about me." The mobile gyms and ASI-Canada's humanitarian programs "build morale and dignity." For soldiers serving in "places you don't want to go to, I don't want to go to… they are there on a daily basis."

For more information on ASI-Canada, call 416-783-3053, 514-738-2858 or toll-free at 1-800-433-6226.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Fighting a bias in Israel's schools

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

No society is perfect, but overlooking our own imperfections makes us even less perfect. By talking about them, however unpleasant the discussion may be, imperfections can in some way be alleviated.

The issue I am alluding to is discrimination against Sephardim in Israel's educational system.

From the play-group level all the way up to higher education, one quickly finds out that being of Middle Eastern decent is a hurdle to be overcome.

It is a fact that some schools do not accept any Sephardim, while others will limit their numbers. Some even have quotas as to how many Sephardim they will accept.

It's not only the the schools that are to blame. Parents have been known to scrutinize the enrolment of their children's prospective school and ask school officials why so many of its students are of Sephardi origin. This has led Sephardi parents to enrol their children under pseudonyms – and this is sometimes done on the advice of a school itself!

There have been prolonged legal struggles over this issue, and there is even an organization whose sole mandate is to advocate against this particular sectarian discrimination.

To be sure, Sephardim have their own educational institutions, not the least of which are the ones under the auspices of the Shas movement, which form a veritable school system within the broader system (although they are in no way limited only to Sephardim).

Still, the fact remains that acceptance into the country's elite schools is difficult for Sephardi students – even for students of high achievement who are otherwise meritorious – simply because they are Sephardi.

In response to a prolonged legal struggle and after a ruling by the Jerusalem Court of Administrative Affairs, the municipality of Jerusalem is trying to halt this phenomenon.

Under the guidance of Mayor Uri Lupoliansky, as of the next school year, a uniform, standardized test will be given to all Grade 8 girls who want to apply to the city's various high schools, from the haredi to the secular.

The test will be prepared in conjunction with the Education Ministry and receive input and review from all secondary school headmasters.

Prior to taking the test, each girl will be issued a code to maintain her anonymity, so that each test will be reviewed in a way that will not reveal the writer's ethnicity.

Schools will select girls for interviews based solely on their marks. During this process, their identities will, of course, be revealed.

Schools will still reserve the right to disqualify applicants on suitability issues such as personality and way of life. Critics of this new system see this as a loophole and a fatal flaw in the plan, noting that personality and way of life are code names for ethnicity.

These same critics say that the purpose of the whole initiative is to portray the municipality as doing something about the court's verdict, but they say that, substantively, it will accomplish no more than to cause headmasters to come up with more creative and elaborate excuses for practising discrimination.

Blood of life

By RABBI AVI SHAFRAN

Guest Voice

That a recent book's reported claim of Jewish ritual murder in the Middle Ages stirred considerably more commotion in the Jewish media than in the Muslim world may be a hopeful sign. Or it might just testify to the depth and breadth of the longstanding belief in Arab and Asian countries that, why, yes, of course Jews murder non-Jews to use their blood in Passover matzah and wine (although the extension of that belief to Purim's hamantaschen is of more recent vintage).

The western media's unanimous condemnation and ridicule of the blood libel assertion in the Italian book Bloody Passover is certainly heartening. As many reports noted, the book's author, Prof. Ariel Toaff, based his speculation on confessions extracted from victims of torture. Surely, many whose bodies were pierced, stretched or torn by the horrific devices employed by European authorities in the 1400s – or who were even merely confronted with the prospect of such technology – would have just as readily admitted to being demons or Martians, too.

There is, of course, no basis at all to the contention that the Jewish faith includes, or ever included, the consumption, on Passover or anytime, of human or animal blood. Consuming either is in fact forbidden by Jewish religious law.

The concept of blood, though, is indeed central to Passover, which begins this year with the first seder on the night of April 2.

The blood is that of the Paschal, or Pesach, sacrifice, which in the times of the Holy Temple in Jerusalem was slaughtered on the afternoon before the onset of the holiday. The meat of the lamb or goat comprised the final course of the Seder (the original "afikoman"), and some of its blood was placed on the Temple altar.

We don't have a clear comprehension of the Jewish laws of animal sacrifices; somehow, the ritual results in our own greater closeness to God (korban, the Hebrew word for sacrifice, means "that which makes close"). But the spiritual mechanics, as is the case with so many of the Torah's commandments, are ultimately beyond mortal minds.

The Pesach sacrifice, though, seems to hearken back to the first Pesach, when the blood of the sheep or goat our ancestors were commanded to slaughter in Egypt, in preparation for their exodus from that land, was placed on "the doorposts and lintel" of each Jewish home.

In rabbinic literature, houses are symbols of the feminine, and so the blood on the doors of the Jewish homes in ancient Egypt might perhaps represent the blood of birth. From those homes in ancient Egypt, in other words, a new collective entity came forth into the world. A Jewish nation was born.

As the Shem MiShmuel, a classic chassidic text, explains, before the Exodus, the Jews were all related to one another (as descendants of Jacob), but they were not a people. Any individual was still able to reject his or her connection to the others and the rejection had an effect. Indeed, our tradition teaches that many in fact did not merit to leave Egypt at all, dying instead during the plague of darkness. Their behaviour precluded them from being part of the new, holiness-charged nation.

Once the nation-entity was forged, though, on our ancestors' very last night in Egypt, things changed radically. With blood on their doorways and satchels filled with (blood-free) matzah, they readily followed Moses into the frightening desert on God's orders, knowing not what awaited them.

Thus the Jews began the process of becoming a living nation, an entity whose members, and descendants throughout history, are part of an organic whole, no matter what any of them may choose to do.

As the Talmud put it: "A Jew who sins is still a Jew," in every way. There is no longer any option of "opting out."

And so, blood in Judaism is a symbol not of suffering, not of torture, not even of death, but rather of birth, life, meaning.

How ironic that blood came to be the subject of the wild, hate-filled fantasies of our enemies – to the point where even halachic sources suggest using white, not red, wine for the seder in places where there is fear of blood libels.

Anti-Semites, unfortunately, don't lack for fantasies. Whether it is casting U.S. Jews as warmongers or Israel as a fascist state – even those who know that blood isn't an ingredient in the Jewish diet are adept at adopting new delusions.

For our part, we Jews do well to stay focused on the Pesach-blood, the symbol of our birth as a people, and from there, to turn our sights to discerning and embracing the mandate of our peoplehood, the Torah – the ultimate reason for our "blood of life."

The thrill of Torah study

Essential Torah* by George Robinson, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Some years ago, George Robinson, a New York journalist, film critic and Jewish scholar compiled a valuable compendium of vital information about Judaism. Essential Torah, an admirable companion volume, is a complete guide to the five Books of Moses – and much else.

The book raises questions such as these: How did the public reading of the Torah evolve? To what extent is the Torah a legal document? Who wrote the Torah? What is the documentary hypothesis? How does Halachah undergo change? Who are the foremost Bible commentators? How can we understand troublesome biblical text? What is the best way to study the Torah? To what extent have the Dead Sea Scrolls and other archeological discoveries enhanced our understanding of the Bible?

The bulk of Essential Torah consists of the author's insightful homilies on the 54 Torah portions. It also presents a distillation of 2,000 years of biblical commentaries – from the sages of the Talmud and medieval personalities to a range of contemporary scholars.

An innovative section of the book contains the approach of a number of rabbis, teachers and scholars on how they study Torah. Rachel Barenblat, for one, suggests that the Torah can be read in an infinite number of ways: "It's a collection of stories, it's sacred, it's profane, it's legalistic, it's narrative, it's poetry! On the surface the text might say one thing, but generations of rabbis might interpret it in different ways, and their interpretations won't always agree with one another. This isn't a sign of the text's flaws – on the contrary, it's a sign of the text's richness.

"Come with an open heart and an open mind, and the first time you crack the book, toast yourself and say a Shehechiyanu – because you are starting something wonderful."

The changing role of women in Jewish life, maintains Robinson, is "the most fruitful development in Jewish thought in the second half of the 20th century… It presages the greatest change in Jewish religion. In non-religious terms, it should lead to a seismic shift that will nearly equal the impact of Haskalah and the Emancipation [the abolition of discriminatory laws applied to Jews] or the foundation of the State of Israel."

Over the centuries, prominent rabbis and scholars have been asked to express their opinion on matters of Jewish law. Their written answers became known as the Responsa literature. Robinson writes that one 1959 reference book says that "about a thousand volumes containing more than half a million Responsa have appeared in print." Responsa continue to be written by contemporary rabbis from all the streams of Judaism. Much of it concerns questions around such subjects as intermarriage, homosexuality, genetic engineering, abortion and euthanasia.

Is the Bible historically correct? To what extent is it authentic? The author answers, "If one does not approach the Torah looking for a history of ancient Israel and its neighbours, there are no grounds for disappointment. What history book would purport to describe God's active role in historical events in the first place? The Bible is not a history book; it is a book of moral instruction, folklore and myth, poetry and philosophy. Did the event recounted in the Torah actually happen? Symbolically, yes. Really? Who cares. To paraphrase Richard Elliott Friedman, the important thing isn't who wrote the Bible, but who reads it, how, and why."

Finally, readers are reminded that the Torah is one thing all Jews have in common, regardless of their attitude toward Halachah. Studying Torah is the one thing we can all do together. "I believe," says Robinson, "that the future of the Jewish people will hinge in some way on sharing the thrill of Torah study. And I hope you will be a part of that future."

Passover cleaning, Part 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It's known as the holiday of national liberation. But don't try to convince anyone who has been spending countless hours cleaning for Passover.

As you find yourself scouring, mopping and vacuuming, the important thing to remember is that you are not alone… especially if you have a computer nearby. Today, cleaning for Passover on the web. But first a reminder. There are many excellent articles explaining the why's and how's of Passover cleaning, but for the final word, you should always consult a trusted rabbi.

If the cleaning ritual is new to you, here's a website with a not-so-intimidating title: "An Absolutely Very Short Guide to Keeping Kosher for Pesach." [http://tinyurl.com/2gts3a] But if you are looking for more detail, then check out "Clean for Pesach and Enjoy the Seder," edited by Rabbi Moshe Finkelstein. Before he gets into the nitty and the gritty, Rabbi Finkelstein explains why modern Passover causes such high levels of cleaning angst. In the past, wealthy people who lived in large homes had servants to do their cleaning. Poor people who could not afford servants lived in small homes with one or two rooms. "Today, we seem to be caught in a trap." Our homes are larger. Furniture, utensils and clothing are more plentiful. But we don't have the servants to do the cleaning. So the weeks before the holiday become filled with cleaning. [www.israelvisit.co.il/top/Clean.htm]

If you are well into your cleaning ritual and haven't budgeted time to read up on the minutiae online, then just have the expert come to you. Aish Hatorah's Rabbi Yitzchak Berkowitz has recorded two 45-minute lectures, Pesach Cleaning Made Easy. He reiterates the common theme that people have created stringencies that are simply not demanded by Jewish law or tradition. [www.613.org/pasclass.html] Meanwhile, Rabbi Gershon Bess of Kehilas Yaakov covers everything from cleaning refrigerators to kashering Tupperware. [http://tinyurl.com/28relw]

If you're feeling overwhelmed cleaning for your army, be thankful you don't have to clean for a real one. Even the Israel Defence Forces goes on alert for the holiday. According to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs website, "the IDF takes no chances, embargoing all packages from home just before and during Passover week in case they contain chametz goodies, thus ensuring that bases will be kept strictly kosher, so both religious and non-religious soldiers can serve shoulder to shoulder during the festival period." [http://tinyurl.com/653tw]

There is no shortage of sites that are designed to alleviate stress as the looming deadline approaches. But to tell you the truth, I wonder whether some well-meaning advice does just the opposite. Take Stephanie Savir's Ten Tips for Reducing Pesach Pressure. The tips themselves are reassuring enough: "While it's nice to have sparking walls … the mitzvah of Pesach cleaning is to remove chametz from our homes – not dust." But it's when you reach the Pesach Calendar that you realize that all hope is lost:

- Seven weeks before Passover: review and copy recipes, buy paper goods and cleaning supplies.
- Six weeks before Passover: buy Yom Tov outfits for family, clean bedrooms.
- Five weeks before Passover: clean basement and cars.
- Four weeks before Passover: begin purchasing Pesach staples; clean and stock a Pesach cabinet in your kitchen… And so on. [http://tinyurl.com/4zgcp]

On the other hand – and with all due respect to Rabbi Shlomo Aviner – can I really, really believe an article titled How to Do Your Pesach Cleaning Happily in Less Than One Day? In it, Rabbi Aviner passes along the basics: how to deal with children's clothing, medicines and toiletries, high chairs, cars and, of course, the kitchen. He concludes, "In light of what is written above, it should take about an hour to clean the house, another hour for the dining room, and two to three hours to kasher the kitchen. In short, about one day!" [http://tinyurl.com/22pwfs]

Perhaps Rabbi Aviner should have a word with Ms Savir.

Israeli government pays for infertility treatment

While prenatal screening has been "largely embraced" by the organized Jewish community in America, Kahn said, there has been much more mixed reaction to screening for "a possible Jewish genetic predisposition" to breast cancer and colon cancer as well as conditions like schizophrenia and bipolar disorder.

Related issues include "ambiguous odds" regarding the possibility of the disease manifesting itself, the possibility of insurance discrimination, and the likelihood of overlooking non-genetic causes, she said.

For those dealing with infertility issues, Kahn said rabbis have been "remarkably lenient" regarding the permissibility of new reproductive technologies like artificial insemination, egg donation and in vitro fertilization, but there has been "much disagreement over the proper interpretive strategies."

A particularly thorny question is whether the egg or the womb determines the Jewishness of the child in the case of egg donation.

One of the ways the issue is being addressed is through a New York program that flies in young, unmarried Jewish women from Israel to donate eggs. Their ovaries are hyperstimulated with hormones and the ova are surgically extracted, Kahn said. The women receive $8,000 (US) in compensation, she added.

Using eggs from unmarried women prevents the halachic complication that the resulting child could be considered a "mamzer" under Jewish law, having been "conceived in a union that if actualized physically, not technologically, would be considered adulterous."

She said that the Israeli government, unlike that of the United States (and Canada), pays for all forms of infertility treatment up to the birth of two live children for all its citizens. The coverage is not limited to married couples, she noted. "There is a huge baby boom among unmarried Israeli women."

Toronto to walk for MS

Toronto will join the fight to end multiple sclerosis at the Super Cities Walk for MS on April 15.

More than 3,000 people are expected to walk for a cure, raise $675,000 and give hope to the estimated 55,000 to 75,000 Canadians who live with multiple sclerosis.

With Canadians facing one of the highest rates of MS in the world, the quest for a cure is important to communities all across the country. For Toronto residents who want to help end this unpredictable, often disabling disease, the walk is a fun and meaningful way to get involved.

Beginning and finishing at Sunnybrook Park, the Super Cities Walk for MS is a family-oriented event that combines fundraising with food, entertainment and prizes. Route lengths range from five to 10 kilometres, and a wheelchair-accessible option is available.

Terri Kernaghan, whose 10-year-old daughter Caitlin has MS, will be participating in her local walk as part of a 25-member team known as "Caitlin's Crusaders."

Although the Kernaghan family deals with the challenge of MS on a daily basis, Terri is optimistic that she will witness the discovery of a cure that will change Caitlin's life and the lives of all those who are affected by MS.

"The MS Society has come so far with research. It's truly amazing. There are also a number of treatments available for MS. And raising funds through events like the Super Cities Walk for MS is important because it keeps the momentum going. I truly believe that a cure is just around the corner."

Funds raised by the walk help provide services including information and referrals, supportive counselling and mobility equipment.

The walk also helps fund the MS Society's national research program.

To register for the Super Cities Walk for MS in Toronto, visit www.supercitieswalk.com or call 1-888-822-8467.

EXTRAORDINARY EVIL

A Brief History of Genocide...and Why it Matters

In her remarkable and timely new book, bestselling author Barbara Coloroso turns her attention to genocide: what it means; where it begins; where it must end. Taking the premise that sibling conflict is to armed conflict is to war as bullying is to hate crime is to genocide... Coloroso explains that it's a short walk to genocide. Based on the author's thirty years of research and extensive travel, Extraordinary Evil is an urgently needed work in an age when acts of genocide seem to occur more frequently and are in the public's consciousness more than ever before.

Community mikvah closes to people converting

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Legal action is being considered to make Mikveh Israel on Kildare Road in Cote St. Luc again available to individuals who are converting to Judaism.

The 26-year-old mikvah, considered the only community mikvah in the city, sent out official notice in February that it could no longer be used for immersion by any convert to Judaism – Orthodox, Conservative or Reform.

Rabbi Itche Meir Gurary, who has managed the mikvah since it was opened, insisted in an interview that the new policy – which he said has actually been in place since last September – was adopted for only one reason: to uphold the standards of absolute cleanliness required for a mikvah to run properly in the face of a significant rising demand.

"It used to be only a few converts a year, but now it's 80," he said. "People also forget that the main use is for women."

Critics, however, believe the decision by Rabbi Gurary, who is a member of the Chabad Lubavitch community, was merely a pretext to keep Conservative and Reform converts out.

Even before the mikvah was closed to converts to Judaism, people converted through the Orthodox stream have had a choice of alternative mikvahs privately run by Orthodox congregations. But Conservative and Reform converts have no such option. There are no mikvahs run by these movements in the city.

> 'Legal action being considered to change policy'

"This is a Chabad-based cabal," Rabbi Lionel Moses of the Conservative Shaare Zion Congregation charged. "This is a community mikvah built with community money, which has been a symbol of co-operation and pluralism across the religious spectrum.

"This co-operation still exists between modern Orthodox and non-Orthodox rabbis, and they have gone to bat for us. This is clearly a move by Chabad to interfere with community harmony."

Rabbi Mordecai Zeitz of Congregation Beth Tikvah in Dollard des Ormeaux believes Mikveh Israel changed its policy because, for over a year, those undergoing Orthodox conversions under the Rabbinical Council of Montreal's beit din had been using another mikvah located at the Sephardi Hechal Shalom Congregation in St. Laurent.

That meant, he said, that most conversion immersions taking place at Mikveh Israel during that period were non-Orthodox.

"That's why we think he did it," Rabbi Zeitz said. "It's created a tremendous obstacle because it should be a community mikvah."

Rabbi Michael Whitman, spiritual leader of Adath Israel-Poale Zedek Congregation, who is president of the Rabbinical Council of Montreal representing the city's Orthodox synagogue rabbis, also was critical of the mikvah's new policy.

"Non-Orthodox converts now have nowhere to go," he said. "It is not a private mikvah. It was built by funds raised by the community."

Rabbi Whitman pointed to a 20-year-old ruling by Rabbi Moshe Feinstein in New York that allowed non-Orthodox converts to use a mikvah built by the community, in the interest of harmony.

"It is a question of continuing the precedent," Rabbi Whitman said. "Many other communities operate in the same way."

Rabbi Gurary, however, dismissed these concerns and rejected any notion of a hidden agenda.

"They overstayed their welcome," he said of the increased use by converts. "If I let them in, I would have to compromise on cleanliness."

He said the new policy began informally during disruptive construction work at the mikvah last fall, and continued because the mikvah was being used for conversions so much that the facilities needed to be thoroughly cleaned and water changed frequently.

"Every time, we had to clean," he said. "We're the biggest mikvah in the city, but we're not the only one in town.

Rabbi Gurary suggested that Conservative congregations could construct their own mikvahs.

Rabbis affiliated with the Rabbinical Council met with Rabbi Gurary but came away with no change in policy.

Rabbi Moses said legal action is among the options now being considered, "because community funds are involved."

Rabbi Sidney Shoham, rabbi emeritus at Congregation Beth Zion, who also helped to establish Mikveh Israel and was involved in forming the Rabbinical Council's conversion beit din, said the mikvah controversy is taking place in a climate of new "frictions."

"In the last 25 years, everything has changed," Rabbi Shoham said. "The trend towards coversions was not the same as today," with the increase in number of both Orthodox and non-Orthodox conversions locally.

Rabbi Shoham recalled that when Mikveh Israel was established, funds were solicited from numerous individuals whose names represented a cross-section of the community, and are all inscribed on an inside wall.

It was very much intended as a community mikvah and accepted as such, he said. Rabbi Gurary was put in charge of it, Rabbi Shoham said, "because it was his bailiwick."

The Vaad Ha'ir of Montreal had no comment on the issue, executive director Rabbi Saul Emanuel said, because it was outside its purview.

"We have not been involved in this issue at all, and only heard through third-party information," he said via e-mail. "We therefore have nothing to add."

Ottawa rabbi sworn in as army chaplain

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

On March 13, Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn stood up in Ottawa, swore allegiance to the queen and smiled for the cameras.

And just like that, the Canadian Forces had its first Jewish chaplain since World War II.

The Florida-born Orthodox rabbi, who is also the leader of Chabad of Centrepointe in west-end Ottawa and Chabad's Canadian representative on Parliament Hill, expressed satisfaction at his new commission as a military officer.

Rabbi Chaim Mendelsohn, the first Orthodox rabbi to serve in the Canadian Forces since the end of World War II, was sworn in during an installation ceremony March 13. Above right is one of the new multifaith badges that reflect the changing face of chaplaincy in the Canadian Forces. [Master Cpl. Jill Cooper, Canadian Forces Chaplaincy branch photo]

Speaking to The CJN from Ottawa last week, Rabbi Mendelsohn called the moment "historic and exciting."

"It felt like we were on the brink of starting something new," he said. "I am now a soldier, just like the rest of my unit. I am no better, no different. I have a role to fill, they have a role to fill… This is the beauty of being sworn in, that now I am really a part of the team. I'm looking forward to having meaningful relationships with members of my unit for many years to come."

Rabbi Mendelsohn, 27, is now the reservist chaplain for Ottawa-based 28 Field Ambulance Unit.

His duties will consist of joining the unit for a few hours weekly on parade and on monthly, weekend trips in the field.

Though he's married and has two children, he fully intends to accompany the unit to foreign theatres of operation if the opportunity arises.

"Being a committed soldier isn't only about when it's comfortable to do so," he said.

According to Rabbi Mendelsohn, it was a challenging process to becoming a chaplain.

At first, he was cautious about entering this commitment, unsure if it was seemly for an Orthodox rabbi to do.

But buoyed by the encouragement of a persistent Chabad member – a retired general in the Canadian Forces who saw in the rabbi qualities well suited for a military chaplain – Rabbi Mendelsohn began making inquiries and worked as a civilian chaplain for a time with different military units across the Ottawa region.

During this period, he was persuaded by military personnel to seriously consider becoming an officer until he finally took the plunge this year.

It's been more than 60 years since the Canadian Forces last had a Jewish chaplain, and Rabbi Mendelsohn said he was aware of the historic significance of his new role.

Although he acknowledged there are very few Jews currently in the Forces, he feels that may change as a result of his decision.

"In the 1940s, there were many Jewish chaplains because there were many Jewish soldiers," he said. "So when it was warranted, the military has provided [Jewish chaplains]. I want to build a team of rabbis to serve all across Canada as chaplains. As rabbis join the military, I think there'll be more Jewish soldiers joining."

Rabbi Mendelsohn said his addition to the Forces shows that the military is serious about providing a "place for every single member within the fabric of Canadian society. Each of them will be welcome, and they will be sensitive to their ethical, moral and religious needs."

For its part, the Forces has assured Rabbi Mendelsohn everything will be done to allow him to serve and observe as an Orthodox Jew.

But the Canadian military's newest, kosher soldier wanted it known that he's not there to push Judaism on his unit.

"I don't see myself as being a 'Jewish Padre' or 'Jewish chaplain.' I see myself as being a spiritual chaplain," Rabbi Mendelsohn said. "There's no question that Judaism is what drives me and shapes my life. At the same time, I'm there to be a moral compass and give spiritual guidance… across every different faith group, for soldiers of all kinds."

Mayor says international media ignoring Sderot

Others are taking various pills and medicines to help them cope.

"We're talking about a lot of problems. We're talking about something that has been studied at Tel Aviv University for the psychological impact on our children.

"One hundred per cent of Sderot children are suffering post-traumatic stress syndrome, which is very bad. This is a story nobody has heard about and we're dealing with it every day."

While the government has not provided the military solution Moyal is advocating, the response from other Israelis has been heartening. Many psychologists and social workers have visited the town to help the people cope. Respite programs have been put in place allowing residents to leave for a brief vacation.

But Moyal is adamant that what is really needed is a military strike to stop the missiles from being launched and to deter further attacks. The past three Israeli governments, two headed by Ariel Sharon and the current Olmert administration, "did nothing to stop these missiles," he said.

"They are wrong in their policy. They think by talking, it will end. They think that by giving land to the Palestinians, it would bring some sheket (quiet). They were wrong."

Moyal pointed out the intensity of the rocket attacks increased after Palestinians were handed all of Gaza. The lesson he learned is plain: "We didn't react properly in the beginning. We didn't ask them to pay a full price for shooting on civilians. We accepted it. That's why it continued."

Asked what the full price should be, Moyal replied, "I don't care. My mitzvah (commandment) is to prevent [those] who are trying to kill me."

Israel "should destroy the places they are shooting from." Palestinians should be warned and then the Israel Defence Force should "destroy the whole area." The IDF should re-enter the Palestinian territory and "clean the Gaza and go back home.

"But we didn't use that [tactic] at the beginning in the right way, that's why they continue."

Moyal, a lawyer by training, acknowledged that adopting those measure would be "complicated, as international opinion [would say], 'you've suffered six years, so what's new?' But these steps need to be taken today."

Palestinians are deliberately targeting civilians. "We are talking about a bunch of murderers. So they should be destroyed."

Moyal, whose Toronto visit was part of a North American trip that lasted a little over one week, said people he has met were interested in Sderot's story, but were not very well informed about the reality of life there.

The international media, he charged, are ignoring Sderot. "They don't like us. They are pro-Palestinian."

When children on either side of the border are killed, "all they report on are the children in Gaza. It's amazing. That's why I came, to tell the story of Sderot."

Moyal presented a public lecture to an audience at Congregation Shaarei Shomayim. He was a guest of the Mizrachi Organization of Canada and Yeshivot Bnei Akiva.

UJA Federation, meanwhile, announced it would raise $500,000 as part of a $1 million cross-Canada campaign of local Jewish federations to support the people of Sderot.

But she said that despite Israel's political and security problems, its economy is strong and growing.

Since the free trade agreement between Canada and Israel was signed 10 years ago, business opportunities between the two countries have doubled, but there is still much room for growth, she said.

"What we are doing in a year with Canada is what we are doing with the United States in a day," Livni said. "The reason I came here today is just to give strength and to encourage… because I heard that this is a new organization."

She added: "Talking about the gap between Israel's image and what we really are is only part of it. We face some problems [with] public opinion… I would like the world to understand what Israel really is and to understand that in the free world, we all share the same values and the same threats."

Ofir Gendelman, a spokesperson for the Israeli Embassy, said Livni's trip was a success.

"The visit went very, very well, and it showed the strong ties between the two countries. It definitely went up a notch," he said.

"The rapport between the two ministers [Livni and MacKay] was very good and very warm. It was a good visit, and we are very pleased. She briefed him about the Palestinian Authority and the Israeli position on the Iranian nuclear program, and she thanked him for Canada's support for Israel."

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, was similarly upbeat.

"We are pleased that this helped advance interest on both sides in creating a deeper strategic relationship across a whole range of shared interests, and we are pretty delighted with the texture of the bilateral relationship, which is probably at its warmest point in memory," Fogel said.

"In May, the two countries will be getting together here in Canada for their annual bilateral consultation, which this year is expected to be more comprehensive than in past years in terms of the issues they will be discussing."

Calls to MacKay's office were not returned, while a spokesperson for Day said he doesn't comment on private meetings.

Jewish Foundation receives $1M gift

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Dan Tallman was there at the beginning.

As one of the founders of Jewish Foundation of Manitoba back in 1964, the retired businessman is well aware of the important role it plays in the community.

"I felt that I wanted to give back to my community and that giving through the Jewish Foundation was the best way to do it," says Tallman, who recently gave $1 million to the cause.

Tallman made his money in construction and building supply. In partnership with his brother, Irvine, he specialized in airport construction.

"Over 20 years, we worked on 62 airports across western and northern Canada," Tallman says. "We built an 11,000 foot runway in Edmonton. At the time, there was only one other runway that long."

The Tallman Brothers' construction company also built hundreds of miles of highway and numerous other projects.

"Our first job was a drive-in theatre," Tallman recalled.

In 1967, at age 50, Tallman sold out.

"We had a hell of a good run, but I was getting tired," he said.

For the past 40 years, he says, he has been following the sun and doing a lot of golfing. He and his second wife, May, spend about half the year in Winnipeg and half down south.

He and his wife are still deciding where to designate the interest from their capital gift. Cancer research is one obvious possibility, since the disease has claimed the lives of both Tallman's son and daughter.

"We were also thinking about doing something for the older element in the city who may be having a difficult time," he said.

Marsha Cowan, the Jewish Foundation's executive director, said 2006 was an excellent year for donations.

"We received $5 million in new money," she said. "That pushes us past the $60-million level. We are presently working on a five-year plan to raise our capital base to $100 million."

She said the foundation was able to distribute $2.5 million last year to organizations in both the Jewish and general communities, as well as to Israeli-based organizations and in scholarships.

"We expect to be able to distribute more this year."

Eighty per cent of the money that the foundation distributes, she points out, is donor-designated. The remainder is given out as grants or scholarships.

"Our raison d'etre is to help our donors realize their philanthropic dreams through endowing what they value and want to see preserved," Cowan said.

That goes for former as well as current members of the Jewish community, she added.

"We are getting a growing response from former Winnipeggers who have fond memories of growing up in this community," she says. "A lot of former Winnipeggers still have parents here and appreciate how well the community is looking after them."

An easy and convenient way for former members of the community to help the foundation and leave a legacy is through its annual Endowment Book of Life program, Cowan said.

The innovative program encourages participants to leave bequests to the foundation and to write their family stories for inclusion in a "Book of Life" memorial, which can be accessed on the foundation's website (www.jewishfoundation.org).

After meeting with his unit's higher-ranking officers, Rabbi Mendelsohn said he was surprised by how much they care about their troops.

"To have a chaplain representing the few [Jewish] soldiers there, is something that expresses the sensitivity that the decision makers in the military have for each and every soldier," he said.

The Forces are eager to have Mendelsohn on board.

Maj. Neil Parker, a Protestant chaplain in the Canadian Forces Chaplaincy Branch, expressed his enthusiasm at Rabbi's Mendelsohn's commission, saying the event further "honoured" his department's commitment to broaden into a fully multifaith chaplaincy.

"A couple of years ago, we added our first imam [and] we changed our branch crests from one Christian [one] to multifaith crests in the last year," Parker said. "[Rabbi Mendelsohn's] got a heart for people. He's aware of the call to be a spiritual leader from his Jewish commitment. I'm a chaplain who's delighted."

Parker, who has conferred with Rabbi Mendelsohn numerous times, joked that the sagest advice he's given to the rabbi is "to make sure he gets into his running program to be fit."

Now that he's in the Forces, Rabbi Mendelsohn believes he's perfectly positioned to practice a fundamental tenet of Judaism: tikkun olam.

"Bringing goodness and kindness to the world is something the Lubavitcher Rebbe really strove for his shiluchim all across the globe," he said. "This is an opportunity for me to reach out to members of other faiths and try to bring goodness and kindness to them. It's a real fulfillment of the [Rebbe's] vision."

Newmarket Jewish school growing by leaps and bounds

By A.M. Segal

When Mark Klady first got involved with Or Hadash Synagogue's religious school in 2000, there were only two teachers and 20 students in a single classroom.

Today, the Newmarket-based school has doubled its student body, requires bigger premises and recently became affiliated with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

"The growth in our community has been incredible," says Klady, principal of the school, which holds weekly supplementary Jewish educational classes for students aged 5-13.

"We have the pleasant problem of needing to rent neighbouring premises to accommodate our students."

As a result of the school's expanding enrolment, Or Hadash has sought the expertise and support of the BJE, both to refine its curriculum and gain access to the same types of resources that other supplementary Jewish schools receive.

Since collaboration with the BJE began, the school's curriculum has gone from being primarily textbook based to the inclusion of history, Torah, Hebrew lessons as well as song and prayer. Dynamic pedagogical approaches are also being used, such as dramatic and visual arts for expressive learning.

"We came into contact with the BJE to assist us in developing a curriculum that is robust and thorough and is better suited for our students," says Klady. "Affiliation also brings us in line with many other synagogues and educational facilities in the GTA, so we can be a part of the same group."

Or Hadash students enjoy Sukkot celebrations on a Newmarket farm.

As part of the affiliation process, Klady participated in various education seminars and events. Or Hadash was assessed by staff members of the BJE.

"They were generally very impressed with what our school is doing and we are now officially and formally affiliated," Klady says.

The school and synagogue cater mostly to residents of northern York Region, stretching from Newmarket and Aurora to Bradford and East Gwillimbury. Or Hadash has 75 member families.

Because students and congregants are widely dispersed and growing in size, Klady says an immediate priority is finding a new site to host classes. As well, the school intends to start educational programs for teens this coming fall.

"A post b'nai mitzvah program will begin this coming September and we hope to be able to offer a great deal more to our teenagers," Klady explains.

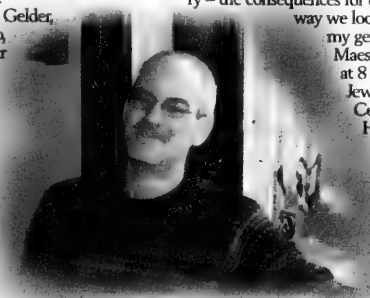
Learn more about Or Hadash online at www.orhadash.org. To reach the school, please call 905-898-2220 or email info@orhadash.org.

CHAT teacher, author Nicholas Maes launches Literary Thursdays

In his first novel, Dead Man's Float, author Nicholas Maes - a teacher at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) - explores the Holocaust in a startlingly unconventional narrative, drawing subtle connections between the horrors of the Shoah and rock n' roll.

The novel's main character, Nathan Gelder, is the child of Holocaust victims who, many years later, seeks to avenge their suffering by targeting a modern day rock star.

"The main character is looking to target the force that was responsible for killing his parents," reveals Maes. "Since Hitler was turned into a pagan god by his people, Nathan is looking for the next pagan god and that's why he pursues the rock star." Maes recognizes the story is vastly different from most Holocaust-related novels, but hopes the audience responds well to this unique approach. "I think the premise of my book is startling and I hope people will be taken with the story," he says.



Nicholas Maes

"This new narrative of the Holocaust is one that builds on the old and tells the story of the Holocaust in the 21st century – the consequences for our culture, our attitudes and the way we look at the world. That's the narrative my generation ought to be telling."

Maes will read excerpts from his book at 8 p.m. on March 29 at the Toronto Jewish Library – part of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage of UJA Federation - situated on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building.

Maes' reading is the first of three scheduled by different authors as part of the library's new Literary Thursday series.

After three years writing the book and five years on the hunt to sell it, Dead Man's Float has been an arduous, time consuming process. But the concerted effort to get it published wasn't surprising to the first-time novelist.

"When you're talking about selling your first novel, it takes a long time and you have to be patient," he says.

He notes that he chose to write about the Holocaust because of his personal interest in the tragic event and the reverberations it continues to have.

Brought up in Montreal, Maes, like the main character, has a Dutch-Jewish mixed background. He developed an early interest in classical languages and several years after moving to Toronto to attend university, he earned a PhD in the field. As well as teaching history at CHAT, Maes has taught at the University of Toronto and the University of Waterloo.

"CHAT is an excellent high school," says Maes, noting all three of his children are in the Jewish day school system. "My students at CHAT are focused, disciplined and very motivated so I can engage them well."

Alongside his commitments at CHAT, Maes teaches classical studies part-time at the University of Waterloo. To find out more about Maes and Dead Man's Float, visit www.nicholasmaes.com

Toronto's Jewish community chosen for Makom

Makom is the Hebrew word for place, a name for G-d, and a now a network committed to renewing the place of Israel in Jewish life. Toronto is fortunate to be one of twelve pilot communities taking part in this new network, working in partnership with the Jewish Agency For Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, to create closer connections with Israel through education, the arts, and travel.

"The whole idea is to infuse Israel into the DNA of all that we do as a community," says Dani Fine, director of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education's NOAR youth division.

Each pilot community is meeting the challenge in a different way. For some, it means focusing on infusing Israel into the school curriculum—from math to science to Jewish studies. For others, the emphasis is on encouraging travel to Israel or using the arts as a portal into deeper and more meaningful discussions on Israel.

"Makom recognizes that each pilot community is unique," says Fine. "Each recognizes its own needs."

The BJE, for instance, is working to make its professional development trips for educators to Israel a deeper experiential opportunity. "We have sent educators from the science and special education fields to spend significant time in the Eilat/Eilot region which is partnered with Toronto," says Fine. "There they build meaningful, long-lasting relationships with their peers in Israel, learn what's going on, and bring it back to the classroom. We will also be using the Makom strategy for significant community outreach."

According to Fine, the fact that Toronto was chosen for this important initiative "speaks volumes" about the community. "Israel is very much part-and-parcel of what our community is," he says. "We're very connected to Israel already."

Makom is infusing Israel into the curriculum of Toronto Jewish schools.

Popularity of Jewish pre-schools is on the rise

By Carla Lancit

Enrolment in Jewish pre-schools rose approximately 10 percent for the 2006-2007 school year. That news, which is heralded by Jewish educators and community leaders, comes from a population survey conducted recently by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

While any increased enrolment in Jewish education is good, educators are particularly encouraged by the fact that more parents are choosing Jewish preschools. "If you enroll a child at age four or five, there's that much more exposure early on," says Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's senior vice president, Jewish education and identity. "It's not only the child, it's the parents. It changes the nature of the household when the child brings those messages back to the home."

The popularity of Jewish preschools is also good news for the future of Jewish education as a whole. "Preschool is a corridor to further Jewish education," says Epstein, who hopes that when the time comes, the parents of these children will opt to continue to enroll them in Jewish schools.

Ora Shulman, an Early Years consultant at the BJE, believes that the increase reflects a new found appreciation of the importance of a sound early Jewish education.

"Research shows that the earlier they come, the greater the impact on Jewish identity," says Shulman. "It empowers parents."

Eynat Katz, a vice principal at Associated Hebrew School, concurs. "Parents are looking for high academic standards—even in a preschool," she says. "As well, those parents want Judaic content. I think parents who in the past have looked at the public system as an education see you can get a solid program and get a Judaic content. That's appealing to them."

Chari Schwartz, Consultant for Supplementary Programs, notes that congregational preschools are a wonderful vehicle into the life of synagogue community involvement. "Early entry points in Jewish education are often seen as the building blocks for life long Jewish learning in congregational settings; Family education, interactive learning, and congregational events meld together to welcome young families and to create meaningful connections."

Leslie Shapiro, principal of Ahavat Yisrael Hebrew School, a supplementary program, is also seeing an increased interest in early years classes. Leslie notes the benefits of starting young children in Jewish education. "Preschool is the springboard to success in Jewish education; it helps build a solid foundation."

While the increase in Jewish pre-school enrolment was the most dramatic finding, the population survey held more good news for Toronto's Jewish educators.

The survey found that Jewish schools are increasing their percentage of the market in both the grade 1-8 and grade 9-12 categories. In the last decade, enrolment at the grade 1-8 level has risen from 32 percent to 38 percent.

"We're capturing more of the students that are out there," says the BJE's Joyce Levine, author of the population survey. "There are more students entering grade 9, and more staying on through high school. Twenty years ago it was considered good if 50 percent of students in grade 1 continued on to high school. Now we're up to over 70 percent."

Levine credits the success of Jewish education in Toronto to the city's broad range of schools. The city boasts 20 day elementary schools, 14 high schools, and more than 40 supplementary schools. "They go right across the spectrum, so people can find a fit here," she says.

Seminars help Toronto teachers enhance Israel education

During a recent workshop, a group of UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) educators was asked to map out a timeline of Israel as a mock history lesson.

While the timelines had their variations, many included Israel's wars and other negative aspects of the country's eventful history.

Rachel Smith, head of the Toronto delegation of the Zionist Seminars, spends time with two students from Bialik Gan Kindergarten.

After much discussion and reflection, revised versions of the timelines included some very different highlights. "We had Israel's Eurovision song winner written down, Olympic medal winners, Nobel Prize winners and even when the first MacDonald's opened in Israel," said Rachel Smith, head of the Toronto delegation of the Zionist Seminars, which facilitated the workshop.

"What we wanted them to see was a picture of Israel that's as complete as possible…so that they can convey that to their students."

Presenting Israel in this kind of dynamic way is a key component of the Zionist Seminars, a program that brings Israelis to Toronto and other places to assist teachers and students in enhancing Zionist education, commitment to Israel and Jewish identity.

While the Zionist Seminars have been held in Toronto for several years, the initiative launched this year is a unique pilot project.

In the past, the seminars involved individual 'one-off' programs with different groups over a period of two weeks. This year, the quartet of facilitators is in Toronto for three months, engaging in a series of workshops with formal and informal educators.

"They're meeting with every group about four to six times over three months so, in addition to developing educational processes, these Israelis are also forming personal relationships with students and teachers," explained Natan Kandler, a representative of the Jewish Agency's education department, which is collaborating with the BJE in this project. The Jewish Agency is UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"It also offers the teachers hands-on tools they can use in their classroom to provide meaningful Jewish education."

There are 36 organizations participating in the seminars, ranging from synagogues and supplementary schools, to youth groups and Jewish day schools. The facilitators are predominantly in their 20s and come from diverse backgrounds.

"Two of them have religious backgrounds, two do not and they have very different political views," said Kandler. "While they don't necessarily share the same ideologies, they work well together, so they represent the diversity of Israeli society in many ways."

"Our goal is to try and provide something different, something that's vibrant and passionate," said Smith. For instance, in one workshop, kindergarten teachers from Bialik Hebrew Day School were shown how to use drama in their classrooms to teach Jewish values. In other seminars, Israeli music was introduced as a creative teaching aid.

"We are bringing in informal methodologies and experiential learning to these classrooms," said Smith. This year's Zionist Seminars wrap up at the end of March.

Saudi rumblings may signal important shift

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Arab League summit, scheduled to be held in Riyadh on March 28 and 29, was the subject of considerable Israeli media attention last week, and it also started to attract western media interest.

The Riyadh summit will reportedly attempt to revive the March 2002 Saudi-led Arab "peace initiative" adopted in Beirut. It calls for an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines and a "just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem to be agreed upon in accordance with UN Resolution 194." In return, the Arab world, reportedly, would normalize relations with Israel.

In 2002, Israel had a major problem with both conditions. First, UN Security Council Resolution 242 (still the only agreed-upon basis for negotiations) does not call upon Israel to return to the precise pre-1967 lines. These were only armistice lines with Egypt and Jordan, not internationally recognized borders. The drafters of Resolution 242 anticipated modifications to these lines (the "Green Line"). And it has generally been assumed that if talks between Israel and its neighbours occur, the lines would be negotiable.

The issue of the Palestinian refugees is more problematic and a potential deal-breaker. The reason: the Arabs insist, and Israel denies, that GA Resolution 194 enshrines a "right of return" of the refugees to Israel. If enacted, this would mean the destruction of Israel as the Jewish state. So instead of "normalizing" relations with Israel, the Arabs would be prescribing the opposite. (The word "right" does not appear in the resolution, and the "right of return" does not exist in international law.)

While Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has recently said that there are positive elements in the Saudi initiative, he has demanded that the condition insisting upon the "right of return" be dropped. The Saudis have reacted angrily to his demand.

In "Why the Arab summit will not accept Israel's demand to modify the 2002 peace plan," the Jerusalem Post (March 4) argued that the Arabs reject Israel's call to abrogate the "right of return" because Arab governments in Syria, Lebanon and Jordan, where about half of the 4.3 million UN-registered Palestinian refugees live, "want the refugees out – and the sooner the better."

Only in Jordan are Palestinian refugees allowed to acquire citizenship, yet they still have second-class status. In Syria and Lebanon, the situation of the refugees is much worse, because they are unable to acquire citizenship, own property and, in most cases, hold jobs.

In Lebanon, refugees are deprived of education and health services. Legally, they have no civil rights and have long been used as pawns in an ongoing propaganda war against Israel.

In the March 15 edition of the Jerusalem Post, Gerald Steinberg wrote that "the basic issues that have fuelled the conflict for decades, such as Palestinian rejectionism and refugee claims seeking to overwhelm the Jewish population of Israel, will not be resolved in a few months or years."

Nonetheless, he writes, the Saudi initiative should not be rejected outright: "Beyond the immediate and shared strategic concerns regarding the growing Iranian influence and hegemonic goals, this channel [the Saudi initiative under an American umbrella] can be used to lower the level of distrust and ignorance." Steinberg concluded: "If Israelis are asked to take the Saudi plan seriously, the promised movement toward normalization must be visible, and not hidden behind closed doors."

Coincidentally, the same day Steinberg's article appeared, an unusual and unexpected letter from the Saudi Arabian ambassador to Canada was published in the National Post.

Responding to an exchange on the Mecca Accord (which outlines a Palestinian "unity government" between Hamas and Fatah), Abulaziz Al-Sowayegh wrote: "What we would like to see is that all concerned parties in this conflict get together and start a similar dialogue based on mutual respect with the aim of settling their differences peacefully. As the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin said before he was assassinated: 'Enough blood and tears. Enough!'"

Seeing a Saudi official publicly acknowledge Israel in this way is unusual, if not unprecedented. And it possibly illustrates the beginning of a fulfilment of what Steinberg urged in his article: "The time is long overdue for Saudi leaders – political and religious – to end support for [anti-Israel] incitement and anti-Semitism."

Editor defends decision to print cartoons

CALGARY — The editor of the Jewish Free Press of Calgary spoke to a group of Muslims last week and defended his decision to publish three controversial Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad.

But Richard Bronstein told a crowd at the Calgary Islamic Centre that while printing the pictures last year was "legally and journalistically correct and permissible" he said he feels "a moral question about whether it was the right thing to do."

He said he did it because some people said he had no right to print the pictures, the Calgary Sun reported.

Bronstein also noted that he printed the drawings alongside anti-Semitic ones from Muslim papers in order to provide context and to show examples of the racism being promoted by Islamist extremists.

The Western Standard magazine and the Free Press were the only two Canadian publications to print any of the pictures, which offended Muslims worldwide after appearing in a Danish paper in 2006.

The Calgary-based Supreme Islamic Council of Canada filed a human rights complaint against the Free Press, but Bronstein said he and its president have since mended fences.

MP brings Harper's congratulations to students

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — MP Joy Smith recently brought congratulations from Prime Minister Stephen Harper to Gray Academy of Jewish Education high school students for their participation in the school's Raoul Wallenberg Day program.

Smith, the MP for the north Winnipeg riding of Kildonan, addressed the students at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on March 5.

As part of the Raoul Wallenberg Day activities, on Jan. 17, the students developed action plans for adopting an African school or village (the emphasis of the day was on human rights abuses in sub-Saharan Africa). They also developed action plans for tackling the Darfur situation (in western Sudan) through education; networking and getting information out through the media; and preparing petitions to be sent to MPs.

One group of students concentrated on an action plan for keeping the public aware of the three Israeli soldiers who are still being held captive by Hamas and Hezbollah by writing letters to the new United Nations secretary general Ban Ki-moon, Canadian political leaders and local newspapers.

"I want you to know that you are making a difference," said Smith. "Students don't often feel that they make a difference. But you are the future leaders of our country."

A former high school math and science teacher, Smith told the students that she visited Israel last summer just before the war with Hezbollah broke out. "Israel is dear to my heart," she said. "I admire the tenacity, the positiveness, the creativity and the industriousness of Israelis."

She recalled that her father, a disabled World War II veteran, told her stories about the Holocaust while she was growing up. "Because my father was sick so much of his life [as a result of war injuries], I learned the meaning of sacrifice as well as the importance of standing up for Canada, Israel and what is right," Smith said.

"And it is the right thing to do to honour Raoul Wallenberg who saved so many Jewish lives," she added.

Smith had taken the students' petitions and letters concerning the kidnapped Israeli soldiers and the situation in Darfur directly to the prime minister and brought with her to the Asper campus a framed photo of herself and the prime minister with the petitions.

"Prime Minister Harper only agrees to pose for photos that he considers important," she said.

Shelley Faintuch, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's community relations person who helped organize the day's activities, praised Gray Academy student council president Yale Shrom and the student volunteers who helped organize the daylong program, which also included students from Balmoral Hall, a private girls school, and South East Collegiate, an aboriginal boarding school in Winnipeg with whom the Gray Academy has had previous joint programs.

"It was the followup activities that counted," Faintuch said. "The students took what they learned and developed action plans."

In total, about 200 students participated in the Raoul Wallenberg Day program.

Waterloo academic wins book award

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Faydra Shapiro, an associate professor in religion and culture at Wilfrid Laurier University in Waterloo, is also an observant Jewish woman.

Shapiro, now 37, would never have predicted that lifestyle for herself. But the road that led her there – step-by-step and deliberately thought out over a lengthy period of time and reflection – was paved 15 years ago when she took part in a three-month Jewish experience program in Israel.

In early March, Shapiro went to New York from Jerusalem – where she is spending a year on sabbatical with her husband and four children – to receive the National Jewish Book Award in the Education and Jewish Identity category, for her book resulting from that experience, Building Jewish Roots: the Israel Experience (McGill-Queens University Press 2006).

"I was shocked, absolutely," she said in an interview from Israel. "I was really so honoured."

The book is a work of scholarship and a reworking of a PhD dissertation Shapiro had completed at McMaster University in Hamilton. It recounts her experience in a Jewish experience program called Livnot U'Lehibanot, To Build and To Be Built.

More importantly, she suggested, her book points to the value Jewish experience programs can have in "increasing openness and the desire to learn more about one's Jewish identity.

"If we see Jewish experience programs as something to fight assimilation, then we are seeing it in the wrong way," Shapiro said.

"The goal has to be to give [participants] the tools that build a Judaism that works for them, to have tools to make informed choices."

In that context, Shapiro refuses to judge the "Jewishness" of others, regardless of her own level of observance, and acknowledges that in certain Orthodox circles, her take on Jewish identity would be seen as heretical.

But Shapiro said her only interest is to have her fellow Jews make informed choices about how they want to live.

"How do you define assimilation anyway?" she asks rhetorically. "It's in the eye of the beholder. I believe informed assimilation is better than uninformed assimilation. What is sad to see are Jews who are rejecting something they've never even looked at."

Shapiro travelled to Israel four times in connection with Livnot U'Lehibanot – the first time in 1992 as a participant, in 1993 as a madrichah, and in 1996 and 1997 while conducting fieldwork research for her thesis.

For the thesis and the book, she conducted more than 100 extensive interviews of current and past participants, academics and other experts in Israel and North America.

The point, she said, was that Livnot succeeded absolutely in breaking down stereotypes about Orthodoxy and observant Judaism while allowing participants to acquire the tools to decide for themselves.

In Shapiro's case, the Livnot experience made her more open to learning more about her heritage, but it was far from a quick turnaround or transformation.

"What is enough time? Two days, two weeks, two years?

"In my own case, I don't think there was any one thing thing [that made me more observant]. But I love to learn and study and I came to love Judaism."

Shapiro, who returns to Wilfrid Laurier this summer, is not certain she is more "enlightened" now because of her level of religious observance, but she has found some of her colleagues in academe "perplexed" by it.

"It's like, 'How could you?' But if you're making a choice and as a feminist, you feel you have the right to choose, how can you then tell me I can't choose?"

L.A. talk show host speaks to Jewish youth

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

No subject was off limits for American talk show host Dennis Prager when he came to Toronto last week to speak about everything from intermarriage and the spirit of Shabbat to self-loathing Jews and pot-smoking losers.

Prager, who has been working in radio in Los Angeles since 1982 and is the author of Happiness is a Serious Problem, and The Nine Questions People Ask About Judaism, took part in an intimate question-and-answer session on March 12 with about two dozen people at The House – a second-story venue on Eglinton Avenue west of Avenue Road that offers programming and a place to hang out for young Jews from all backgrounds.

The night before, Prager addressed some 500 people at an event sponsored by The House at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation about "Winning the Battle Against Losing Young Jews." David Koschitsky, vice-chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Rabbi Rafi Lipner, director of The House, introduced Prager with a few words about the positive effect The House has had on the young Jews in the city since it was established in 2003.

In what was more like a conversation than a lecture, Prager drew on his own experiences as an observant Jewish man to answer questions on what it is to be a Jew in North America today.

He said that when it comes to being an observant Jew, he is more strict in the moral arena than he is in the ritual arena.

Prager, who observes Shabbat but drives to shul, hopes that non-observant Jews might follow his lead.

"I advocate to the 90 per cent of Jewry that does drive on Shabbat that they keep Shabbat in their car. There are two types of Jews who find this hilarious: Orthodox [Jews] and non-Orthodox[Jews]… Once Jews try it, they stop laughing at me because it, in fact, works," Prager said.

"When you don't turn on the radio, you preserve the spirit of Shabbat that you had in shul and people are stunned by how effective it is. It is not the car that kills the spirit of Shabbat. What kills the spirit of Shabbat is the radio," said Prager, who added that he only drives to go to events related to Shabbat.

Dennis Prager

"I have come to the understanding that if we do not provide a vehicle for the non-Orthodox Jew to be religious, then we are doomed. As much as anyone might hope for, most Jews will never be Orthodox… I'm not trying to talk Orthodox Jews into driving, I'm trying to talk non-Orthodox Jews into keeping Shabbat while they drive."

When the conversation veered into the temptations that students face when they head off to university – such as sex, drugs and alcohol – Prager expressed his "deep contempt" for pot smokers.

"Pot smoking is a statement that you are incapable of getting high on life and that is the definition of a loser. If you don't find people exciting enough, love exciting enough, music exciting enough, travel exciting enough, books exciting enough, that you have to waste your time on pot, you're a loser," Prager said.

In an effort to quell a mother's concern about sending her child to university where he or she might be exposed to peer pressure and anti-Israel or anti-Semitic sentiments, Prager suggested that all students take a year off between high school and university, because the experience will make them less impressionable.

"You can't be indoctrinated in college if you are an adult. To go from kindergarten to graduate school without leaving school is to be a perpetually immature human being. That's why so many professors are immature and unwise, because they never left the cocoon of school. They are scared of life," Prager said.

"I want people to leave after high school and be a waiter or a waitress, travel, do almost anything, for a year, to touch life, and then they are far less likely to be indoctrinated at college."

While attempting to tackle the question of why there are Jewish people who side with campus groups who vilify Israel and Jewish groups on campus, he suggested that Jews, as a group, are not healthy psychologically.

"When you are the most hated people in history, when the most advanced society on earth took six million of you, rounded you up, threw you into cattle cars and gas chambers and medical experiment buildings, you don't leave that experience completely intact," Prager said.

"One of the ways in which the psychopathology expresses itself, in my opinion, is to take on the identity of the enemy. It's called the Stockholm Syndrome… If I identify with my captors, then I will not be hated.

"There was not a single black human being on earth who sided with the apartheid government of South Africa. Not one. And if he had, he would've been considered pathological. But if Noam Chomsky sides with Hezbollah and writes a foreword to a book that denies the Holocaust, he is still venerated by many Jews as a brilliant mind," Prager said.

While the subject of conversation jumped from topic to topic, the message that Prager kept coming back to was the importance of being a good Jew and a good human being, and he emphasized the significance of making Judaism a priority.

He suggested that one of the reasons why intermarriage is on the rise and why it's one of the biggest problems facing the Jewish community is because people fail to make Judaism a priority.

"Intermarriage is a symptom, not a cause of our problems… Obviously they didn't get that deep sense of Judaism being important and that's why they intermarried. People marry someone who converts to or was born a Jew out of the conviction that they want to make a Jewish home with that person. But if you don't want to make a Jewish home, then what is the difference who you marry? We have to work on making Judaism important, not fighting intermarriage."

Religious scholars discuss texts

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Three religious scholars gathered last week to discuss problematic texts in the Christian Bible, the Torah and the Qur'an that promote religious intolerance.

Reid Locklin, the associate professor in the Christianity and culture program at St. Michael's College, James Diamond, the chair of the Jewish studies program at the University of Waterloo and Imam Abdul Hai Patel, the co-ordinator for the Islamic Council of Imams-Canada each spoke about the importance of reinterpreting certain passages in religious texts and understanding their historical context to create better interfaith relations.

Rev. Karen Hamilton, the general secretary for the Canadian Council of Churches, was the moderator of the event titled "Do Our Sacred Texts Create Religious Intolerance?" that took place on March 14 at St. Michael's College, at the University of Toronto.

The event, which was sponsored by the Canadian Christian-Jewish Dialogue, the Canadian Council of Churches and Canadian Jewish Congress, was attended by more than 100 people.

Diamond, a specialist on the philosopher Moses Maimonides and on Jewish biblical interpretation during the medieval period, said with many of the problematic texts in the Old Testament, "I can take them or leave them."

"One who knows Judaism knows that Judaism is, in some texts, a religion of law, not a religion of dogma," he said.

"Any serious minded Jew concerned about the world, can easily dismiss [problematic] texts as not authoritative, non-binding, or simply the expression of one single opinion as opposed to many opinions; one voice in a cacophony of voices, for those of you who have ever been exposed to a page in the Talmud."

But there are certain verses that are more difficult than others to reinterpret or ignore.

For instance, when it comes to civil law, property laws, or theft, "the Jewish law has a different set of criteria vis a vis Jews than it does vis a vis members of other religions."

He said that one suggestion that was made by rabbis who wanted to reinterpret these laws, was that "when one comes across the term 'goy,' that is in normative contexts, it refers to the idolatrous nations of old… It no longer refers to… religious communities that value their respective members."

He said that this interpretation allows for Jews to do business with people of other value-based faiths.

"The old ancient idolaters who sacrificed their children and had no respect for law, the Jews could not do business with."

Locklin, a chairperson for an ongoing Jewish, Christian and Muslim dialogue group, suggested that although there are specific Christian scriptures that point to religious intolerance against Jews, if the historical context is understood, they don't necessarily need to create religious intolerance.

"One thing that has to happen is that the Christian community needs to recognize that these texts don't come from nowhere, that these texts come from a particular historical context and [we have to] find a way to recognize those contexts, not only acknowledge [them], by preaching and teaching," Locklin said.

He said that one of the reasons scriptures create religious intolerance is because they are misappropriated.

Texts such as "His blood be on us and be on our children," from the Gospel of Matthew are one of the texts that need to be reinterpreted and even read in the presence of Jews to discuss it, he said.

Patel, a member of the Ontario Multifaith Council on Spiritual and Religious Care, said that the verses in the Qur'an that are viewed as being intolerant are also taken out of context and misinterpreted.

"Islam is generally regarded as being anything but tolerant… this is a result of misinterpretation and misunderstanding… and evidence from the practice of misguided rulers and Muslims in our history and in the world today," Patel said.

He said that passages that are related to war, or jihad, are "perceived to be promoting violence against people," but are misinterpreted because the circumstances of the time are not being taken into account.

But Diamond said that the only way our traditions can deal with the problem of perceived religious intolerance is to admit that there are problematic texts and not to paper over them.

"We have to expose our own texts and not apologize for them. We have to expose them and reinterpret them literally out of existence."

Caterer prepares seder meal for mental health facility

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

The most unusual Passover celebration in my corner of the world is not some lavish soirée at a hilltop estate, but the yearly seders at Metropolitan State Hospital, the mental health-care and treatment facility in Norwalk, Calif.

"It has been a very meaningful experience for me, something I really look forward to doing," said caterer Greg Weitzman, who has been providing the food for the seder for the last six years. Two separate seders are offered at Metropolitan's dual facilities, which serve both the criminally insane and the civilly committed under the Lanterman-Petris-Short Act.

Rabbi Haim Asa, rabbi emeritus of my synagogue, Temple Beth Tikvah, and chaplain for the facility, presides over the lunchtime ceremonies in the two cafeterias with approximately 100 patients in attendance, only half of whom are Jewish. A few Jewish staff members attend as well.

"A lot of people go because it's something to do," said Weitzman, "but many of them are really interested. Some of the patients are more able to participate than others. Some help me set up and serve. Over the years, I've formed a relationship with a few of them. There's this one guy who greets me, 'Hey, Greg, how ya' doing, man?' and gives me a big hug. The business part of it aside, it's one of the most important things I do all year."

Last year caught Weitzman literally with his pants down. "I had forgotten that we're not allowed to wear khaki pants, because that's what the patients in the lockdown facility wear, and I arrived in khakis. They wouldn't let me in. Rabbi Asa ran out to the store on the premises and bought me a pair of stiff blue jeans that were about a foot and a half too long, and I had to pin them up."

During the service Rabbi Asa explains the symbols of Passover. "First we give them individual plates, served like a salad, with gefilte fish, an egg, charoset, parsley and matzah," Weitzman said "We serve grape juice instead of wine for the ceremony. Then we give them a nice lunch."

Matzah ball soup is followed by the main course of brisket with carrots, tomatoes and sliced onions.

"I got the recipe from a friend who made it for Chanukah one year," Weitzman recalled. "I thought the brisket was the best I'd ever had. I love tomatoes slowly cooking with meat. After a few hours, it gives a rich, rich flavour, like osso buco." Seasoned green beans and roasted potatoes accompany the dish, followed by macaroons.

Much of the food is subsidized, explained Rabbi Asa, who serves as chaplain at two other local institutions in addition to Metropolitan: Patton State Hospital and Fairview State Hospital.

"The Board of Rabbis has a Pesach fund for certain institutions," he said. "A lot of their budget is for tzedakah, and they buy the gefilte fish, matzah, soup and macaroons from the Kosher Club in Los Angeles at greatly reduced prices. I don't think they make anything on it."

In addition to performing the seders, Rabbi Asa works full time, alternating between the facilities. "Many of the patients want to learn about Judaism," he said. "I hold classes and teach them about the holidays. Last year, I added the California Institute for Women in Chino where I volunteer. I see about 25 women once a month. They've even published their own Haggadah."

Congregant Lou Ann Taback recently took special training and now accompanies Rabbi Asa on his visits to the women's prison. "The women really love Haim," she said. "It's a compassionate service that he performs as a volunteer. He always takes bagels and cream cheese. At Chanukah we lit the menorah, played dreidel and shared stories. I felt it was very worthwhile, and I enjoy interacting with these women. I share with them Jewish music, Jewish content. They just crave having someone there, and it gives them a place to be that's different."

While most of the food is donated for the Metropolitan seders, which understandably operate on a budget, Weitzman pulls out all the stops for the seder he caters for our synagogue. While the menu hadn't been decided by print time, he always features his homemade chicken soup with matzah balls. Last year's roasted vegetables with balsamic vinegar were a big hit.

"What makes them beautiful," he said, "is placing the vegetables separately on a platter with the different colours raised in bunches."

Some years Weitzman has served homemade Citrus Sponge Cake with Strawberries for dessert. He says that Apple, Rhubarb and Sour Cherry Cobbler is a strong contender this year.

ROASTED VEGETABLES WITH BALSAMIC VINEGAR

2 medium eggplants, unpeeled, sliced into ¼-in. rounds
2 tsp. salt (divided)
1 cup extra-virgin olive oil
⅓ cup balsamic vinegar
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1½ lb. zucchini, sliced into ¼-in. rounds
3 large red onions, sliced into ¼-in. rounds
2 medium red bell peppers, cored, seeded and chopped
2 medium yellow bell peppers, cored, seeded and chopped
6 large heads Belgian endive, cored, halved, and quartered
4 sprigs fresh basil, for garnish

Arrange eggplant rounds on paper-towel lined baking sheets and sprinkle with 1 teaspoon salt. Set aside for 30 minutes. Pat dry.

Preheat the oven to 450. Whisk together olive oil, vinegar, remaining 1 tsp. salt and pepper. Set aside.

Divide eggplant, zucchini, red onions, peppers and endive between two large baking pans with sides. Gently toss vegetables with ¾ of oil mixture. Roast vegetables on bottom and middle racks 10 minutes. Turn and rotate pans and roast 5 to 10 minutes more until tender but still crisp.

Arrange vegetables on platters. Sprinkle with salt and pepper, and drizzle with remaining oil mixture. Serve at room temperature. Serves 12.

APPLE, RHUBARB AND SOUR CHERRY PASSOVER COBBLER

Topping:
1 cup matzah meal
½ cup potato starch
½ cup (packed) Passover brown sugar
¼ tsp. salt
dash of ground cinnamon
½ cup chilled butter or nondairy margarine, cut into small pieces
2 tbsp. fresh orange juice

Filling:
5 cups sliced, peeled McIntosh apples (about 1¾ lb.)
1 cup chopped frozen rhubarb, thawed
⅔ cup sugar
½ cup canned, pitted and drained sour cherries
¼ cup fresh orange juice
2 tbsp. potato starch
½ tsp. ground cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Coat an 11 x 7-in. baking dish with vegetable cooking spray.

To prepare topping, spoon matzah meal into a dry measuring cup; level with a knife. Whisk together matzah meal, potato starch, brown sugar, salt and cinnamon. Cut in butter with a pastry blender or 2 knives until mixture resembles coarse meal. Add 2 tbsp. orange juice and stir just until moist.

To prepare filling, combine all ingredients and toss gently. Press 1½ cups matzah meal mixture in the bottom of the prepared pan. Spoon filling over crust and top evenly with remaining matzah meal mixture. Bake for 45 minutes or until filling is bubbly and crust is lightly browned. Let stand 10 minutes before serving. Serves 10.

A glorious Passover menu

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Chef and cookbook author Daphna Rabinovitch has sent along the following seder menu:

Chicken soup with fresh coriander-scented matzah balls

Moroccan short ribs **
Matzah kugel
Peas with caramelized onions and mint (for Sephardim) or vegetable of your choice
Green salad with dried cranberries and toasted pistachios
Chocolate clouds with fresh strawberries **
( denotes included recipe)

MOROCCAN BEEF SHORT RIBS

Be sure to buy thick beef short ribs (flanken) and not the thinner Miami ribs for this toothsome, flavourful main course.

2 tbsp. ground ginger
1 tbsp. each ground cumin and salt
1 tbsp. finely grated lemon rind
2 tsp. each ground coriander, turmeric and black pepper
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. cayenne pepper
8 beef short ribs (about 6 lbs.)
3 tbsp. olive oil
1 onion, finely chopped
4 cloves garlic, minced
1 cup kosher for Passover dry red wine
1 1/2 cups each beef and chicken broth
3 tbsp. tomato paste
1 lemon, sliced
2 tbsp. honey

In very large bowl, mix together ginger, cumin, salt, lemon rind, coriander, turmeric, pepper, cinnamon and cayenne. Add ribs, turning to coat all over. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for at least 1 hour or up to 8 hours.

In large Dutch oven or heavy-bottomed skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. In batches, brown ribs well on all sides. Transfer from pan to large roasting pan, making sure they fit in one layer. Stir in onion and garlic; cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until softened. Pour in wine; bring to boil. Boil for 5 to 10 minutes or until reduced by half. Pour in chicken and beef stock, tomato paste and lemon slices. Bring to boil. Pour over ribs.

Roast ribs in centre of preheated 350 oven for 2 1/2 hours to 3 hours or until extremely tender, checking to make sure there is enough liquid around ribs. If necessary, add some chicken stock or water.

Using slotted spoon, transfer ribs to warmed platter; tent with foil to keep warm. Discard lemon slices. Pour liquid into saucepan; stir in honey. Bring to a boil; boil for 10 to 15 minutes or until lightly thickened. Pour over ribs to serve. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

PEAS WITH ONIONS AND MINT

With spring around the corner, this lively and refreshing side dish serves as a harbinger of the warmer days about to arrive.

3 tbsp. olive oil
2 onions, sliced into rounds
4 cups frozen petite peas
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. granulated sugar
2 tbsp. chopped fresh mint

Heat oil in skillet set over medium heat. Add onions; cook, stirring, for 5 minutes. Reduce heat to low and cook, stirring occasionally for about 20 minutes or until golden. Stir in peas, salt and sugar. Pour in 1 cup water. Bring to boil. Cover, reduce heat slightly and cook for 5 minutes. Uncover and cook for 2 to 3 minutes longer or until all liquid is evaporated. Stir in mint. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

To enjoy Passover, we need to be organized, chef says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Being organized is the key to fuss-free Passover preparations, says Nancy Weisbrod, a trained chef who teaches cooking classes at the Yetta Nashman Jewish Family Institute in Toronto.

"I used to prepare for Passover with a sense of anxiety, but I've learned to involve the family" – she has four sons and a daughter – "make lists, and take some shortcuts," she says.

Top among her shortcuts is purchasing already peeled carrots and potatoes from Nu-Way Potatoes. "This takes away from the strain of standing at the sink and peeling pounds and pounds of vegetables. It's a wonderful time saver.

"You also have to keep notes – recipes, shopping lists, tips – you may think you remember everything, but there is always something you forget. This way it's all there."

A Toronto native who studied at Le Cordon Bleu Culinary Institute in London, England, Weisbrod says that if we are organized, "we have the time to prepare ourselves not only physically, but emotionally and spiritually as well. It's hard to focus on that if we are run ragged."

Whatever she cooks, she says, she cooks "double or triple so we'll have leftovers" – although she never calls them leftovers – "all week. For the seder, I'll marinate chicken in olive oil, lemon juice, salt and pepper, cinnamon and ginger, parsley or basil, and grill it on my stove top-grill. The next day, I'll slice it thinly and serve it for lunch on top of salad greens. It's the same chicken but a different meal."

"Layering" food lends a little bit of creativity to the meal, she says. "I layer chicken with grilled vegetables or quinoa. It looks good, and is light and healthy."

Cooking is a pleasure, she says, "if you think about the people that will eat the meal. Food can be a bonding experience, if it's a success, or even if it's a flop. Families can get a good laugh over a flop."

Weisbrod offers the following recipes:

CRUMBED HALIBUT

2 lb. halibut cut into 4-oz. portions
1 cup matzah meal
1 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. pepper
1/2 tsp. paprika
1/2 tsp. garlic powder

Season crumbs with spices. Dredge halibut pieces in the crumbs. Bake on a parchment-lined baking sheet in a 400-degree oven for 20 minutes. Serve with mayonnaise mixed with a little horseradish and a wedge of lemon.

ROASTED QUINOA WITH FRUIT

2 cups quinoa
2 1/3 cups water
1 cup orange juice
1 tsp. salt
1 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. olive oil
freshly ground pepper
dried fruit such as chopped apricot, dried apple and pear, dried cranberries, raisins, etc.
2 tbsp. chopped nuts

A sweet ending to the meal

CHOCOLATE CLOUDS WITH FRESH STRAWBERRIES

A perfect, sweet but light ending to a rich and satisfying meal. Other berries can be substituted such as raspberries or a combination of strawberries and raspberries. For an extra sweet hit, make a simple sugar syrup by combining equal parts water and sugar and boiling gently until the sugar has dissolved. Cool slightly and then pour enough over the berries to lightly coat and warm. Omit the 2 tablespoons of sugar called for. Or simply whip up some non-dairy topping and spoon it on the meringue before the berries.

4 large egg whites (1/2 cup) pinch salt
1 cup granulated sugar
1/4 cup unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
4 cups strawberries, hulled and halved
2 tbsp. granulated sugar

In clean bowl, beat egg whites with salt until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar, beating until stiff but shiny peaks form. Fold in cocoa powder.

Using heaping 1/3 cup of meringue for each, spoon 8 mounds onto parchment-paper-lined baking sheet. Using small spoon, lightly press down and swirl centre of each to spread out slightly and create a slight indentation in each.

Bake in centre of preheated 200 degree oven for about 2 hours or until crisp on the outside and slightly soft in the centre. Turn off oven and cool meringues in turned off oven for 1 hour. (Meringues can be stored in airtight container at room temperature for up to 2 days).

To serve, mash strawberries lightly with sugar. Serve on top of clouds. Makes 8 servings.

Leftovers can make life easier

Preheat oven to 375. Rinse quinoa very well (two changes of water may be needed). Spread in a large (9 x 13) pyrex baking dish. Add water and orange juice, salt, pepper, honey and olive oil. Roast in oven for 20-30 minutes.

Stir once and then roast for a further 15 minutes, so that all the liquid is absorbed and the grain in the corners of the baking dish is a little crusty. Spread in serving dish and garnish with fruit and nuts or seeds.

Alternatively, you can cook the dried fruit for the last 15 minutes with the quinoa, so that the fruit plumps up a bit and takes on that roasted look. Serves 8.

This dish can be served hot or at room temperature, or can be mixed with a little vinaigrette and served as a salad the next day. It can also be served as a breakfast cereal mixed with a little brown sugar, milk, yogurt, stewed rhubarb or compote.

CHICKEN WITH SUNDRIED TOMATOES AND PINENUTS

for Sephardim

2 chickens cut in eighths
2-3 tbsp. olive oil
juice of 1 lemon
6-8 garlic cloves
fresh flat-leaf parsley (optional) washed and checked thoroughly kosher salt, pepper
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. powdered ginger
½ cup sun dried tomatoes, sliced lengthwise in quarters
½ cup pine nuts toasted

Marinate the chicken in olive oil, lemon juice and spices for a few hours or overnight. Add tomatoes. Cover with parchment paper and tin foil and bake in a 350-degree oven for 45 minutes. Remove cover, baste and continue baking for another 15 minutes so that chicken browns. Serve garnished with pinenuts.

Holiday recipes from COR

For more than half a century, the Kashruth Council of Canada with the COR symbol has served the needs of kosher consumers and food processors across Canada and beyond.

The Kashruth Council is a non-profit community organization that provides education programs for the community. In addition to reading the published COR KosherPages, many consumers visit the COR website (www.cor.ca) for up-to-date information on products, services and kashrut questions.

For the major holidays, the council prepares information that is sent to thousands of households. If you wish to be placed on its mailing list, call 416-635-9550, fax 416-635-8760, or write to 4600 Bathurst St., Suite 240, Toronto, Ont., M2R 3V2.

Here are some of this year's COR recipes for Passover, reflecting both Ashkenazi and Sephardi dishes.

BAKED SQUASH IN TOMATO SAUCE

This dish is a favourite of Jews living in Northern Italy.

4 tbsp. olive or vegetable oil
3 lb. squash, peeled and sliced
1 onion, chopped
4 garlic cloves, chopped large can chopped tomatoes pinch of sugar
2 tbsp. dried parsley
salt and pepper, to taste

STRAWBERRY SORBET: as seen in Enlitened Kosher Cooking by Nechama Cohen, Feldheim publishers.

Preheat oven to 325. Heat olive oil in a pan and fry the squash slices in batches until golden brown. Remove them from the pan. Set aside.

In the same pan, add onion and fry for about 5 minutes until softened. Add more oil if needed. Add the garlic and cook for 1 minute. Add the tomatoes and sugar and cook over a medium to high heat until the mixture is of a sauce consistency. Stir in the dried parsley and season to taste with salt and pepper. Layer the slices of squash with sauce in a baking dish, ending with sauce. Bake for 35 to 40 minutes or until the top is slightly glazed and beginning to brown and the squash is tender. Serves 8.

LEMON CHIFFON NO-BAKE CAKE

1 cup sugar
3 lemons, grated rind and juice
3 tbsp. potato starch
2 cups cold water

Remove from the heat. Dilute potato starch in ½ cup water until blended. Add to the lemon mixture with remaining 1½ cups water. Cook, stirring constantly until thick, about 5 to 7 minutes. Cool.

Beat egg whites with ¼ cup sugar and 1 tsp. lemon juice. Fold the cooled lemon mixture into whites. Line a spring form pan, sides and bottom, with slices of jelly roll or lady fingers. Pour in lemon mixture. Refrigerate overnight.

Çan be topped with chocolate curls.

Preheat oven to 350. Combine cinnamon, sugar and matzah meal. Add raisins and apple. Stir lightly to coat the raisins and apple. Combine vegetables and add them with the lemon juice and grated lemon rind. Pinch of salt is optional. Mix well. Heat the oil in a casserole or baking dish and add the mixture into the greased casserole or baking dish. Bake for 1 hour or until pudding is firm in the centre and slightly browned. Serves 8.

Heat oil in a large skillet over medium to high heat. Add the onion and saute until soft and slightly browned. Add meat and saute until the meat loses its colour. Remove from heat and stir in the eggs and dried parsley. Season with salt and pepper.

Dough
5 medium potatoes
1/4 cup matzah meal
1 large egg, lightly beaten
pinch of salt

Place the unpeeled potatoes in a large pot. Add water to cover and boil until potatoes are tender, about 30 minutes. While still warm, peel and mash. Combine with the remaining dough ingredients.

Assembly

Moisten your hands with water to avoid sticking. Form the dough into 1 1/2-in. balls. Poke finger into the middle of each ball to form a large cavity. Fill the cavity with about 1 tbsp. of meat mixture. Press the edges of the dough together concealing the filling and form round or oval shaped balls. These can be refrigerated for several hours.

Heat about 2 to 3 in. of oil in a heavy skillet over a medium high heat. Place balls into oil and fry until golden brown on all sides. Drain on paper towels.

EGG DROP SOUP: as seen in Enlitened Kosher Cooking by Nechama Cohen, Feldheim publishers.

APPLE MATZAH KUGEL

4 matzahs
water
8 eggs, separated
1/2 cup sugar
pinch of salt
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
3 tbsp. margarine
4 tart apples, sliced thinly
1/4 cup nuts, chopped
1 lemon rind, grated

Preheat oven to 350. Soak the matzahs in cold water to cover. Drain off the water. Beat egg yolks until light. Add sugar, pinch of salt and cinnamon. Stir in the soaked matzahs. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites and turn half the mixture into a heated casserole or baking dish well greased with margarine. Arrange the thinly sliced apples evenly.

Sprinkle with nuts and grated lemon rind. Cover with the rest of the matzah mixture. Dot with any remaining margarine. Sprinkle with more cinnamon and sugar and bake for 45 minutes or until nicely browned.

Note: You can use dried fruit in place of apples. Serve with applesauce or fresh fruit. Serves 8-10

PASSOVER VEAL AND VEGETABLE MEATLOAF

Topping
1/4 cup brown sugar
2 tbsp. kosher red wine or wine vinegar
6 tbsp. ketchup

Filling
1/4 cup oil
2 stalks celery, chopped
3 onions, chopped
2 cloves of garlic, minced
1 package frozen chopped spinach, thawed
1 cup mushrooms, sliced or 1 can drained.
2 tbsp. dried parsley, chopped
2 lb. ground veal
1 cup matzah meal
2 eggs
pepper to taste

Preheat oven to 375. In a small bowl, mix together the brown sugar, ketchup and red wine or wine vinegar. Set aside.

In a large frying pan, heat oil, add celery, onions, garlic, spinach, mushrooms and dried parsley. Saute until soft and set aside. In a large bowl, place veal, matzah meal, eggs and pepper and combine well.

Add the vegetables to the meat mixture and form a meatloaf shape. Transfer to a greased loaf pan and spread on the topping. Bake uncovered for 1 1/2 hours. This recipe also adapts well to individual patties – then spread on topping. Serves 8.

Cookbook author shares Passover designer dishes

By NORENE GILLETZ

Susie Fishbein certainly knows how to create a designer menu that will wow your seder guests. This best-selling author is truly the queen of creative kosher cuisine. She loves to use the best ingredients available, creating simple, innovative dishes that are not only beautiful to look at, but will please the palate.

Last spring, I attended Fishbein's cooking demonstration in Toronto for 400 people, a fundraiser for National Council of Synagogue Youth, and was very impressed with her warm ways and communicative skills, demonstrating new twists on old traditions. Fishbein recently gave a cooking demonstration for a more intimate group of about 60 women at the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto congregation in Thornhill, but unfortunately I was unable to attend.

When I phoned Fishbein to find out her plans for Passover, we also spoke about her recent cooking demonstration. Fishbein told me she finds the women here do much more cooking and are more interested in healthful cooking than those who make up her American audiences.

The talk then turned to Passover preparations. Fishbein and her family spend Pesach at her parents' home in Boynton Beach, Fla. Her cousins and aunts come to their family seders – this year there will be about 30 people.

Fishbein told me they never want to limit the crowd, so they use disposable dishes and keep the doors open! The tables will run end-to-end, from one end of the house to the other.

Susie Fishbein

Her Grandma Molly is usually standing at the stove as everyone arrives, making chremsel (pancakes), at least 100 or more, so everyone can have some to eat as they walk in through the door.

Her mom, Linda Spector, is big on quantity. She makes chicken soup, homemade egg noodles for the first night, wonderful chopped liver or perhaps gefilte fish. On the second night, they serve chicken soup with tri-colour matzah balls from Fishbein's book, Kosher by Design. They often serve turkey that is simply prepared, with long, slow cooking, nice spices and a simple sauce.

Since she says you are not supposed to roast for the first seder, Fishbein will probably prepare Balsamic Braised Brisket (Kosher by Design Entertains). Favourite side dishes are Meichel and Tsimmis Souffle (Kosher by Design) – see below for recipes.

From Susie Fishbein's kitchen to yours, here is one of her favourite meichels from some of her cookbooks to add flair and flavour to your Passover table! These designer dishes are sure to be passed around and enjoyed.

MEICHEL

1 (1-lb.) box matzah farfel
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 tbsp. margarine
1 large onion, finely chopped
1 (10-oz.) box sliced mushrooms
1 (10-oz.) can condensed chicken soup, undiluted
salt
freshly ground black pepper

Place the matzah farfel in a large bowl. Cover with boiling water and let soften for 3 minutes. (Do not let it sit any longer or the end result will be mushy.) Drain the water; set aside.

In a large skillet, heat the oil and margarine over medium heat. Add the onion and saute for 6 to 8 minutes or until it begins to turn golden. Add the mushrooms and sauté 3 to 4 minutes longer. Add the drained matzah farfel to the skillet and saute. Slowly add the chicken soup, using as little or as much as you need to reach the consistency of a pilaf. Season with salt and pepper. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

TZIMMIS SOUFFLE

Fishbein's friend gave her this recipe. Though it's really for Passover, we both agree it's almost too good to tuck away in a Passover section. This recipe is great all year-round. For an extra-special presentation, make this recipe in individual ramekins for single servings.

5 large eggs, separated
2 cups finely grated carrots (about 5 to 6 large carrots)
1 cup sugar
¼ cup matzah meal
½ cup vegetable oil
1 tsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. orange juice
1 (20-oz.) can crushed pineapple with heavy syrup

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a 9 x 9-inch square pan with nonstick cooking spray. Set aside.

In a large bowl, beat the egg whites until they are stiff. Using a spatula, fold in the carrots, sugar and matzah meal. Fold in the egg yolks, oil, lemon juice, orange juice and pineapple with the syrup.

Pour into the prepared baking dish. Bake 40 to 45 minutes or until top is golden. Scoop or spoon out. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

Lemon Meringue Dessert from Kosher By Design

BALSAMIC BRAISED BRISKET WITH SHALLOTS AND POTATOES

1 (3-lb.) beef brisket sea salt
freshly ground black pepper
10 cloves garlic, peeled, divided
3 tbsp. margarine, divided
2 tbsp. olive oil
3 Yukon gold potatoes, peeled and cut into chunks
6 whole shallots, peeled
¼ cup balsamic vinegar
¼ cup red wine
1 (14½-oz.) can crushed tomatoes

Preheat oven to 400. Season the brisket on both sides with salt and pepper. Using the tip of a sharp knife, make sliver cuts all along the brisket. Cut 5 of the garlic cloves in half. Place a piece of garlic into each slit. Place 2 tablespoons of the margarine and the oil into a large skillet or pot set over medium heat. When the margarine is melted and hot, add the meat; you should hear it sear on contact. Let it cook for 8 minutes – don't move it around. After 8 minutes, lift the meat up, add 1 tablespoon of margarine to the pan, and turn the meat over. Sear on the second side for 8 minutes. Remove the brisket to a baking pan. Surround the brisket with the potatoes, shallots and 5 whole garlic cloves.

Add balsamic vinegar and wine to the skillet or pan. Add the tomatoes. Turn the heat down to medium and cook for 5 minutes stirring to combine. While the mixture cooks down, scrape up the browned bits from the pan; a wooden spoon works well here. Pour balsamic mixture over the brisket and vegetables. Add water to just cover the brisket.

Place in the oven and bake for 2 to 2½ hours, covered. Allow to cool before slicing. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Note: Searing meat means exposing it to high heat to brown it on the surface. This seals in the flavour. It forms a crust, which enables the meat to retain its juices.

CHOCOLATE CHIP BISCOTTI

2 cups sugar
1 cup margarine
6 large eggs
2¼ cups matzah cake meal
¼ cup potato starch
½ tsp. salt
1 cup walnuts, chopped finely
2 cups semisweet chocolate chips
2 tsp. sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Spray 2 cookie sheets with nonstick cooking spray. Set aside.

In the bowl of a mixer, cream the 2 cups sugar and margarine. Beat until light and fluffy. Add in the eggs one at a time and continue beating.

In a medium bowl, whisk together the matzah cake meal, potato starch, salt and walnuts. Add to the egg mixture in 3 additions, stirring between additions. Stir in the chocolate chips by hand.

Divide the dough in half and place on the two prepared cookie sheets. Shape each into a large rectangle, approximately 7 x 11 inches. You may need to lightly wet your hands to avoid sticking to the dough.

In a small bowl, combine the 2 teaspoons sugar with the cinnamon. Sprinkle on top of each loaf. Bake for 50 minutes.

Remove from oven and let stand 5 minutes. Cut into individual biscotti while warm. Cool completely. Makes 20 to 24 biscotti.

Palestinian Authority installs unity government

DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — The Palestinians' new unity government may achieve its immediate aim of healing factional rifts between Hamas and Fatah, but whether it can end the international isolation of the Palestinian Authority remains unclear.

After a year in which they fought each other more than they fought Israel, and sank under a western embargo, the Hamas-Fatah coalition was installed over the weekend.

The big question is whether Hamas has really changed direction or merely sees the more moderate Fatah as a fig leaf to cover its diehard hostility to Israel.

As far as Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is concerned, the answer is clear.

"The platform of the new government includes very problematic elements that cannot be acceptable to Israel or to the international community, he told his cabinet on Sunday, shortly before it voted to continue a boycott of the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Olmert reiterated Israel's refusal to deal with the new PA government until it accepts demands set by the Quartet of foreign mediators – the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia – to recognize the Jewish state and renounce terrorism.

He also said he would limit contacts with PA President Mahmoud Abbas, the Fatah leader who had long been Israel's designated peace partner.

"We expect that the international community will not be led astray by the creation of the coalition government," Olmert said.

If there was a note of urgency in this appeal, it may have come in response to signs that some western nations could abandon an aid and diplomatic boycott imposed on the PA after Hamas took power last March.

While the U.S. State Department expressed alarm at the PA's continued embrace of violent "resistance" against Israel, Washington officials said they may talk to its new finance minister, Salam Fayyad, a reformer who is not from Hamas.

France invited PA Foreign Minister Ziad Abu Amr, another political independent, to visit Paris, and diplomats said Britain was expected to pursue contacts with non-Hamas members of the new government.

Still, a full resumption of direct aid to the cash-strapped PA would require consensus among the Quartet.

While Moscow has called for the embargo to be abandoned, its partners have adopted a wait-and-see approach to how, and if, the PA pursues diplomacy with Israel.

Amr argued that Hamas, by endorsing Abbas' efforts to negotiate with Israel, had indirectly approved of coexistence between the Jewish state and a future Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

"The recognition of Israel is included in the various articles of the program," Amr told the Jerusalem Post.

"If Israel wants recognition, it has to recognize the Palestinians as well," he said. "Today there is no excuse for anybody not to accept the government unless they want us to remain slaves of occupation and Israel, which will never happen."

In fact, Hamas refuses to abandon its 1988 charter calling for Israel's destruction and has publicly described the alliance with Fatah as a "transitional" measure.

That has stoked contrary instincts, even within the Israeli government, with some of Olmert's coalition partners calling for a boycott of Abbas along with Hamas, and others urging stepped-up diplomacy with the PA president, known familiarly as Abu Mazen.

"It would be better that there be no contact with the new Palestinian government, including Abu Mazen, who in effect provides a cover for the new government," said Strategic Affairs Minister Avigdor Lieberman, head of the right-wing Yisrael Beiteinu party.

But several members of the centre-left Labor party, the senior partner to Olmert's Kadima, said now was the time for Israel to empower Palestinian moderates by engaging Abbas.

"If we want to hurt Hamas politically and militarily, we must open negotiations with Hamas' rival, Abu Mazen – a real negotiation that the Palestinian people will perceive as providing a diplomatic horizon," said Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh of Labor.

For now, Israel may join the Quartet in extending hope for a breakthrough. The forum may be the Arab League summit in Riyadh at month's end, where a Saudi proposal for comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace is to be discussed.

Under the proposal, Israel would win recognition from all Arab states in exchange for a full withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Six Day War and an agreed-upon solution to the Palestinian refuge problem.

Israel has voiced reservations about the phrasing of the proposal, but the possibility that it would co-opt the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority to a full peace deal could now be a major draw for Jerusalem.

But Israel's sole Arab minister said the Olmert government should make its openness to rapprochement clear through greater openness to the new Palestinian Authority.

"Normalization with the Arab world is what we fought for all of these years," said Galeb Majadele.

"If, God forbid, we now give even a minimal impression of rejectionism, how will we face the entire world in another two weeks after the Riyadh summit?"

FROM TORONTO TO TEL AVIV

Brigitta Kogut, from Toronto, was part of a group of 42 new immigrants who arrived last week in Israel through the efforts of the aliyah support program Nefesh B'Nefesh. Nefesh B'Nefesh has recently introduced an additional program for new immigrants under which it has reserved special sections on a monthly basis on scheduled El Al flights from the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom. Until now, the immigrants who have come to Israel under a Nefesh B'Nefesh program arrived by special charter. In the five years since the formation of Nefesh B'Nefesh, 10,000 immigrants from North America and Britain have arrived in Israel through the organization. [Israel photo]

Singer firing roils World Jewish Congress

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — The sudden dismissal of a longtime power broker from the World Jewish Congress won't harm the organization going forward, its secretary general said this week, dismissing threats from several international affiliates to withdraw from the organization.

Two days after WJC president Edgar Bronfman announced that the group was severing all ties with Rabbi Israel Singer, a longtime official and chairman of the WJC's policy board, secretary general Stephen Herbits was eager to emphasize the positive.

In an interview with JTA on March 16, Herbits pointed to the organization's "extraordinary track record" and insisted that Rabbi Singer's dismissal would not be a hindrance to the organization.

"The implication that we can't move forward without Israel Singer is garbage," Herbits told JTA. "His own behaviour drove him out, and over time that will become obvious to everybody, especially the more noise he makes about it."

Rabbi Singer's dismissal, announced in a conference call last week with members of the organization's steering committee, prompted outraged responses from affiliated groups around the world.

Israeli WJC officials were incensed as well by

Rabbi Israel Singer

Bronfman's announcement, also made during the call, to fire Bobby Brown, director general of the Israel branch, and to cut off the branch's funding.

WJC Israel officials have been quarelling for months with New York over the attempt to install Oded Eran, Israel's current ambassador to the European Union, as the branch's director.

Founded in Geneva in 1936, the WJC is the umbrella organization for more than 100 local communities and is the putative representative of world Jewry. But that coalition appeared in danger of fracturing as two congressional affiliates threatened to quit the organization in the wake of Bronfman's announcement.

"Just because Mr. Bronfman has taken a decision, that does not mean the end of Israel Singer, although it might mean the end of the World Jewish Congress," Ariel Muzicant, vice-president of the European Jewish Congress and longtime leader of the Viennese Jewish community, told JTA. "Most of the European Jewish communities, Israel and South America are considering taking very serious steps because we will not tolerate such actions from Mr. Bronfman."

In the hours after the conference call, two international affiliates submitted letters of protest to Bronfman.

Pierre Besnainou, the head of the European Jewish Congress, conveyed his "strong disappointment" with the call and urged Bronfman not to take any further action other than ordering an audit of the Israeli branch, or the Europeans may consider withdrawing temporarily from the WJC.

The Israel branch issued a similar threat, calling the conference call illegal because its microphones apparently were inoperable, rendering the branch unable to voice opposition to the proceedings. Besnainou also reported trouble with his microphone.

Rabbi Singer has been with the World Jewish Congress for more than 30 years and is considered one of the Jewish world's most prominent officials.

Rabbi Singer has been under a cloud since the revelation several years ago that he secretly transferred $1.2 million of WJC money to a Swiss bank account. The money was subsequently returned, but critics say the transfer was never fully explained.

A number of investigations were launched in the wake of that revelation. A 2006 report by the New York State Attorney General's Office found no evidence of criminality on Rabbi Singer's part, but assailed the organization for lax record keeping and said Rabbi Singer had violated his fiduciary duties by moving money around without proper authorization.

In 2005, a report by the accounting firm Price Waterhouse Coopers sought to analyze a decade's worth of financial documentation from WJC's Geneva office but was unable to account for $3.8 million of WJC money. A separate Internal Revenue Service investigation into the organization's finances is under way.

This week's developments come against the backdrop of a budding struggle for leadership of the group between two American billionaires, Bronfman and cosmetics heir Ronald Lauder.

Lauder recently announced his plans to run for the WJC leadership. That puts him on a collision course with Bronfman, who reportedly wants his son Matthew to succeed him. Lauder has charged that Matthew Bronfman lacks the experience for the job.

Personal testimonies on view in Holocaust exhibit in France

By BRETT KLINE

PARIS — Alexander Halaunbrenner easily finds his two kid sisters, Mina and Claudine, in a group photo taken in 1944 at Izieu, an improvised summer camp near Lyon.

The children hidden at Izieu were rounded up by the Lyon Gestapo, led by Klaus Barbie, on April 13, 1944. Mina and Claudine were gassed at Auschwitz along with more than 30 other children from the summer camp.

The picture is among thousands of photographs, official documents, lists and personal testimonies that make up the exhibit on deported children at the Paris City Hall.

Halaunbrenner's father and brother were killed by Barbie's Gestapo in Lyon. A baby sister and his mother survived separately in hiding. Halaunbrenner was with his mother.

"It breaks my heart every time I tell the stories of my family and the Shoah," says Halaunbrenner, now 75, as he surveys the large rooms at City Hall filled by the exhibit.

In all, 11,400 French children were deported, 6,000 from Paris.

Halaunbrenner has been the flag-bearer for the past 35 years at ceremonies held by the Association of Sons and Daughters of Jews, which organized the City Hall exhibit. The organization was founded and is still headed by famed Nazi hunter Serge Klarsfeld.

"I have been an activist for all these years to teach young people that it really did happen," Halaunbrenner says. "The Gestapo called me in to identify my father's body. I was 10 years old. What can I say?"

He looks around at the crowd of people invited to opening day of the exhibit, nearly all of them elderly. They examine the photos and documents, and compare family notes and train convoy numbers from the Drancy internment camp north of Paris to Auschwitz.

"Are the children and grandchildren of all these people going to continue passing the message about the Shoah to the French, the Europeans and the Americans?" Halaunbrenner asks. "Frankly, the answer for the most part is no. People have other things to do. They have lives to live."

Klarsfeld, well known in Europe for tracking down Nazi war criminals including Barbie, the so-called "Butcher of Lyon," says school groups have signed up to visit the exhibit.

On Jewish radio here, Klarsfeld was asked about bringing Jewish school groups to the exhibit, and says of course they should come.

"But the most important thing is to bring groups of French French and Magrebi Arab French kids," he said. "If they don't come and see the physical proof of the Shoah, they will stop believing that it happened. In fact, that is happening already."

Klarsfeld sent an invitation to the Iranian embassy.

"It is obvious that Iranian President [Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad never took a class on the Shoah," he says wryly. "I would like to bring this exhibit to Iran, but I don't think that will happen."

The thousands of documents list deportees city by city, and by district in Paris. It will be the permanent collection of a museum on the site of the Des Milles internment camp near Marseilles.

"You notice that the children are all dressed up in the photos," Halaunbrenner says. "The photos come from family archives. Neither the parents, children or the photographers could imagine that these beautiful families would all be killed not long after."

Israel Briefs

Israeli military morale high

More than two in three eligible Israeli military conscripts volunteer for combat duties, new data found. According to the March draft figures leaked to the media, 69.5 per cent of conscripts with the appropriate physical attributes asked to join Israel Defence Forces fighting units, a slight rise over the 68.7 per cent volunteerism registered a year ago. The figures suggest that the setbacks in last year's Lebanon war did not harm morale in Israeli military ranks. Indeed, the most popular combat unit is the Golani infantry brigade, which saw extensive combat with Hezbollah and suffered scores of casualties during the conflict. Golani reports 2.7 applicants for every one of its available positions.

Hamas reaffirms jihad

Hamas, rebuffing criticism by Al Qaeda, reaffirmed its commitment to destroying Israel. "We will not betray promises we made to God to continue the path of Jihad and resistance until the liberation of Palestine, all of Palestine," the governing Palestinian Authority faction said in a statement last week. The declaration came after Al Qaeda's deputy commander Ayman Zawahri denounced Hamas for agreeing to share power with the more moderate Palestinian faction Fatah, calling this capitulation to Israel and the West. "Zawahri's recent statements were wrong," the Hamas statement said. "Resistance is our strategy. How and when? This depends on the reality at the time and our corresponding view of things."

Ancient neighbourhood found

Israeli archeologists uncovered the remains of a Second Temple-era Jewish neighbourhood in Jerusalem. A network of ancient streets, homes and ritual mikvah baths were found recently in the capital's Arab district of Shuafat when municipal workers laid tracks for a light railway. The Antiquities Authority estimated that the finds, which currently spread over an area of some 100 acres, date to a period after the Second Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans in 70 C.E. Evidence suggests the neighbourhood was affluent and religiously observant. "In the digs, many stone tools and caches of coins were discovered, including a rare gold coin with the image of the Emperor Trajan," Antiquities Authority official Rahel Bar-Natan said.

Candidates for president

Colette Avital, a veteran Labor Party lawmaker and former Israeli consul in New York, announced that she would contend to succeed President Moshe Katsav when his term ends in July. Katsav stepped down temporarily in January over a sex scandal. His stand-in, Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik, has indicated she might want the permanent presidency. Also believed to be in the running are Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres, former Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin and Tel Aviv Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau.

UNESCO vindicates dig

A UN inspection team vindicated an Israeli archeological dig in Jerusalem but said it should proceed under foreign supervision. The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) sent a team to inspect the Western Wall Plaza last month following Muslim allegations that Israeli excavations there threatened the foundations of two major mosques on the nearby Temple Mount. UNESCO's findings agreed with Israeli assertions that the dig was being conducted according to professional standards. But UNESCO also urged Israel to suspend work, consult with Jordanian and Palestinian authorities, and resume only with international supervision. Israeli officials had no immediate comment.

Terror victim starts over

An Israeli who lost his entire family to a Palestinian terrorist attack had a child with his second wife. A daughter was born last week to David Hatuel, 37, a former resident of the Gaza Strip, and his wife, Limor. Three years ago Hatuel's pregnant first wife, Tali, and their four daughters were killed in a roadside ambush by Palestinian gunmen.

Rice to visit Israel again

Condoleezza Rice will visit Israel before the end of the month. The visit, announced last week after the U.S. secretary of state met with Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, would be Rice's second this year. Rice has said Israeli-Palestinian peace would be a top priority for her last two years in office. She and Livni discussed the 2002 Arab peace initiative, which offered comprehensive peace to Israel in exchange for a return to pre-1967 lines and an agreement on the Palestinian demand for a refugee "right of return" to Israel. Livni and Rice both regard the initiative as a starting point, not a bottom line. Israel had rejected its language until now because it implied an unfettered right of return for millions of refugees and their descendants, but Israeli officials believe Arab leaders understand they must retreat on the refugee issue. Israel is seeking a comprehensive Arab peace as a means of pressuring the Palestinians into repudiating their Hamas-led government.

"The Danish Play"

משנכנס אדר מרבים בשמחה, ואמנם פורים כבר עבר, אבל עדיין מותר לספר באיחור בדיחה פורימית:

נזירה נכנסה למונית. נהג המונית לא יכל להסיר את עיניו ממנה. ולבסוף אמר: "יש לי מה להגיד לך, אבל אני לא רוצה לפגוע בך". „בני היקר", ענתה לו, "א חרי שנים רבות של נזירות ראיתי ושמעתי הכל".

"טוב", אמר, "תמיד היתה לי פנטזיה לנשק נזירה".

"נראה מה אפשר לעשות בקשר לזה" אמרה הנזירה" אבל אתה חייב להיות רווק ואתה חייב להיות קתולי".

"אין בעיה, אמר הנהג, אני גם רווק וגם קתולי".

"אם כך, אמרה הנזירה, תעצור במקום חשוך".

הגשימה הנזירה את הפנטזיה שלו בנשיקה חמה ומחשמלת. אבל כשחזרו לכביש פרץ הנהג בבכי והתוודה:"סלחי לי, אחות, שיקרתי, אני יהודי ונשוי".

"זה בסדר, אל תעשה עיניין, אמרה הנזירה, קוראים לי רונו ואני מחופש למסיבת פורים...."

Neurologist writes book on childhood sleep

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

For parents wondering what to do with newborns who won't sleep, toddlers who have nightmares and lethargic teens who won't get out of bed, salvation is just a read away.

Dr. Shelly Weiss, a pediatric neurologist at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, has written a new book called Better Sleep for your Baby & Child: A Parent's Step-by-Step Guide to Healthy Sleep Habits.

Published by Robert Rose Inc., the $24.95 paperback is as comprehensive as they come, discussing not only the treatment, but the underlying causes of childhood and adolescent sleep disorder symptoms.

The book discusses a myriad of sleep problems, including bed-wetting, teeth-grinding, restless leg syndrome, sleep apnea, sleepwalking, nightmares, snoring, circadian rhythm issues and nocturnal eating (drinking) disorder, to name just a few.

The easy-to-read tome is split into three sections: Healthy Sleep, Sleep Disorders and a Step-by-step guide to better sleep.

Each chapter provides loads of charts, explanations, case studies, quick fact boxes and worksheets for parents to use in creating and teaching appropriate sleep routines for children.

Weiss's 20 years of pediatric experience at Sick Kids and her own experiences as the mother of two daughters, helped inform the book and made it something the average person can understand.

"I'm also a consumer. So [I] have an understanding of how difficult it is to take a lot of information and then process it and understand it," Weiss said.

"[My experiences] mostly helped make it readable. Just being a mother and having parented children, and having dealt with the sleep issues that everyone deals with… I definitely think that was helpful in writing this book."

One of the first topics in the book deals with a subject that many new parents wish they understood better: the apparent randomness of their newborn's sleep patterns.

Weiss dedicates a hefty chunk of text to de-mystifying this area.

Have kids, will sleep

What parents should understand is that children develop sleeping through the night between the ages of zero and three months – they're not born with it, Weiss explained.

A newborn has a random circadian rhythm, the physiological mechanism that tells us to sleep when it's dark.

"When a newborn is in utero, they don't have that circadian pattern. That's why their schedule is random," Weiss said. "Part of this is biological and part is social, because the parent plays a part [in helping educate the baby] to learn sleep patterns."

Another topic given heavy consideration is the sleep patterns of the ever-enigmatic teenager.

Weiss explained that most teens have a different sleep routine than either adults or young children.

"It's definitely a biological change [in teenagers]," she said. "As you go from [young] adolescence to teenager, your circadian clock gets longer so you tend to want to stay up later and sleep in later. There are social reasons for this, too, but a lot is biological."

Better Sleep for your Baby & Child also gives parents basic information to understand how much sleep their children should be getting and what type of sleep regimen is recommended.

A list of alternate resources is provided at the end of the book for parents who want to do further research.

Weiss, who is Jewish, took a one-year sabbatical in Israel in order to write the book and live in the Holy Land with her daughters, something she said she's always wanted to do.

"Of the few countries worldwide [researching sleep medicine], other than the U.S., Israel is one of the countries where there are very good sleep scientists," Weiss said.

This is her first book and Weiss doesn't have immediate plans to write another one. When asked what she plans to do now that the arduous task of compiling this book is done, Weiss simply replied, "Sleep."

But she did have one last word of encouragement to weary parents who wonder how long their children's sleep syndromes will keep them awake at night.

"I always tell parents that the sleep problems end as soon as their children move out and get married."

Q. Many of my friends and I are caring for aging parents who live alone, and we are often very concerned about their eating habits. Do you have any suggestions?

A. It is often difficult for people living alone to eat well, both because they are unmotivated to cook for themselves and because it may be difficult to get out to buy groceries. This applies to people of all ages – many young, single people end up eating cereal for dinner or filling up on popcorn. So, these tips can apply to all ages.

The best thing you can do is to help your relatives have healthy, convenient food in their home, food that is easy for them to prepare and appealing to them. This may mean making sure they have cottage cheese or yogurt and canned fruit, canned or frozen vegetables or soups, eggs, milk and cheese, sliced meats such as turkey, canned tuna or salmon, or frozen individual entrees that can be microwaved.

Ask your parents what they would like to eat. Many older people prefer light meals. They could have cheese and crackers, a glass of milk and a piece of fruit; a peanut butter or tuna sandwich on whole wheat with a piece of fruit; a bowl of soup; or an egg with toast and a sliced tomato. If they prefer larger, more substantial meals, then help them buy or cook food and freeze it in individual portions – for example, serving size pieces of chicken, slices of brisket or turkey, some meatballs, or individual portions of soup. If you have your family over for dinner, make extra food and send the leftovers home packed in individual portions to be frozen and reheated.

It is essential to start by asking your parents what they would like to eat and what they would realistically make, rather than guessing and filling their kitchen with food that they will end up not using. It is also helpful to make a list of suggestions to give them, so that when they don't know what to eat, they can refer to it and make their choice accordingly.

If they only like a few fruits and vegetables, then try to have some of these available whenever possible. It's OK to eat the same ones over and over, but you don't want to avoid this food group completely, and that's often what happens. Remember, too, that groceries can be ordered from many places that will deliver to your family members so that they can have fresh produce or bread.

Finally, try to encourage them to try not to eat alone, but whenever possible, to join friends or family. In these settings, people always eat a better meal, and the company is very important.

Spa packages for men, women, couples at Old Mill

Spa Life

By KATHRYN KATES

The spa at the Old Mill Inn is adjacent to the inn, which includes the landmark restaurant and banquet facility.

The luxurious 2,500-square-foot spa and a boutique inn opened its doors on October 2001.

The architecture of the Old Mill Inn, on the banks of the Humber River, is Tudor-style – reminiscent of "Olde England."

The spa's mission statement is, "Lose yourself in relaxation, instil peace and harmony, while restoring vitality and well-being."

"Most of the clients that come here are from the area. They are hardworking women or moms, all needing to take time for themselves… We give them some time to take peace for themselves and recharge," says spa director Christina McDougall.

The spa has 10 treatment rooms painted in taupe and sage, with cream trim, wainscotting and crown moulding. There are two wet rooms, separate pedicure and manicure rooms and two couples' rooms – one called Harmony is specifically designed for couples' massage.

Harmony has a picture window that brings in natural light. For ambience, there is an all-season, halogen fireplace. The other double room, used for facials, has sliding doors, so that it can accomodate either two separate guests or a couple.

The spa also boasts a retail-reception area, two women's change rooms, one men's change room, an infra-red sauna and a quiet room.

The quiet room is a comfortable space where guests relax while waiting for their spa treatments. The neutral colours, taupe and sage, continue on the walls. The light fixtures are modern. with frosted glass and wrought iron. The wool carpeting has a floral design in colours of sage, taupe, brown and cranberry. There are two wing chairs in the room, one in warm brown and one in beige; gold couches; chairs in a striped pattern; and a halogen fireplace.

"We have 10 estheticians, 10 registered massage therapists, two certified aromatherapist-reflexologists, with one who also does reiki. We also have five concierges, a one-person call centre and two spa attendants," says McDougall.

Products used for face and body – both in treatments and retailed – include Clayton Chagal from Germany and Phytomer from France. Ssense Presents, with a full range of lavender aromatherapy creams and bath salts, are used for body treatments. For pedicures, Allpersan (first developed for diabetics) from Germany is used. OPI from California is the manicure line of choice.

"The services we provide are facials, full waxing, massages, manicures, pedicures, body wraps, scrubs, sunless tans, makeup applications. Our signature facial is the Ultimate Facial. It is reparative, as well as preventative. It uses Clayton Chagal's 99.9 per cent elastin and collagen to rebuild the skin. It is 75 minutes of pure heaven," says McDougall.

"Our other signature service is the Lavender Body Wrap. Lavender is our signature scent. In the treatment, we use a cream base mask to help nourish the skin and relax the body."

There are many spa packages available including The Spa Date for Her – three hours of pampering that includes the Traditional English Facial, a lavender manicure, and a rosemary mint pedicure. Gaining popularity is The Spa Date for Him – two hours with a choice of an aromatherapy massage or Swedish massage, culminating with the Gentleman's Hot Towel Facial. Men make up about 30 per cent of the spa's client base.

Spa packages include The Old Mill Spa Getaway: a couple stays in a luxury suite, a continental breakfast is offered in the Terrace and side-by-side Swedish massage is enjoyed at the spa.

McDougall recommends the Girls Getaway for women travelling together. It includes a stay in a premium suite, continental breakfast and $150 toward spa services per woman. Add-ons such as dinner-dance packages and additional spa services are offered.

You can choose to stay in one of 46 rooms or 13 suites that are distinctly and tastefully decorated.

When not partaking in spa services, other activities in and around the Old Mill include walking, biking and jogging on picturesque trails. Tennis courts are adjacent to the property, golfing is nearby, and there is shopping in Bloor West Village and on the Kingsway.

For more information, visit www.oldmilltoronto.com/spa or Ontario's Finest Spas at www.ontariosfinest.ca. To book an appointment at the Old Mill spa, call 416-232-3700.

Spring Fashion & Beauty

Spring is the time of year for renewal and rejuvenation after the long winter months. The colourful flowers and the fresh warm breeze give a feeling of well-being. The sunlight is wonderful – but it means it's also time to start using a moisturizer with an SPF15 to protect your skin from those harmful rays that feel so good. Since your skin is most important to looking your best, you must take care of it and keep it looking fresh.

BEAUTY SHOP

By Stacey Michaels and Francine Birken

Dedicated in memory of Carol Wise.

Makeup this spring is all about definition. Eyes are lined and dramatic, while lips, in contrast, are sheer and glossy. Shades of fun colours like pink, coral, violet, green, copper, silver and blue are dominating the spring collections of all top makeup brands. Lip colours vary in different shades, and red lips are a definite statement this season as well.

We are pleased to introduce Dr. Atul Kesarwani, the medical director of the Cosmedical Rejuvenation Clinic, conveniently located at Yonge Street and Wilson Avenue, where he performs surgical and non-surgical cosmetic procedures and oversees all enhancement procedures, while offering his patients state-of-the-art facilities that highlight comfort and privacy. He has been head of the division of plastic surgery at the University of Toronto-affiliated Toronto East General Hospital for the past 12 years.

Kesarwani is a board-certified plastic surgeon with a reputation for being a caring, experienced physician who keeps current on new technologies and techniques as well as established methods to deliver superior artistic results to his patients. He has entrusted his staff with continuing this kind of service as paramount in helping patients learn more about what procedures are right for them.

"I consider it a privilege to be a plastic surgeon and am committed to ensuring the comfort, safety and privacy of all of my patients. Plastic surgery can improve quality of life, and it is rewarding to be able to give my patients a new outlook and renewed vitality," Kesarwani says.

You can celebrate your 30th birthday over and over again with Sculptra – The Liquid Facelift. Kesarwani has introduced this new, non-invasive treatment that will revolutionize plastic surgery. Sculptra is administered under your skin where you have lost fat, to fill in folds and wrinkles and to lift sagging tissues. The sculptra, which is made up of a substance that has been used in dissolvable sutures for years, slowly disappears, but it triggers a natural response whereby the youthful contours of the face are re-established.

Kesarwani is one of the first doctors in Canada to be trained to administer the treatment, which involves three to four monthly visits. The effects last at least two years.

"The beauty of this treatment is that the results get better with time," Kesarwani says. "The procedure restores what fat loss takes away and triggers a natural process that revolumizes under the deeper levels of the skin. A person can now have this treatment and go back to work the next day."

There are many options in rejuvenating your appearance, including home-care treatments, esthetic services, injectables and surgery. Having a consultation with someone who knows how to artistically restore youthfulness, who can perform all the available procedures and takes the time to understand what a patient is looking for will help ensure that you choose the procedure that is right for you!

Kaffiyeh Nation

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

It seems that Mideast politics have made their way into the North American sphere yet again, and this time it's a little more wearable than a CNN broadcast. The kaffiyeh, the traditional Arab headdress otherwise known as the shemag, has become the hottest accessory since the high-top sneaker.

Yes, it seems that the scarf that was wrapped around the head of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat has made its way onto the slender necks of political activists, hipsters and trendy-minded folk alike.

While the scarf was originally worn to shield the wearers' face from desert winds and the sun, since the 1930s the kaffiyeh has been inextricably linked to Palestinian nationalism.

As well as the scarf's ubiquitous presence in the wardrobe of Arafat, the kaffiyeh was also the favoured accessory of Leila Khalid, a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), which hijacked airplanes during the Black September period of the late 1960s and early '70s. With its spider-web-like pattern meant to symbolize the Palestinian struggle, the kaffiyeh is absolutely rife with symbolism. And while some may argue that this symbolism is nothing more than patriotic, its connection to political figures like Arafat and Khalid cannot be ignored.

Moreover, the kaffiyeh's presence in the western sphere has always been tied to Arab solidarity in one way or another. In the late 1980s, kaffiyehs popped up across the United States in conjunction with the first intifadah. In 2001, kaffiyehs were worn following September 11th in solidarity with Arabs who had been the targets of hate crimes. The political ground on which the most recent kaffiyeh wearers, however, tread is a bit muddier.

> "I didn't even know what it meant when I got it"

"I might be wrong, but I'm pretty sure they had no political meaning originally and were just worn as protection from the sand and wind in the desert," says Fran Miller, a Jewish kaffiyeh wearer and a Ryerson University fashion student.

"If they really stood for something more than that, I wouldn't wear them, especially being Jewish. Nevertheless, I wouldn't wear one on a trip to Israel because of the obviously different connotations."

The latest kaffiyeh craze can be traced to Japan, where Tokyo's most fashionable folk have been donning the kaffiyeh for the past few years with no apparent political intentions.

Once the trend was picked up on by hip westerners, kaffiyeh wearers on this side of the globe were a dime a dozen. The popularity of the kaffiyeh reached a fever pitch when early this year, American retail chain Urban Outfitters introduced the scarf into their pre-spring line of accessories for 2007.

The store, which is widely known for commodifying the subversive, has repackaged the scarves in five fashion-friendly colour variations (traditional black on white, yellow, blue, red and green). Moreover, they've renamed the kaffiyeh the "anti-war woven scarf."

It seems, however, that the folks at Urban Outfitters were sadly mistaken in renaming and selling shmattes similar to the one that framed the face of a man who once vowed to annihilate the State of Israel.

The store removed the scarves soon after, offering the following statement: "Due to the sensitive nature of this item, we will no longer offer it for sale. We apologize if we offended anyone. This was by no means our intention."

While the scarves have been removed from the store's website, the scarves and T-shirts in similar prints are still prominently displayed in various Urban Outfitters locations. Moreover, the presence of the scarves on streets hasn't dissipated. If anything, the controversy has spiked their popularity.

But it seems that the misappropriation of the kaffiyeh's meaning extends past the realm of Urban Outfitters. For most kaffiyeh wearers, the scarf is merely a matter of esthetics.

"I wear it for fashion and only fashion. I like how it looks, and though it might sound ignorant, I didn't even know what it meant when I got it," says Nick Goluch, a Ryerson University fashion student.

"In North America, I feel like they have become about the look and not the meaning, but I am still a little wary of wearing it sometimes."

In the most recent issue of the edgy Vice magazine, the kaffiyeh was noted as being the hottest accessory for New Yorkers. Paired with a military-style jacket, Trilby hat and Converse sneakers, the esthetic of the model's attire in a Vice photograph is so obviously synonymous with the hipster look that it would be impossible to extract the kaffiyeh from the outfit.

Nick Goluch

R. BERGMAN photo

"The kaffiyeh isn't an anti-Semitic garment by nature, but I think many people are wearing it to signify support for the destruction of Israel, and that is anti-Semitic," says Ryan Hardy, a University of Toronto student.

But it isn't just pro-Israeli blood that curdles with every swish of this provocative fashion item. It seems that some Palestinians are up in arms over the sudden cool factor of the kaffiyeh as well. KABOBfest, an online Pro-Palestinian blog, has been blasting the politically charged trend left, right and centre (no pun intended).

"That's right folks, for a mere $20, you, too, can jump on the socially stupid hipster-doofus bandwagon by rocking your very own 'anti-war woven scarf.'"

These days, most kaffiyeh wearers are tapping into a Middle Eastern esthetic rather than a political position.

However, it doesn't make it any less offensive.

Fortunately, if my fashion-cycle calculations are correct, the kaffiyeh trend just might be on its way out. As it seems to follow, once the mainstream faction of Urban Outfitters shoppers adopts a trend, its cool factor is lost forever. And Urban Outfitters labelling aside, I dare say its meaning dissipates as well. What once might have been a key symbol associated with the destruction of Israel, might be on its way to the half-off bin at Wal-Mart. Now if only those political sentiments could dissipate as easily...

A portrait of Ireland's Jewish community

Jewish Ireland in the Age of Joyce: A Socioeconomic History* by Cormac O Grada, Princeton University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leopold Bloom, the half-Jewish character in James Joyce's sublime, stream-of-consciousness novel Ulysses was hardly typical of the 3,000 Jews who lived in Dublin, Ireland, in 1904, the year in which the book is set.

Dublin's Jewish burghers, who tended to be Lithuanian immigrants, were religiously observant and thus averse to marrying out of the faith. So Leopold Bloom, the figment of Joyce's splendid imagination, was certainly atypical of the Jews of early 20th century Dublin.

This point is made by Irish economist Cormac O Grada in Jewish Ireland in the Age of Joyce: A Socioeconomic History.

Covering the period from the 1870s, when the first Jewish immigrants arrived, to the late 1940s, when the close-knit Jewish community was already in a state of decline, O Grada's work is a portrait of a small but vital outpost in the Diaspora.

But it's rather dry and meandering, unfortunately, weighed down by a turgid style and a somewhat disorganized method of presentation. But it's worth reading, nevertheless, because of the relatively exotic nature of the subject.

As O Grada readily acknowledges, Ireland – which was dirt poor compared to such countries as Canada, Australia, Argentina or the United States – was low on the pecking order of destinations favoured by Jewish immigrants in the last third of the 19th century.

Indeed, Dublin, the capital, was a city that had been largely passed over by the Industrial Revolution. As a result, Ireland – a nation of emigration for centuries – absorbed only about 0.5 per cent of the pre-1914 Jewish exodus from Eastern Europe.

So when Ulysses appeared in 1922, Dublin's Jewish population was barely one-tenth of that of Montreal or Manchester.

Prior to the arrival of the Litvaks, as O Grada affectionately describes them, few Jews had ever settled in Ireland.

True, there was a Sephardi presence in the 17th and 18th centuries, but the majority of these sojourners left, to be eventually supplanted by a tiny colony of Ashkenazim who preceded the wavelet of Lithuanians.

Thanks to their influx, the community grew from 285 in 1871 to 5,148 in 1911, reaching a record high of 5,221 in 1936.

The lion's share of Jews resided in Dublin, the haunt of Leopold Bloom, but communities also arose in Cork, Waterford, Lurgan and Limerick, as well as in Derry and Belfast in what is now Northern Ireland.

The first generation of Lithuanian settlers were self-employed peddlers, petty moneylenders, glaziers, picture frame sellers, drapers and retailers.

The wealthiest among them were moneylenders, or "percentniks," and they dominated communal institutions.

During the late 19th century, moneylending was a "sensitive issue" in Ireland and Britain (which ruled all of Ireland until what was to become the Republic of Ireland became independent in 1922), because moneylenders were deemed to have questionable morals, O Grada says.

In the fullness of time, Jewish immigrants gradually abandoned moneylending, as their children entered the professions – law, medicine and dentistry, to name but three – and even the civil service. But for decades, Jews shunned politics and trade unionism.

The Litvaks were very Orthodox, as O Grada notes: "All economic activity ceased at sundown on Friday. Many refused to handle money on the Sabbath, as stipulated in the Talmud, and shabbas goyim from the neighbourhood, who lit and stoked fires and boiled water in Jewish homes, were left with their few pence under the tablecloth or else collected it later."

Yet, as he adds, there were gradations of Orthodoxy. Members of the second generation were less devout than their parents, which is often the case.

Mixed marriages between Jews and Christians were exceedingly rare, but when the children or grandchildren of the immigrants did marry out, they could expect to be ostracized by the Jewish community.

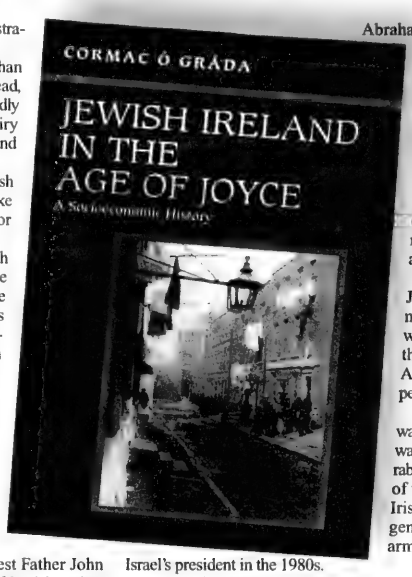
In terms of nutrition, Jews were better off than Christians, since Irish staples such as white bread, tea, sugar, bacon, dripping and potatoes could hardly compare to the Jewish diet of vegetable oil, dairy products, cocoa, fish, eggs, poultry, fresh fruit and vegetables.

Although alcohol played a central role in Jewish ritual, Jews consumed it sparingly and did not, like the indigenous Irish, frequent public houses, or pubs and taverns.

Given the paucity of Jews in Ireland, the Irish knew virtually nothing about them. And in the 19th century, when, as O Grada observes, "the outlook of most Irish people of all persuasions was blinkered, parochial and prejudiced by today's standards," that could be quite a problem for Jews.

During this period, the word "Jewman" was often used perjoratively and insultingly, even in parliamentary debates, to describe Jews, particularly moneylenders.

Apart from religious-based animosity against Jews, there was a degree of economic anti-Semitism stemming from "the relative affluence" of the Jewish immigrants and their descendants, says O Grada.



Sometimes, such as when the Catholic priest Father John Creagh successfully campaigned for a boycott of Jewish traders in Limerick in 1904, this form of anti-Semitism took on concrete and ominous overtones.

O Grada acknowledges that anti-Semitism also pervaded the medical profession. Although several Jewish doctors reached the top in their respective fields, including the cardiologist Leonard Abrahamson, who became president of the Royal College of Physicians of Ireland, some hospitals restricted appointments to Catholics.

Emigration sapped the lifeblood of the Jewish community, especially after World War II.

More than half of Jewish departees immigrated to Britain, while one-fifth tried their luck in North America. A further 20 per cent made aliyah.

Chaim Herzog, who was born in Belfast and was the son of the chief rabbi of Ireland, was one of the most prominent Irish Jews to leave. A general in the Israeli army, he served as Israel's president in the 1980s.

Due to the steady outflow of Jews, the Republic of Ireland was home to only 1,790 Jews in 2002, when the last census was taken.

Clearly, this is a community without a bright future. But its history remains fascinating, as a dip into Jewish Ireland in the Age of Joyce indicates.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Singer-actor looks to L.A. to reboot her career

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Tamara Podemski as Miri Smallhill in Four Sheets To The Wind
[Photo courtesy Four Sheets To The Wind]

Tamara Podemski proudly refers to herself as a "fully functional half-breed."

But the driven Toronto singer/actor/dancer does nothing in half measures.

Born to an Israeli father and Ojibwa mother, Podemski has, so far, carved out as full a career as any 29-year-old could hope for.

To date, she's recorded three full-length albums (two in the Ojibwa language), starred on Canadian TV in the shows Dance Me Outside, The Rez, Moose TV and Ready or Not, held a lead role in the Canadian and Broadway casts of Rent, and last January, won the Special Jury Prize for Acting at the Sundance Film Festival for her part in the U.S. film Four Sheets To The Wind.

She was the first Canadian actress to receive this prize.

In 2006, Podemski also garnered two Canadian Aboriginal Music Awards for her latest album, the eponymous Tamara. One for best female artist and the other for best songwriter.

Podemski is also an in-demand choreographer and dance teacher, with classes around Toronto in various dance styles.

And according to her, she's just getting started.

Fresh off a local radio interview, Podemski sat down with The CJN last week to talk about her successes, losses and the allure of Hollywood, where she hopes to re-energize her acting career.

Tamara, released in 2006, represents the end of an unhappy chapter in her life and the launching point for a new beginning, said Podemski.

Tamara Podemski

The highly emotive, self-produced album was an outgrowth of personal and career hardships, and was written as she worked her way back from unhappy events in her life.

After feeling wronged by prior record deals, Podemski founded her own music label, Mukwa Music, in order to produce an album she had control over.

"It was a very dark time when no one was showing me their support," Podemski said. "So this album was me saving myself and saying, 'You didn't get me down or shut me up.' Even after everything that happened to me, I should have shut down and gone into a hole, but I didn't. I won."

Despite her recent cinematic and musical acclaim, Podemski had to search hard to find her happiness again.

"Everything after this album is a different woman," she explained. "I'm divorced. I've tackled my career again. I'm not feeling sorry for myself anymore or heartbroken and no longer depressed about the state of my life. I was losing hope... but even though I still have to fight against the demons, as we all do, it's becoming an easier fight."

Her joy at getting a "juicy" role to play in Four Sheets To The Wind, followed by the Sundance win and subsequent eager calls from Hollywood casting agents, finally convinced her that it was time to set out on a new artistic journey.

After nearly 30 years as a Torontonian, Podemski will move to Los Angeles this April in search of better acting prospects.

She's gone down there, found a place to stay, set up her management and legal teams and started going to auditions.

"I'd like some amazing scripts to come my way. I'd like to do a lot more acting," she said. "I think I left that world for too long. I forgot how much I loved it."

Though she's winding down the Toronto chapter of her life, she is mindful of her roots here.

"My cultures have only enriched my life," Podemski said. "It's deeply spiritual in terms of giving me faith to accomplish my dreams. Giving me the belief in a higher power. Giving me support by my understanding of how I fit into the world, that comes from both [cultures]."

Her will to succeed stems primarily from her family and the lessons she learned from their experiences, she said.

"I know exactly who I am. I am Jewish/Israeli, I am Ojibwa and everything that that means to me," she said with conviction. "My personal family history has been a huge presence in my life. When you come from survivors on both sides... I think you live your life differently."

Podemski has visited Poland's concentration camps with her paternal grandfather, been taught about her Native past and the struggles of her maternal family and has come away with a philosophy of life that her and her two sisters (artists in their own right), practice daily.

"[We] are overachievers because we live really hard and live life like if it ended tomorrow, we've lived our lives to the fullest," Podemski said. "I know my roots and I know that I have that blood inside of me that fights to survive."

Podemski said that being a "half-breed" often led people to think she and her siblings had no sense of place in the world. An assumption she utterly refuted.

"The only problems came when people didn't want to include us in whatever community event because we didn't fit into what their image of Jewish was or Native was. But that was their problem. We always had a great sense of self," she said. "We could go to any [reservation] in North America and be at home or go to any place in Israel and feel comfortable."

Which should make adjusting to Hollywood seem easy by comparison.

McCLELLAND & STEWART PUBLISH THE MAKING OF A NURSE BY TORONTO NURSE TILDA SHALOF

As poet Leonard Cohen wrote, "Some girls wander by mistake/ Into the mess that scalpels make..." In the case of Toronto nurse Tilda Shalof, she chose her profession after a childhood in which she was obliged to provide continual care for her ailing parents.

Tilda Shalof

One day in nursing school, a professor blithely announced: "Nursing is about life – and life is about nursing." At first she considered that expression trite, but after 25 years of nursing experience, she considers it a wise summation.

Shalof's first nursing job was in a hospital in Tel Aviv; she has also followed her profession in New York and Toronto, where she currently works in the medical-surgical intensive care unit of Toronto General Hospital (University Health Network). In her off-hours, she has become an author. Her first book – A Nurse's Story: Life, Death and In-Between in an Intensive Care Unit – became a national bestseller after its publication several years ago.

Shalof has recently come out with a rousing sequel, The Making of A Nurse, published by the prestigious McClelland & Stewart publishing house of Toronto. The book paints a vivid picture of life behind hospital walls and explains the author's contention that she had to learn "to conquer myself in order to be of service to others."

Promising a glimpse into "the real life of a nurse inside and outside of the hidden medical world," The Making of A Nurse is not just for those in the medical profession, but for anyone who may need a nurse at some point in their lives – in other words, everyone. Whether you are a patient or a reader (or, for that matter, a patient reader), you should find the book engrossing.

New-look watches attracting lots of attention

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A Jewish Canadian brother and sister, Robert and Leigh Herzig, are making big waves in the fashion scene with their European-influenced, acrylic-band watches.

The BOBBY H BOBBY watches, which, their creators say, "align classic design with an affordable industrial material," have garnered so much attention since they burst onto the scene late last year, that they have already been featured in the Globe and Mail and Chatelaine magazine.

But until last year, Robert Herzig, 25, never thought that creating a new brand of watches was in the cards.

Since graduating from Dalhousie University with a degree in geology with a minor in business, Herzig has worked in the diamond industry.

"I studied with the GIA, the Gemological Institute of America, and I wanted to go – since I studied geology in university – into the diamond industry and the mining industry."

He said that once school was over, he didn't want to end up in the Northwest Territories, where Canada's diamonds are mined.

"I got a job working as a diamond buyer for a wholesale jewelry company in Toronto. But I got bored with that because I was working in a vault. As you can imagine, a vault isn't a fun place to work. There are no windows, no view," he said with a laugh.

But everything changed last year when Leigh, his sister, who was the personal assistant to Vanity Fair editor Graydon Carter from 2005-2007, travelled to Italy and was inspired by what she saw.

"She saw this really cool style of watches with a clear acrylic band. We thought it would be a great idea to bring it into Canada and the U.S.," said Herzig, who also operates an online jewelry website called JewelWorks.net.

"She contacted me, knowing I was in the jewelry industry to see what could be done, and a couple days later, we realized we could do this."

They launched their Toronto-based business in August and have been moving forward since then.

"It is such a popular watch in Europe. They are everywhere in Europe. We just sort of took the design and created our own brand," he said, adding that he has ambitions to go back to school to get an MBA.

The watches, which Herzig describes as "fun, chic, durable, relatively inexpensive and virtually weightless," come in blue, red, pink, orange and silver and are very popular with young girls who like the "chunky look."

"We market them to the young and old. We market them to young people as a hip, new, cool, fashionable, popular watch, and we market them to the older crowd as a second watch, a travel watch," Herzig said.

The watches, which retail from $150 to $275, come in several different styles and have Miyota Quartz movement, are water resistant, have a stainless steel screw-down crown, a stainless steel snap caseback and a clear acrylic bracelet.

In Toronto, BOBBY H BOBBY watches can be found at all TNT locations, Gee Beauty and Your Clothes Friend. Those in other parts of Canada and the United States can shop online at www.bobbyhbobby.com.

"We have plans to enter more Toronto stores shortly, and we're also looking to expand nationwide into Vancouver, Montreal, Ottawa and Calgary," he said.

In addition to being fashion forward, the Herzigs are also socially conscious.

Five dollars from the sale of each watch will go towards humanitarian aid for the people affected by the crisis in Darfur.

Doc tells of German PoWs in Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The History Channel recently broadcast a one-hour documentary on a little-known but important sub-chapter of World War II.

Hitler's Canadians, co-produced by Ed Barrenveld and Ted Biggs, told the story of the 40,000 German prisoners of war who were incarcerated in Canada during this period.

Dispatched here from 1940 onward, they were housed in 26 hastily-constructed camps in Ontario, Quebec, Alberta and New Brunswick.

Many of us are familiar with the legion of German Jewish refugees who were interned in Canadian camps after falsely being classified as "enemy aliens." But few of us know that tens of thousands of captured German soldiers, sailors and pilots spent a good part of the war years in Canada as prisoners.

Hitler's Canadians, which is told through file footage, re-enactments and interviews with PoWs, makes the point that they were treated humanely, certainly far better than some Allied prisoners in German camps.

"We had a good time," says one former PoW, recalling his imprisonment.

The camps, though heavily guarded, were essentially run by the prisoners themselves along military lines.

They cooked their own meals, had access to daily newspapers, libraries and athletic facilities, were permitted to form their own theatre companies and symphony orchestras, and were shown the latest Hollywood movies.

Given that Germany was persecuting and murdering its Jewish citizens, the treatment they received was nothing less than remarkable.

More often than not, the camp leaders were committed Nazis who hounded and harassed PoWs suspected of being disloyal to the Nazi cause. Indeed, two such PoWs were lynched in a camp in Medicine Hat, Alta.

Not surprisingly, the PoWs repeatedly tried to escape, and 600 such attempts were recorded. One prisoner, a pilot, swam across the icy St. Lawrence River to the United States, which was then neutral, and made it back to Germany, where he was promptly hailed as a hero. In general, however, escapees were quickly caught.

The Germans were brought here by ship from Britain, which regarded them as a potential threat to its security and could not properly feed them, given the food rationing throughout the country.

Special trains transported the PoWs from Halifax. In one re-enactment, the prisoners are marched through the Muskoka town of Gravenhurst, which was close to one of the camps.

All but two of the camps are long gone, and one, near Bowmanville, Ont., is now an Islamic school.

The jolting title of this interesting film is taken from the comments of prisoners who were imprisoned here for a lengthy time.

They included Volkmar Koenig, a U-boat crew member who was picked out of the water after his submarine was sunk; Hans Kauter, a pilot whose bomber crashed in Wales; Dietrich Heitmuller, an army officer who was captured in El Alamein, Egypt, and Karl Geyr, a pilot who was shot down near the mouth of the Thames River in Britain.

They were all repatriated to Germany between 1946 and 1947, but 6,000 returned as immigrants, part of a wave of 265,000 Germans who settled in Canada after the war.

TEAPACKS TO COMPETE AFTERALL

Israeli band Teapacks performs during the Miss Israel beauty pageant in the northern city of Haifa on March 13. Organisers of the Eurovision Song Contest, a popular European song contest, have decided to allow Israel's entry Push the Button into this year's competition despite complaints about its lyrics, which refer to nuclear war. Jewish directors featured at filmmakers festival

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Filmmakers Festival, an event devoted to the celebration, promotion, and advancement of Canadian filmmaking talent, has come to town.

And with it have come some films by a growing crop of young, ambitious Jewish directors.

These directors are at the helm of films of all genres, styles and lengths.

Montreal-born Alana Cymerman, 34, has entered an intriguing short film she wrote and directed called When Erma Made Herman.

It's a quirky, fun and sometimes haunting, allegorical look at the perils of leading one's life without true love, warts and all.

A scene from When Erma Made Herman

Cymerman's passion for the retro look is also evident in her 15-minute short.

The characters are dressed in 1950s-era fashion; technology is symbolized in the form of an old, black and white TV screen; and the organic piano score, by Montreal musical wunderkind Patrick Watson, gives the film a distinctly magical feel.

One of the main characters, a disembodied head on a stool with a voice akin to that of George Costanza's mother on Seinfeld, is at once creepy and comical.

To say more about the plot here would ruin your viewing experience. After all, it is only a quarter of an hour long. Suffice it to say, it's captivating to watch and well worth checking out.

Though filmed in 2005, this will be the film's Toronto premiere and Cymerman is excited to be at the event.

She said it was important for her as a Jewish woman director, to get as much exposure as possible.

"I hope people come out to see the film and take notice of it," she said on the phone from Montreal last week.

The four-day event, from March 22 to 25, will feature screenings at two venues, the Varsity Cinemas at 55 Bloor St. W. and the Carlton Cinemas at 20 Carlton St.

There are also several other Jewish filmmakers making their Toronto debuts this year.

Israeli-born director, Daniel Oron, brings his 11-minute short film Look Both Ways to Toronto for its first viewing in the city.

A sci-fi thriller featuring computer animation mixed with live-action, the film portrays the dangers of video games for children set in a strange, dystopian world where nothing is as it seems.

In a press release for the event Oron said, "This is a dynamic time for the Canadian film industry and we're thrilled to be a part of a new generation of filmmakers."

When Erma Made Herman and Look Both Ways are scheduled to play March 25 as part of the Shorts Screening #4 event at the Carlton Cinemas starting at 1:45 p.m.

Other films by Jewish directors at this year's festival include the feature-length drama Most Likely To, by Toronto native Matt Austin, and the crime-drama The Poet by Calgarian Michael Rothecker.

Both films will have their world premieres at the festival.

Love not dead for Boynton Beach Club retirees

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

There is life after 65! Ask any of the early baby boomers who are now approaching that magic number when they will be retiring and beginning a new phase of their lives. There is also life after one's spouse passes away. Ask any of the characters in the new DVD release, Boynton Beach Club.

This is a comedy about a group of people who live in an "active adult" community in Florida. Most of them are seniors, or close to it. And most of them have lost their lifelong partners and are facing a life of loneliness. After a period of time, which is always necessary in order to mourn a lost one, most of these people become active in community events, make new friends, and even begin dating and seeing other people.

Love is not dead for these people. It is alive and well.

The film features Dyan Cannon as Lois, an unbelievably skinny ball of fire who encourages everyone around her to get involved in life. Joseph Bologna plays roguish Harry, who is continuously searching for his next conquest. Len Cariou is Jack, a recent widower who is trying to make sense of his life. Brenda Vaccaro plays Marilyn, who lost her husband in a freak accident and must learn how to continue life without him, and Sally Kellerman is Sandy, a woman searching for love and excitement.

While the film is a comedy and has many humorous episodes, it also contains a certain amount of truth about the situation that confronts each of the characters. But whatever their problems and troubles, they eventually decide to live life to the fullest and not allow their age to hold them back.

The audiences that have seen this film have loved it. The Toronto Jewish Film Festival held a free screening just before the movie opened theatrically and the audience was overwhelming, as everyone found something in the film with which they could connect. Most of us have faced these situations or seen loved ones face them, so we can all relate to the events taking place on screen.

Glow Ropes: The Rise of the Bar Mitzvah Emcee also arrived on DVD recently. This film tells the story of Taylor James, a popular bar mitzvah MC in New Jersey who wants to move into the big times in Manhattan. When premier New York event planner Vanessa Dupree spots him at a party in New Jersey, she offers him a job with her organization, working alongside legendary MC Sebastion.

The parties get bigger and more lavish after Taylor makes the move to the Big Apple, but so do the rivalries and pressures. Will Taylor crack?

Is there any end to the upward spiral of these glitzy and glamorous events? You can probably guess the answers, but it is an interesting journey to get to those answers.

This DVD contains a number of humorous special features, including Mitzvah Music – The Best of the Worst and Rocking the Mic with Emcee Stephen Celenrand, as well as several others.

Boynton Beach Club should be readily available at most video stores. Glow Ropes will be more difficult to find, but most video stores can order it. It you have any problems, you can get copies of both films through www.amazon.ca or www.amazon.com.

Interfaith activists mend ties after bishop's slurs

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — How do you undo decades of progress in Christian-Jewish relations in Germany?

Comparing Israel with the Nazis appears to be one way.

Activists are wondering how to repair rifts in those ties after a delegation from the German Catholic Bishops' Conference that visited Israel and the Palestinian territories in late February and early March compared Ramallah to the infamous Warsaw Ghetto.

In particular, Gregor Maria Franz Hanke was quoted as saying, "This morning we saw pictures of the Warsaw Ghetto at Yad Vashem, and this evening we are going to the Ramallah ghetto."

He went on to say that "while Israel has the right to exist, this right cannot be realized in such a brutal manner."

Hanke said he would include his impressions in his sermons during Easter.

Lost was the fact that the Bishops' Conference chair, Karl Cardinal Lehmann, had delivered a sensitive address at Yad Vashem.

"Nobody who wishes to be free of the memory of the Shoah can ever be free," Lehmann said there.

But Hanke's words rang louder, even after he told journalists he didn't intend to compare past and present.

The Bishops' Conference reportedly will meet with Jewish leaders here. Meanwhile, longtime activists in Jewish-Christian relations are at odds over how to respond.

"You ask yourself, why work on Christian-Jewish co-operation for 50 years when such a comparison can be drawn on an ahistorical basis and out of a false sense of concern?" Eva Schulz-Jander, Catholic president of the Society for Christian-Jewish Co-operation, asked in a phone interview.

"I don't understand it and I am sad about it," she said. "It's a setback."

But Johannes Gerster, president of the German Israeli Society, found the critical reactions overblown. "What is important," he said in a public statement, "is that the Catholic bishops have corrected their comparisons and their positions, which were justifiably attacked. It should be accepted and not constantly repeated."

Shimon Stein, Israel's ambassador to Germany, reacted to Hanke's comparison with "horror and disgust." Charlotte Knobloch, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, condemned the remarks as "appalling and completely unacceptable."

Avner Shalev, Yad Vashem's director, wrote in an open letter that such comparisons "poison the atmosphere and make it even harder to find a solution" to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Lehmann answered Shalev in an open letter, saying that the bishops — shaken by their impressions during their first official visit to Yad Vashem — had been further upset by the security fences and walls separating Israel from the Palestinian territories. The barrier, which was built following hundreds of Palestinian terrorist attacks during the intifada, has led to a dramatic drop in attacks.

This led to "a few harsh remarks, some of which were definitely inappropriate," the letter said. It went on to say that "even those who spoke scathingly about the situation" understand the threat of terrorism to Israel and "wholeheartedly support the State of Israel's right to exist and defend itself."

Ultimately, Lehmann said, "There can be no question of taking situations which are problematic or involve injustices today and making any connection whatsoever with the Nazis' mass murders of the Jews. As a result, I can perfectly well understand that a comment which made reference to the Warsaw Ghetto in the light of Palestinian suffering aroused feelings of affront and protests."

Nazi Germany confined some 400,000 Jews to the ghetto before deporting and murdering most of them.

Deidre Berger, head of the Berlin office of the American Jewish Committee, told JTA that it was "unfortunate that the strong statement by Cardinal Lehmann about German responsibility for the Holocaust… was lost in the controversy."

"Still, the large number of comments from the bishops, with invalid historical comparisons, makes one wonder what the discussion is in general within church circles about Israel and the Mideast," she said. "You can only speculate and hope that these are indeed isolated incidents. Nonetheless, to ignore them would be a mistake."

Such comparisons between historical and current events are made frequently by extremists on the right and left. And a recent survey by the Bertelsmann Foundation/TNS Emnid indicated that three out of 10 Germans tend to accuse Israel of doing to the Palestinians "what the Nazis did to the Jews in the Third Reich."

Observers said, however, that one would expect more from Germany's upper Catholic echelon, which over the decades has been a haven for Jewish-Catholic dialogue.

Organization helps Israeli Arab women set up businesses

By NICKY BLACKBURN

TAIBE, Israel — If anyone can understand the plight of Israeli Arab women today, then it's Kiram Baloum, director of the Women's Empowerment Unit of the Center for Jewish-Arab Economic Development (CJAED). Born one of nine children in the village of Taibe, she has never forgotten the struggle many Israeli Arab women face when they try to find work.

"I always put myself in their place," admits the 38-year-old. "I always think about what conditions they are experiencing and where they come from."

In Israel, Arab women are at the bottom of the food chain when it comes to employment. Only 14 per cent are employed, compared to 57 per cent in the Jewish sector. Many women want to work, but lack of appropriate training, poor public transportation and the demands of a family make finding work extremely problematic.

Baloum is trying to reverse this trend. Since she joined the centre when it was founded in 1997, she has devoted herself to creating new employment opportunities for this disadvantaged sector, working to help more than 3,000 Arab women set up businesses across Israel.

In January, she was honoured for her work when the Ha'aretz-The Marker's magazine TMWomen featured her as one of the top 40 women "making a change in Israeli society." Just a few days earlier, Baloum appeared on the Israeli Internet news site, Ynet, as the manager of Jasmine, a new association of businesswomen in Israel, which was launched by CJAED in September. Ynet included Jasmine among the top 12 social projects of 2006.

Taibe is an Israeli Arab town sandwiched between the Israeli city of Kfar Saba and the West Bank. Like so many such towns and cities, it is poor, run-down and with high unemployment. Baloum's mother never worked, and her father was a construction labourer. Neither of them had much education, but despite this they insisted that all of their children – girls and boys – should study at university.

Kiram Baloum

"We had a lot of encouragement from both my mother and father," Baloum told ISRAEL21c. "There was a lot of emphasis given to the education of the girls." Baloum studied for a BA in education and history, and then took a job managing the lab of the Arab sector and the Palestinian Authority's branch of the Israeli Standards Institute.

When Baloum heard that the CJAED was looking for a director for its new women's unit, which is dedicated to employment solutions for Arab women in Israel, she volunteered for the position.

In the years since then, Baloum has helped found a number of significant projects through the women's empowerment unit. Today, it offers various training courses and workshops, on funding, sales and credit. It has a loan fund that offers grants to women who find it hard to receive credit; eight regional forums for Arab and Jewish businesswomen across the country, which meet regularly and offer support and advice; and Jasmine, which acts as an umbrella organization for all the women's networks across Israel. Other successes include the pickle factory in Tamra and the Asala Desert Nature project in Tel Sheva.

Baloum says the unit emphasizes a multi-faceted approach. Involvement begins with initial training courses that are offered to women interested in setting up in business and continues by mentoring new businesses, including offering pro-bono legal and accounting consultation.

"Until not long ago, even if there were Arab women registered as business owners, they were not active in the business. The goal is to turn them into an integral and important part of the household's economy, and to enable them to realize their personal potential," Baloum told Ha'aretz.

While in recent years, there has been growing pressure for Israeli Arab women to join the workforce, Baloum admits that it is still not easy. "Women always have to be careful to keep the support of their husbands throughout the process. Women who can keep this and involve their husbands are the ones that can achieve the most success. The couple succeeds together," she said.

She cites the Asala Desert Nature project as an example. Set up by Bedouin women from Tel Sheva, the project aims to use desert plants for a line of skin care products and has been running for two years already without profit.

"Despite this, the men are still supporting their wives," says Baloum. "The women don't want to go down the path of their mothers who never worked, and their husbands support them. It's a whole new generation of men and women."

While attitudes toward working women and mothers have begun to change, Baloum admits that attitudes towards career women are taking longer to see a transformation.

"Going out to work. That's not really difficult [but] having a career is," she says. "It can make it difficult in family life – the partner might think of it differently. Any woman with a career devotes two-thirds of her time to that. This comes at the expense of her family and her personal life. The more successful she is, the more she devotes to her career, and this creates problems."

Baloum, who is not married, understands from personal experience that men can be put off by career women. "Men can be frightened of it. It can be threatening to them," she says.

Baloum has many plans for CJAED. She is working constantly to promote continuity at the unit, encouraging women who have already undertaken courses and built successful businesses to share their knowledge with women who are just starting out.

In Taibe, where she still lives, Baloum recently founded Injaz [achievements], to promote education and economic development for women in the town.

When Baloum looks back at her work over the last nine years, she feels her greatest achievement lies in the changes that have taken place in attitudes toward Israeli Arab women starting and running their own businesses.

"That's a result of the work we've undertaken in the last years, not just us, but other organizations as well. There's been a sea change in attitudes," she says proudly.

Three-on-three tourney to support young Ethiopian olim

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

A desire to curb the social and economic divide paralyzing the Ethiopian-Israeli community is the focus of the Hoops 4 Israel basketball fundraiser at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on April 1.

"Our responsibility is to involve the Jewish youth in worthwhile projects. [Toronto is] a great community and we need to show our support and encourage other cities in the Diaspora to do the same," said David Goodman, 24, founder of Hoops 4 Israel.

After returning from a Taglit-birthright israel trip in February 2006, Goodman "felt a profound connection with Israel and its people." He knew he wanted to organize a three-on-three basketball tournament that involved the Jewish community, but selecting the cause proved to be more challenging, he said.

With the guidance of Shauna Waltman, 26, alumni and outreach manager for Canada Israel Experience (CIE), Goodman committed to the Ethiopian cause – a UJA Federation project designed to support Ethiopian-Israeli youth, ages 12 to 17, though athletic activities.

"The entire thing was his idea. I basically helped him make the connections in the Jewish community. I coached him on how to make his dream a reality," Waltman said.

The majority of Ethiopian-Israelis living in the Kiryat Moshe section of Rehovot, 20 kilometres south of Tel Aviv, are immigrants struggling to integrate themselves into the high-paced lifestyle of modern Israel, Goodman said.

According to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, nearly three-quarters of Ethiopian-Israelis are living below the poverty line. The Kiryat Moshe region is among the poorest and most densely populated Ethiopian communities in Israel.

"Many Ethiopian-Israelis are out of touch with society when they first arrive in Israel. With the adults unable to adapt to modern culture, the responsibility falls on the youth. Without direction these youth become stagnant and often turn to crime and drugs," Goodman said.

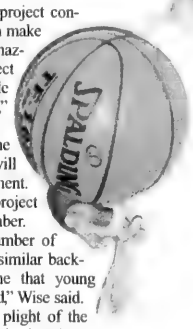
The after-school sports programs are designed to engage the youth in activities that educate and enhance their confidence, teamwork and athletic skills, he said.

"The results show a dramatic learning curve," he added.

Goodman hopes to raise enough money to sponsor two or three soccer teams, each consisting of 30 to 40 Ethiopian youth. With the remaining funds, he wants to build something tangible for the community, like a soccer field or basketball court.

"I'm really proud of him. He's the model of success for the Taglit-birthright israel alumni. When you think of the ideal outcome of a trip, he's a great example. He was not connected to the Jewish community beforehand, and now he's back and showing how youth can be connected," Waltman said.

"The Hoops 4 Israel project confirms that one person can make a difference. It's really amazing to think that this project can inspire so many people – that's the true beauty," she said.



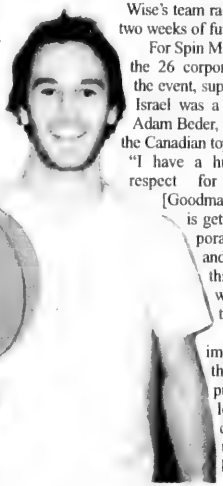
Joseph Wise, 26, is one of 64 young adults who will participate in the tournament. He learned about the project from Goodman in November.

"I've found that a number of the participants are of a similar background which shows me that young adults are getting involved," Wise said.

After researching the plight of the Ethiopian-Israeli community in Kiryat Moshe, Wise felt compelled to assist his fellow Jews.

His interest in supporting Israel and its community motivated him to lead the fundraising initiative for his team of four.

Each of the 16 basketball teams were asked to raise $2,000. "I upped the ante and set our team goal at $5,000," Wise said. "We've set our sights high, but we think it will encourage people to support us. I'm confident we will reach our goal."



David Goodman

Wise's team raised $4,600 after two weeks of fundraising.

For Spin Master Ltd., one of the 26 corporate sponsors of the event, supporting Hoops 4 Israel was a no-brainer, said Adam Beder, vice-president of the Canadian toy company.

"I have a huge amount of respect for what David [Goodman] is doing. He is getting his contemporaries thinking and that permeates throughout the whole community," Beder said.

"I'm impressed that these guys have put it together. A lot of good comes from initiatives like this," he added.

But accolades aside, Goodman remains focused on his goal – $100,000 for Ethiopian-Israeli youth of Kiryat Moshe.

"Whatever praise I receive is gravy. For me, it's all about the cause," Goodman said.

Former major leaguers to manage in IBL

NEW YORK — Ron Blomberg, Ken Holtzman and Art Shamsky, three former Major League players, have been named to manage three of the six teams that will compete in the inaugural season of the Israel Baseball League (IBL).

The IBL will begin play on June 24. A 45-game schedule will culminate in a championship, as Israelis are introduced to the professional game for the first time.

The announcement of the three managers was made by the league's commissioner, Daniel M. Kurtzer, the former U.S. ambassador to Israel.

None of the three have had managing experience before.

Holtzman, 61, is the winningest Jewish pitcher in major league history with a lifetime 174-150 record, compiled over 15 seasons (1965-1979), with the Cubs, Athletics, Orioles, and Yankees. (Sandy Koufax won 165 games). Holtzman hurled two no-hitters for the Chicago Cubs.

Shamsky, 65, played for the Reds, the Mets, the Athletics and the Cubs over eight seasons, (1965-1972), where he was a member of the "Miracle Mets" of 1969, and once hit four consecutive home runs for the Reds. He is the author of The Magnificent Seasons: How the Jets, Mets, and Knicks Made Sports History and Uplifted a City and the Country.

Blomberg, 58, was the nation's number one draft pick in 1967 and spent eight seasons in the majors with the Yankees and White Sox (1969, 1971-76, 1978), earning a footnote of fame as baseball's first designated hitter. He is the author of an autobiography, Designated Hebrew.

Although all three managers are Jewish, rosters will be composed of international players of all races, religions and nationalities, with 20 players per team. Many of the players have been selected from tryout camps run by Dan Duquette, the former general manager of the Montreal Expos and Boston Red Sox, who serves as the IBL's director of baseball operations. Two Toronto-area players, Ian Okorofsky and Daniel Drori, will play in Israel this summer.

A draft will determine the rosters and the teams will be announced later this month.

On tradition

By YONI GOLSTEIN

The good religion stories – the ones with the juicy ordinary-people-in-extraordinary-circumstances hooks – usually involve either the losing or finding of faith.

A near-death experience helps one person see, unquestionably, the hand of God in action, or a religious upbringing set against the revelations of adulthood creates a new atheist – those are the kinds of stories we like.

New Views

But once those dramatic moments fade, faith, whether lost or found, becomes a lifelong ordeal. The maintenance of a religious life, or a non-religious one, is decidedly less interesting, but in many ways the more gripping story. When the adrenalized first moments of revelation are gone, the much more tricky task of preservation begins.

True, that undertaking is quite easy for faith and non-faith extremists alike. Once the atheist accepts science and logic exclusively, there is little to potentially sway his faith.

Similarly, faith maintenance is relatively simple for the deeply religious. For them, the existence of God trumps any and all potential evidence to the contrary.

A large group, though, fall right in the middle of the two extremist camps. And all those run-of-the-mill religious folks are far more conflicted. For them a religious upbringing, complete, let us suppose, with regular trips to houses of prayer and some form of religious education, is countered by lessons learned on the playground, in textbooks and at the office. The average religious person is pulled in two directions at once.

He watches a loved one suffer with cancer or is passed up for a deserved promotion – suddenly the existence of God is questioned. The cancer patient survives and an even better career opportunity comes along – now there is no doubt God is watching.

It's a see-saw battle in which the most banal bits of life – getting stuck in traffic, or finding out you've been upgraded to first class – tend to elicit blessings and curses. It is often an excruciating ride.

For Joe Religious, caught in the middle, tradition can be the ultimate saviour. Tradition marks the point when faith becomes human practice – when religion becomes something tangible. Tradition – the songs we sing, the food we eat, the clothes we wear – turns the maddeningly theoretical into the practical.

I suspect that tradition is the motivating factor for many religious people. Belief in God is a difficult thing to keep up, but tradition is constant – sometimes monotonous, yes, but always there. And it rarely involves much thought, just action.

Consider all the people who mumble archaic words whose meaning they don't fully understand (or care to understand), some of them three times each day: their faith may be lacking – God, after all, commands them to not merely pay lip service to Him – but their sense of tradition is strong. It's what keeps them going.

And you can't ignore tradition. The duty to keep it alive for later generations falls squarely on your shoulders. Your parents practised a set of customs and rituals, as did their parents before them, and their parents before them. Do you want to be responsible for breaking the chain?

Tradition contains the kind of coercive techniques that can only work between family members. The continuation of a blood-link is on the line and you have no right to stop it. Even God doesn't command that kind of respect.

Faith is often a malleable thing – it comes and goes – and a life of frequent, if not constant, uncertainty is rather trying, even if it does make for a good story.

But tradition was here before us and will remain long after we're gone. At best, we add to that history. At the very least, we must not impede the path to its continuity. It's not faith, exactly, but it's certainly religious.

Tradition is constant – neither lost nor found – so perhaps that's why we speak of its profound power so infrequently.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Remembering Our Yesterdays

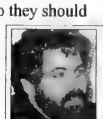
By BILL GLADSTONE

Ellen Drazner of Toronto submitted this photograph of a family Passover seder from the early 1930s. Shown in the centre are Drazner's great-grandparents, Feige and Mendel Averson, with her grandparents, Laz Tinkoff and Veda (nee Averson) to Mendel's left. Like the fictional Tevye, Mendel drove a milk wagon and had not five but six daughters – three were born in Russia and three in Canada. The family lived on Hutchison Street in Montreal. Descendants plan to meet in June for a family reunion, Drazner reports.

A yeshiva bochur and Sudan

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Yeshiva is a mysterious world to many. It can appear to be insulated and disconnected from universal issues. Indeed there are yeshivot whose goal is to create a wall between the students and the outside world so they should not be influenced by "bad" forces. However, there are yeshivot that encourage their students to be aware of external challenges and allow them to investigate them.



URBAN WRITER

The following is a letter I received from Moishe Lipener, a Torontonian studying at Yeshivat Hesder Ma'alot Yaakov. The letter describes his experiences in yeshiva as he attempts to raise the consciousness of his fellow yeshiva bochurim about the genocide in another mysterious place – Darfur. (Moishe asked me to make sure I mention his father, David, who inspired him to take action).

"I've become more disturbed by the situation in Darfur as I continue to enjoy my studies in Israel… and I am also disturbed by the realization Israel is failing to respond to Darfur," Moishe wrote.

"Israel! My own country! These are the people that know oppression and persecution like no other. These are the people that bewildered individuals like Mark Twain, who said, 'All things are mortal but the Jew... What is the secret of his immortality?'

"These are the people that ask, 'Where was the world during the Holocaust?' Indeed, where was the world? I'll tell you: the world was sitting indifferently just as you are right now in the faces of the victims of Darfur!

"Recently, I had a long and heated argument with Israelis at my yeshiva. I brought up Darfur, to which all of them Israelis replied, "Mah ze Darfur? (What is this Darfur?)" At first I sat in shock, followed by a sick pain to my stomach. I said, 'You don't know what Darfur is?' and then words started spewing out of my mouth, describing Darfur and the tragedy, the biggest being the world's silence.

"The boys said, 'Hmm. That's horrible,' which was a way of saying, 'Too bad, but its Africa and there's nothing I can do.' Two remained interested, however. I told them how uncomfortable I was that Israelis know less than North Americans do in this matter, and how the government has sat in silence.

"They responded with, 'Well, what can Israel do? It's a little and helpless country can barely defend itself. We have enough of our own problems.' I was outraged! 'I can understand your argument that Israel isn't capable of supplying enough soldiers, but what about a political stance?'

"They responded, 'We are such a small country. Why would the world… care about what we say?'

"'Hello! Your little country nobody cares about is on the front page of newspapers almost daily! It's Darfur!' – I was furious.

"We then debated further on Darfur's similarity to the Holocaust. I said Darfur is so frightening to people, even the Jews don't respond to it. Their side of the debate was it was just so 'different'… however, they couldn't prove how. The debate ended by me blasting them with, 'Darfur is different than the Holocaust because you want it to be.' And I left the room disturbed. Here I am writing about it two months later.

"I have since been in touch with HaED – Hatzilu et Amei Darfur – an Israeli student group helping to end the genocide in Darfur. They told me to get started by raising awareness, [they] sent me a dozen files consisting of 'How to start a branch for HaED,' volunteer sign-up sheets, as well as a design I could put on a T-shirt to wear around the yeshiva stating, "Mi zeh Darfur?" (Who is Darfur?)

"Concerned for Darfur, Moishe Lipener

"P.s.: I owe the yeshiva a lot – especially for my thought processes – including Darfur."

The feel of freedom

Editorial

We do not know the age of the young woman in the accompanying photo. She could be 12, she could be 18. Her expression has as much wariness in it as it does happiness. And her eyes convey suspicion as well as relief.

But we do know she has just embarked on a new life of freedom and possibility. For she was one of 300 Falash Mora immigrants who arrived in Israel last month from Ethiopia.

This young, strikingly lovely new immigrant to Israel has just completed her own trek of Exodus and Redemption.

But she wears the feel of her new-found freedom tentatively. She has every right to.

Her new life in Israel will be fraught with many difficulties. Language will be a barrier. The ways of a modern, western world – at least at first – will no doubt be a perplexing maze of frustration. Her family will likely live at or near the line of poverty.

As a Falash Mora – Jews who converted to Christianity several generations ago – her absorption into Israeli society might be even doubly problematic. Though they have been accepted as Jews by Israel's chief rabbinate and by the three major North American Jewish religious movements, many Falash Mora are suspected by other Ethiopians as being fraudulent Jews.

According to Israel's Interior Ministry, 11,264 Ethiopian Falash Mora have come to Israel since 2004. As of 2005, some 72,000 immigrants in all have come to Israel from Ethiopia since 1948.

It is a remarkable record of compassion and rescue.

Every year, they escape to the tiny Jewish state, essentially singing a song from their own personal Haggadah.

Sixty years ago, less than two years after World War II ended and the Nazi killings stopped, and fully 13 months before the Jews of Palestine would proclaim the State of Israel, the legendary poet and writer A.M. Klein mused in an editorial in the Canadian Jewish Chronicle about whether it was time for our sages and scribes to write a new Haggadah.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Flag-raising Planned

TORONTO — Israel's Consulate in Toronto will mark Yom Ha'atzmaut with an April 24 flag-raising ceremony at Queen's Park, the consulate said last week. Speeches by dignitaries will also take place.

WORLD

Ghetto Claims Nixed

NEW YORK— Germany has been rejecting most applications for ghetto pensions, the Claims Conference said last week. Some 61,000 applications have been denied, out of 70,000 filed. The ghetto pension law, enacted in 1997 and expanded in 2002, covers Shoah survivors who were employed for pay during internment in Nazi ghettos annexed to the Third Reich. Such work periods count toward German social security. Problems faced by applicants include being told their ghetto didn't exist at the times claimed or that certain categories of labour are excluded.

Agency Seeks Funds

NEW YORK— The Jewish Agency for Israel says it wants to double the $140 million it gets each year from North American Jewry. The agency's newly reconstituted North America Council met in New York last week to figure out ways to raise funds for the agency's work. The council's leaders said it's needed to promote key programs and get more cash from donors.

Deportation Urged

CHICAGO — The U.S. Justice Department is seeking to deport a World War II-era ghetto guard. It asked an immigration judge to order the deportation of Chicago resident Osyp Firishchak, 87, who is accused of involvement in the killing of Jews in the Lvov Ghetto through his participation in the Nazi-sponsored Ukrainian Auxiliary Police in 1941. He allegedly rounded up Jews, imprisoned them in ghettos, terrorized them, oversaw forced labour, killed those trying to escape and sent others to mass execution. Firishchak entered the United States in 1949 and became a citizen in 1954.

Cash For Campers

ATLANTA— The Jewish Funders Network and the Foundation for Jewish Camping announced a matching-grants initiative to increase the number of Jewish campers over the next four to five years. President Mark Charendoff announced the plan at the JFN's annual conference in Atlanta last week. It will give grants of $25,000 to $50,000 to communities for first-time campers attending overnight summer camps. It's part of a larger foundation initiative to triple the number of Jewish campers within four to five years. The foundation received an anonymous $15-million gift to create matching programs. It's the largest-ever single gift for Jewish camping.

Jews Seek U.S. Asylum

PARIS — More than 7,000 French Jews have sent a petition to the U.S. Congress asking for political asylum in the United States because of anti-Semitism in France. "Following the barbarous murder of a young Jew because he was Jewish, in the context of the rise in anti-Semitic acts committed by Islamic fundamentalists, numerous members of the community no longer feel safe in France," reads the petition, referring to Ilan Halimi, a 23-year-old Parisian Jew who was kidnapped and tortured to death last year by an anti-Semitic gang. French communal officials reacted with outrage. "This petition is bizarre, stupid and out of place," Haim Musicant, director of CRIF, the umbrella organization of secular French Jewish groups, told Israel's Ma'ariv newspaper. "I don't feel threatened in France, and the authorities are doing everything they can to protect the Jewish community. French Jews don't need this kind of petition."

Canadian Host Removes Terror Website

TORONTO — A website traced to a military faction of Fatah that advocated the destruction of Israel has been removed from a Montreal-based host computer.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies said last week that it brought the site to the attention of iWEB Technologies, the hosting company, which then "quickly responded to our request and removed the terror site."

The Arabic-language site was registered to someone living in Khan Younis, Gaza. It was called Detachments of Martyr Ahmed Abualrish and featured a masked gunman alongside a map of Israel superimposed on rifles and images of "martyrs."

"Our translation of the website exposed the group as a military faction of Fatah in Gaza dedicated to 'the liquidation of the Zionist entity – politically, culturally, militarily and economically,'" Michael Ettedgui, the centre's education associate, said in a statement. It also asserted that "armed revolution is the only way to free Palestine."

Researchers discovered the site while preparing Digital Terrorism & Hate 2007, the centre's annual CD-ROM report on Internet extremism.

Hate crimes reach new high, audit reports

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada surged by 12.8 per cent in 2006 over the year before, reaching an all-time high of 935 – the greatest number ever recorded by B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) in its annual Audit of Anti-Semitic Incidents.

The audit noted that since it began collecting data in 1997, the number of incidents has more than quadrupled. In 1997, 212 incidents were reported and by 2001, that had grown to 286. The numbers really shot up the next year, the first full year of the Palestinian intifadah, jumping to 459. It has increased rapidly ever since, with a slight drop only in 2005.

The increase in Canada matches similar jumps in anti-Semitic occurrences in other parts of the world, including Britain, Australia and the United States, the report stated.

"Here at home, there was a dangerous spillover of overseas tensions in everyday life. During the summer of 2006, Jewish individuals and community organizations were targeted by persistent phone and e-mail abuse, which often included intimidation and direct physical threats. A bomb threat against a synagogue, an attack against a rabbi and the delivery to a Jewish family, under the cloak of darkness, of the head of a decapitated pig, were amongst the kind of incidents being reported to the League [for Human Rights of BBC]."

"In the overwhelming majority of incidents documented during this period, the perpetrators themselves left no doubt as to the Middle East connection and often characterized the acts as 'revenge' on the Jewish people. Of the total number of incidents in Canada, 131 had a clear and explicit reference to the Middle East conflict, with 95 of these incidents taking place in July and August," the audit reported.

The audit broke down the incidents into three categories – harassment, vandalism and violence. Of the 935 cross-Canada events reported, 63 per cent were considered harassment, 34 per cent vandalism and three per cent (30 cases) were considered violent.

Perhaps the most egregious assault on Jews took place in early September when an Orthodox boys school in Montreal was hit with a Molotov cocktail. The incident took place less than two years after a Jewish elementary school in Montreal was firebombed.

A second spike in incidents occurred in February, when 134 events – 14.3 per cent of the total – were reported. That period corresponded to another world event – the widespread anger at a Danish periodical for publishing cartoons of Mohammed.

Another international influence on local behaviour was attributed to the Iranian Holocaust-denial conference, which encouraged local extremists, the audit suggested.

The Greater Toronto Area (GTA), home to the single largest number of Canadian Jews, experienced the greatest number of incidents. "The GTA has consistently been the highest reporting area; the 2006 total of 445 (48 per cent) is the highest number ever recorded for any city in the history of the audit," the report stated.

About 13 per cent of the incidents were reported in the rest of Ontario and 24 per cent occurred in Quebec, the vast majority in Montreal.

Manitoba Jews experienced 25 incidents, down from a high of 55 in 2004 – although that included vandalism against three synagogues "that resulted in substantial damage."

The number of incidents in British Columbia increased slightly from 42 to 43, although in 2002 only five events were reported overall.

The audit noted that even though Jews make up roughly one per cent of the population of Canada, "police hate crimes reports continue to show that Jews are amongst the most targeted groups in Canada, and, at times, the most targeted group."

Even in regions with large Muslim populations, such as Peel Region west of Toronto, where there are 18 times as many Muslims as Jews, "police reports for the region indicate that Jews were targeted in 29 per cent of all cases reported in 2006, followed by Blacks in 27 per cent of cases. Despite popular perceptions that Muslims are usually the most victimized community, in fact this group was victimized in just eight per cent of the cases in Peel Region."

That result mirrored police findings in Toronto and by the FBI in the United States, the audit stated.

Pesach preparation

From the editor's desk

In the last few years, it has been my habit to bring newly available Passover materials and seder resources to readers' attention. The following two items came across my desk last week.

And You Thought There Were Only Four, by Joe Bobker (Gefen Publishing House), is a helpful aid in preparing for the seder and to assist at the seder in posing and answering questions to and from the inquisitive minds around the table.

The "four" in the title refers to the four questions asked at the seder typically by the youngest, school-age child.

Bobker's book is a compendium of 400 questions whose purpose, as the cover of the book states, is "to make your seder enlightening, educational and enjoyable."

The author does not simply pose the questions; he answers them as well. They fall into three broad categories: the exodus story and its message; Pesach preparations, customs and laws; and the seder night.

Ranging from light and fluffy to weighty and serious, the questions cover a wide range of topics that emerge directly and indirectly from the Haggadah. They touch upon theology, history, folklore, Halachah, philosophy, ethnic sociology and any other number of subjects.

The wide range in subject matter and in the variously scholarly, anecdotal, street-wise or conversational style of answer attests to the author's desire to benefit as many individuals as possible. There are questions for every curiosity and for every background.

And so, too, are the answers.

For example, in the section dealing with the Exodus story and its message, Bobker asks: "Is there any reason why the Egyptians met their end through drowning." He answers: "Yes. When Pharaoh realizes his extermination plan to co-opt midwives into Jewish infanticide isn't working, he conscripts 'all his people' in a national effort to drown all Jewish male firstborns in the Nile. Since Pharaoh chose water as his murder weapon, God repaid him in kind by drowning the Egyptians."

Or, in the chapter dealing with Pesach preparations, customs and laws, he asks: What is Shabeh Sal? The answer: "Unlike Ashkenazi Jews, Sephardim traditionally celebrate the end of Pesach with partying. In Morocco, the celebration was called Mimouna; in Iran, Persian Jews had Shabeh Sal, replete with sweets and tea drinking (dates, no sugar) in the home of the eldest member of the family. The next day, Persian Jews would picnic in grassy shaded areas, an ancient minhag (custom) known as Roozah Sal…"

The book would benefit considerably by having an index of subjects. But the author's obvious love for his co-religionists and attempt to impart as much information as possible to help us all enjoy the holiday even more, permeates the work.

The Jewish Theological Seminary and the Center for Online Jewish Studies has developed a new website specifically dedicated to the holiday and the myriad traditions and customs that make it so special.

Passover Through History: A Teaching Site includes approximately 100 images of ancient documents, traditional teachings, medieval illuminated Haggadot, and modern artistic elaborations of the Passover and Exodus. The site can be accessed at www.passoversite.org.

Some of the highlights of the site include images from a Haggadah found in the Cairo Genizah that dates to approximately 1000 CE, the Prato Haggadah (circa 1300), a rare illuminated manuscript of Sephardi rituals and the Pessach Haggadah in Memory of the Holocaust (1985), a modern, artistic commentary on the Holocaust and Passover.

The site is primarily aimed at educators and students. But it is a trove of visual and textual treasures. Anyone interested in expanding his or her knowledge of the holiday and the way it has been celebrated over the years will benefit from a visit to the site.

Unrelated to the Passover holiday, but noteworthy in its own right, was the feeling of delight and celebration CJN staff shared when Key Porter Press recently launched Holding My Breath, the debut novel of the young writer Sidura Ludwig.

Ludwig was the very first summer intern to be hired by The CJN, some 10 years ago. As many reviewers and delighted readers have noted, she is a very talented writer.

The book ("Author's first novel set in Winnipeg creates a big splash," CJN, Feb. 15) tells the tale of a young woman growing up in Winnipeg who must reconcile the often seemingly irreconcilable aspirations she quietly nurtures for herself with the very different aspirations for her future rather volubly expressed by her family.

With the pride akin to that of a parent for a child, we note this wonderful achievement by a stylish, thoughtful, intelligent writer and convey to her our heartfelt congratulations.

And we also recommend her book to our readers.

Migration study finds Toronto a haven for Jews

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A new study on Jewish migration within Canada confirms what many have been saying for years: Toronto is the primary magnet for Jews across the country, while Montreal's community continues to lose members.

Last month, UIA Federation of Canada (UIAFC) released the final chapter of its national Jewish demographic study, based on the 2001 Canadian census and special order tabulations requested by UIAFC from Statistics Canada.

Titled The Jewish Community of Canada Part IX: Mobility Patterns and authored by Montreal demographer Charles Shahar, this final piece looks at Jewish migration within the country between 1996 and 2001.

The report acknowledges that the data is "somewhat dated, [but] they nonetheless offer important insights into the movements of Jews across Canada."

Toronto experienced the largest influx of intra-country Jewish migrants during the five-year period studied, with a net gain of 2,300 people, while Montreal witnessed the biggest exodus, with a net loss of 2,230 Jews.

With regard to migration between the two major metropolitan centres, Highway 401 was a busy thoroughfare during that time.

Migration from Montreal to Toronto topped out at 2,255 Jews, while only 510 Toronto Jews left the Big Smoke for la belle ville.

Montreal experienced a net loss of 1,300 university-educated Jews to the rest of the country, with more than 1,000 of those relocating to Toronto.

In an interview with The CJN, Shahar noted that the Quebec referendum at the end of 1995 may have played a part in the out-migration from Montreal between 1996 and 2001.

Nevertheless, "the patterns likely continued [since 2001], but probably not as intensively," Shahar said.

Other communities growing due to the arrival of inbound Jews included Ottawa and Calgary, both with a net gain of 315 people, followed by Hamilton with a net gain of 170 Jews.

Vancouver experienced a net loss of just 40 people, while Halifax saw some 30 Jews leave for other parts of Canada.

The report also looked at Jewish immigration patterns during the same period and found that once again, the largest stream of Jews (10,370) flowed into Toronto from foreign lands, with Montreal (3,060) and Vancouver (1,750) welcoming the next-largest numbers.

UIAFC's study didn't tally how many Jews emigrated from Canada.

Other highlights of the report include the suggestion of a "brain-drain" from Winnipeg's Jewish community, with the city experiencing a net loss of 265 people to the rest of Canada from 1996 to 2001, 180 of whom were university educated.

(Winnipeg Jewish leaders estimate that the community may have grown by about 500 people since the 2001 census as a result of an effort by the city's Jewish federation to attract immigrants to the Manitoba capital.)

The UIAFC analysis used the "Jewish standard definition" formulated in 1981 by McGill University professor Jim Torczyner.

It uses three possible criteria to distinguish Jews from non-Jews: Jewish by religion and ethnicity, Jewish by religion and having another ethnicity, or Jewish by ethnicity with no religious affiliation.

The total Jewish population of Canada currently stands at just above 370,000.

Israeli Rape Crisis Centre seeks Canadian support

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jerusalem Rape Crisis Center in Memory of Linda Feldman (JRCC) has come a long way since it was established in 1981, said Jane Jacobs, the centre's development director.

Jacobs spoke recently at the home of Paul and Janice Feldman in Toronto about the work being done in Israel at the JRCC, and encouraged Canadians to become active participants in the centre's evolution.

"We're looking to set up a Canadian friends [of JRCC] in the hope that there can be some long-term support from the community to the centre, being that there is a special Toronto connection," Jacobs said.

The JRCC, which is a registered charity in Israel, was named after Linda Feldman, one of the organization's founding volunteers. She was an olah from Toronto, who died tragically in a car accident in 1981.

"The Israeli rape crisis movement was essentially founded to fill a gap, but foremost to provide support for victims, to spread awareness about how to reduce risks and where to seek help," Jacobs said.

Jane Jacobs, development director of the Jerusalem Rape Crisis Center explains why the centre is such an essential service in Israel. [Sheri Shefa photo]

She added that it also tries to break the silence about sexual violence, advocate and lobby for public legislation and policy change, improve the treatment of the victims of violence and lobby for harsher punishments for perpetrators of sexual violence.

Since the first rape crisis centre opened in Tel Aviv in 1978, nine more have opened all over Israel, including one that caters to the needs of Orthodox Jewish women, and one for Arab women.

In 1990, an umbrella organization for the 10 centres was created, called the Association of Rape Crisis Centers in Israel (ARCCI).

While each centre works within its respective community to provide immediate support to victims, the ARCCI works on a national level in hope of creating change within Israeli society and government legislation.

"Those of you who follow Israeli news at the moment can see that we're not short of stuff to deal with. A lot of our public figures and politicians are involved in very unfortunate cases," she said, referring to the rape charges against Israeli President Moshe Katsav and the recent sexual misconduct conviction of Israel's former justice minister Haim Ramon, who forcibly kissed a young female soldier.

Jacobs said that although many efforts have been made in the past 25 years to change the way sexual crimes are perceived in Israel, advocates have not succeeded in making many changes in legislation.

"The sentences are still much too short in Israel, and the woman who has been assaulted is often called as a witness in the case. There is even an option for her to be cross-examined by the perpetrator or the attacker and she has to be a witness. Sometimes, she is the only witness, and often it won't even go to court because she is the only witness."

She said that as early as 10 years ago, there were Israeli citizens who were unaware that they even had the right to complain about sexual abuse.

Thanks to the efforts of the volunteers and professionals at the rape crisis centres, they now know they have support.

Nevertheless, Jacobs said, there is much to be done.

"Israeli society still has a long way to go in terms of acknowledging that there is a problem with sexual violence and acknowledging what needs to be done."

In addition to dealing with victims of sexual violence, the rape crisis centres also provide hundreds of workshops a year for students and soldiers, as well as training for police to properly deal with those who report sexual abuse and rape.

She said the workshops are great tools because they often encourage people to speak out about their experience and get help.

Jacobs said that while the number of calls have increased over the years, it doesn't necessarily mean that there are more incidents, but there is more awareness of the centres and better accessibility.

"We changed the phone number to 1202, so now, wherever you are in Israel, wherever you're dialing from, you dial 1202 and you get put through to the rape crisis centre geographically closest to you."

However, Jacobs suggested that perhaps many women don't use the service at times because they feel guilty about turning their backs on the nation during a difficult time.

She said the fact that the centres' phones fall silent when the country is at war, is an indication that victims put the needs of the nation ahead of their own.

"In 2002, during Operation Defensive Shield during the intifadah, the three weeks when they went into Jenin and the whole country was under siege, the phone was completely quiet. It did not ring for three weeks... When the country is suffering, that is what preoccupies people, not their personal problems."

She said that while there are women's shelters and safe houses in Israel, no other organization provides the services that the rape crisis centres do.

"We are known as the Magen David Adom of these services. We will clean up the immediate mess, and should they need it, we'll be with them for the long haul."

For more information about JRCC and other centres, visit http://www.1202.org.il/English.

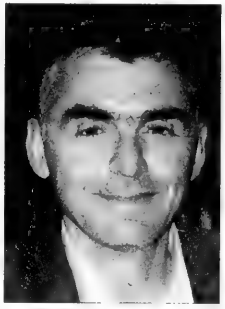
Israeli environment group plants local seeds

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a great seasonal migration perhaps sparked by a primordial unconscious reflex, great hordes of Israelis pack up their camping gear and head outdoors for a weekend communion with nature.

It's the time of year when spring is in the air and Israel's wide open spaces beckon.

As thousands venture into the green fields and lush meadows of Israel's north, or the rocky and sandy desert in the south, chances are that their great outdoor adventure will rely to some extent on the field schools, guides or nature reserves put in place by the Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel (SPNI).



Moshe Shemma

One of Israel's most popular non-governmental organizations, the 53-year-old SPNI has made the preservation and enjoyment of Israel's flora and fauna its mission.

The organization boasts close to 100,000 member families, is "a brand name in Israel" and is now hoping to establish a support group among Canadian Jews along the lines of its U.S. affiliate.

Moshe Shemma, director of resource development and international relations for SPNI, was in Toronto recently for a series of meetings with potential supporters and to brief community leaders and students about Israeli environmental issues.

The SPNI addresses the environment on a number of levels, Shemma told The CJN. It operates field schools/camping areas across the country; it lobbies for urban green spaces; it pushed for a ban on further development along the Mediterranean coast; it educates children about the benefits of preserving the environment; it trains field guides; it urges people to give up their cars for mass transit and walking; and it operates programs that assist Ethiopian youths integrate into Israeli society.

One of the organization's biggest victories was registered only a few weeks ago, when after years of lobbying, SPNI convinced government authorities to halt a proposed development in western Jerusalem. The development, designed by renowned architect Moshe Safdie, would have seen construction of 20,000 new apartments in the Jerusalem Forest.

SPNI was able to convince legislators there was room to build 20 apartment buildings on land within urban Jerusalem. They also pushed the argument that expansion to the periphery would attract young families and hollow out the city's core, he said.

"It took four years of battle until the government decided to cancel the programs...We had the ability to show them there were much more efficient ways to strengthen Jerusalem and they need not destroy the forest," Shemma said.

Similarly, SPNI helped reverse a government decision to create a development community in Gilboa, near Beit Shean. There are already two small development towns in the area, neither of which are particularly successful, he said. Why expend the resources to create a new one?

Shemma said SPNI had to counter the view of government officials who felt they were only being consistent with the Zionist credo of building communities. "I say you can be Zionist without building a new settlement. If you strengthen existing settlements, you are just as Zionistic.

"We are not against building," Shemma continued. "We are for it, but you have to do it wisely, considering the environment and keeping it for our children."

SPNI succeeded in another political battle, convincing lawmakers after eight years of lobbying to enact legislation to prevent development within 300 metres of the Mediterranean coast. "It was a victory," Shemma said, "but it came a little late for us. One hundred kilometres of 180 kilometres of Mediterranean is already built up."

A similar effort to protect the shore of the Sea of Galilee and make it accessible to the public though a walking path is now under way. Currently, private individuals and settlements have erected 120 fences at various points around the northern lake – many of them illegal – and "we are raising awareness within the public and government to stop it."

SPNI's field schools have proven popular with Israelis and foreign visitors. They are particularly popular with hikers and they offer a good place to bed down. "They are not five-star hotels. They are 100,000 stars, as you can sleep outside," he quipped.

At the field schools, "you can feel and see the environment without any obstacles."

Although the great outdoors is their purview, the SPNI's base is in five urban centres: Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa, Beer Sheva and Modiin. Volunteers man the centres which are used to educate local students about SPNI's work.

Smaller field study centres in Akko, Shlomi, Ma'alot, Netivot and Sderot are also run by the SPNI. Working with the co-operation of the Israel Defence Forces, they operate a special program for soldiers who spend one year of their service working in the development towns, educating youngsters about the environment. In addition they plant public gardens that beautify the towns while helping children develop a sense of pride in their communities.

SPNI believes "we have to take responsibility for nature and wildlife. It's our responsibility, otherwise nobody will do it. Sustainability is not just a word, but something you have to live with."

Shemma noted that 14 per cent of Israel is covered by roads or urban spaces and a further 20 per cent belongs to the Jewish National Fund. The rest is state land. "I think SPNI is responsible for the other 66 per cent. Nobody gave us this land, but it's our responsibility," he said.

Lawyer Keith Landy, an SPNI supporter in Toronto, is helping the organization get a footprint in Canada. He would like to see creation of a Canadian branch of the organization.

It would have a natural attraction for "people who want to be involved with Israel, who have a love of the country, for its nature and environment.

"This is a way for young people, old people, people who feel saturated by world events but who have a visceral and deeply held love for Israel to get involved," he said.

7th Step aims to help underprivileged youth

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Aaron Roll has started a program to combat the moral decline, weakening nationalism and rising poverty levels in Israel.

He is one of the founders of The 7th Step, a non-profit, educational and social program that aims to provide underprivileged Israeli youth with the opportunity to break the cycle of poverty and strengthen their bond to Israel.

"Instead of asking what can I do for my country, they're asking what can my country do for me," he said, adding that this isn't just a phrase made famous by U.S. president John F. Kennedy – in Israel, this is a reality.

"Israel exists in a very hostile environment surrounded by half a billion Arabs and more than a billion Muslims," most of whom hate Israel, he said.

"Israel cannot survive without some kind of nationalism that will bond people together in resisting the threat that is threatening its survival."

But a weakening sense of nationalism and existential threats are not the only challenges facing Israel today.

"There is a big chunk of poor people in Israel. It is estimated that a third of the nation is living under the poverty level," said Roll, who served four years in the Israeli Defence Forces, 21 years as a reservist, and now resides in Toronto.

"Someone that belongs to a poor family, a low income family, has no chance to rise above it."

Roll said that when his colleagues visited the homes of the potential participants to interview them, they couldn't believe what they saw.

He said he was told that the homes had no furniture, and they relied on weekly food packages from Chabad to be able to eat.

Roll believes that the poverty issue stems from a lack of education.

"We would like to break the [cycle of poverty]. We'd like to take kids from those environments and empower them… so that they can acquire a proper education and be able to support themselves and their environment," Roll said.

The 7th Step, a biblical phrase that refers to a person's self-sufficiency, offers youth the opportunity to learn about their roots, religion, and the nation's history, and will take them on field trips to strengthen their ties to Israel, educate them, and improve their chances of success in Israeli society.

The three-year program, designed for 15-18-year-olds, who then go off to serve in the army, also offers high-level courses in physics, biology, and politics.

At the end of the program, the students will have credits recognized by University of Haifa – the equivalent of a full year of university education – which will give them a head start in acquiring a post-secondary education.

Although Roll came up with the program's concept in 2005, the first pilot course is currently taking place in the northern Israeli town of Karmiel, where The 7th Step is getting a lot of support from the mayor, the schools in the area, and even economics professors from University of Haifa who have signed on to take teach courses.

"We are not replacing the education system, we are adding to the education system," he said, adding that the courses take place after classes and on the weekends.

He said that while the school system prepares students to be knowledgeable in the maths and sciences, students do not come out of high school adequately prepared for life in the real world.

"We are not just preparing them for higher education. We are giving them lessons in entrepreneurship. We are preparing them for… independent life," he said.

He said that on top of providing the students with field trips and courses, they also provide the students with meals while they are on tour, and hope that in the future, they'll be able to provide their families with the bare necessities as well.

There are currently 18 kids taking part in the pilot program that began in January and will last until October. Roll and his team hope to improve on the curriculum, and expand into other cities in both northern and southern Israel.

"We want to do the right thing because after all, we are dealing with kids. We're dealing with Israel's future."

It's Nobody's Choice… But Your Own.

Nobody can dictate which funeral chapel a family must use. By law, there are no formal or binding agreements between synagogues, burial societies, cemeteries, and funeral chapels.

Deciding on a funeral chapel is an important family decision. The decision is yours; the choice is clear.

A very precious thing

But he rejected the idea, because "the old Haggadah still remain[ed] the better narrative of liberation," and moreover, the "contemporary nightmare, was… still going on."

Hitler's legacy, he pointed out, had not yet dissipated.

The Jewish people, indeed the world, was still in the searing aftermath of the dark, sorrowful years of the Nazi oppression. The soil of Europe was soaked with the blood of millions upon millions of human beings, slaughtered upon the altar of racist Nazi ideology.

Cities still lay in ruin.

The powdered ashes of burnt bodies still clung to trees and shrubs like a patina of grey adhesive.

And countless thousands of stateless, homeless individuals seethed in crowded displaced persons camps in the very country from which the angel of death was set loose upon Europe to annihilate every man, woman and child who did not fit the prescribed Aryan order.

In Mandatory Palestine, the Jews – or Palestinians, as the Jews were then called – were fighting for their lives and for the right to live free and sovereign in their own homeland.

Seven months later, the United Nations would vote to partition the already partitioned land into an Arab and a Jewish state, and the war against the Jews would be launched in earnest.

The Arab world was unyielding and uncompromising in its refusal to accept even the smallest sovereign Jewish presence in the Middle East. Arab intransigence was encouraged by the harsh anti-Jewish policies of the British foreign minister, Ernest Bevin. And Arab incitement against the Jews served merely to whet the stone on which Arab armies and irregulars would soon be waging the sword of war.

But in April 1947, the creation of a Jewish state was very much in doubt. Indeed, the very survival of the Jews of Palestine was in doubt.

The Jewish world feared for the lives of the Jews of Palestine. That fear is seldom recalled today.

Klein tried to place the holiday of freedom into its historical context. His words are as true and as inspiring today as they were when he wrote them six decades ago.

"The chief glory of the Haggadah, we need hardly say, is the fact that it records the passage of a people from bondage to freedom; and from that freedom, to great constructive achievement.

"We will build our hopes and our actions upon the formula provided by the scholars of Bnei Brak, who engaged in the narration of the miracles of the Exodus until the dawn arrived. Hence our faith that the promise of the Promised Land must be fulfilled; hence our faith in the immortality of our people… It is true that difficulties may beset our way; it is true that there may be much wandering in the desert; but the end of the story is pre-ordained. For us, only to hasten that conclusion."

There is no denying our young new immigrant will not lead an easy life. But she will, thankfully, have life, because of the tiny, beleaguered, mostly maligned Jewish state.

One day our young immigrant will feel her freedom more boldly and embrace it less tentatively with a smile that will say to the world: here, truly, is a very precious thing.

Chag samayach. Happy holiday of freedom.

CJC's high-calibre advocacy work

I read with some consternation Harold M. Waller's article "Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past'" (Perspectives, CJN, March 15) about the structural changes that have occurred within the Canadian Jewish community over the past 35 years, and especially over the last three with the advent of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA).

Waller's general description of these changes seems to me to be accurate, but the ultimate conclusion about Congress (as summarized in your headline), in my view, is not. I am not sure exactly what you mean by "glory days," but the advocacy work that Congress does is still (as it always was) of the highest calibre. Regardless of who funds Congress, this organization is still seen by many Canadians as the voice of the Jewish community, and it is a body that has, over time, established incredibly valuable and mutually respectful connections with many of Canada's other ethnic and religious communities. These long-term connections and advocacy efforts are priceless. And it is only because of these that (to mention just one example) Congress was recently able to persuade the United Church of Canada not to adopt a potentially very damaging divestment resolution regarding Israel.

IT'S A MIRACLE!

SHHHH ABOUT THE GOLDEN CALVES

As someone who has been involved, as a layperson, with numerous advocacy organizations (both Jewish and non-Jewish) over the past 20 years (but none of them within the mainstream Jewish community), it was precisely because of my respect for the quality of the advocacy work done by Congress that three years ago I agreed to become one of its officers.

Headline doesn't reflect article's content

Harold M. Waller has done our community a service by providing such a detailed portrait of the past and balanced analysis of future trends. However, the CJN headline writer has done a disservice to the complexity of Waller's inquiry, and to the Canadian Jewish Congress by unnecessarily capping the article with words of disparagement toward Congress ("Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past,'" Perspectives, CJN, March 15).

The article makes plain that Jewish advocacy is going through a profound refocusing in order to meet the challenges now faced by our community. Long-needed modifications in priorities, perceptions and mechanisms of accountability are being put into place under the strategic leadership of CJC's national president Ed Morgan, CJC's CEO Bernie Farber and the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's CEO Hershell Ezrin. Yet instead of stressing these enterprising changes, the headline writer decided to be derisive toward the CJC. Whatever for?

Surely it would have been more reflective of the content of the article to headline it, "CJC redefines Jewish advocacy needs," or the like. That way, The CJN would also have kept faith with an indispensable organization that, while in the midst of a significant restructuring, continues to be the most effective voice in our community on domestic and many international issues.

Jewish organizations not representative

In his article "Organized Canadian Jewry: past and present" (Perspectives, CJN, March 8), Harold M. Waller suggests that the organized Jewish community in the form of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA), federations and subsidiary and affiliated organizations across Canada is an authentic, authoritative representation of the Jewish community in general. This is quite a stretch for two reasons.

First, Jews belong to synagogues, for example, primarily for worship and affiliation, not community politics. Similarly, financial contributions to the UJA have more to do with charity than politics. To suggest that participating charitably with the UJA is an indicator of allegiance to its policies is disingenuous to be sure, particularly since the UJA, and perhaps Waller as well, would rather assume tacit support than actually test it.

Can any organization claim to be representative if they do not consult the people that they represent? UJA Federation of Greater Toronto provides no public forums and has refused repeated requests to establish them. Its volunteer governors are self-selected. Their fear is the same as Pharaoh's: if Jews communicated to each other in real time on a regular basis, they might not be very accepting of federation's major initiatives and seek to overthrow it.

Just look at federation's record and current priorities. While arguably it responds effectively to anti-Semitism, it has bungled the issue of public funding for day schools in Ontario at least twice, it continues to be ineffective on reversing assimilation trends, and rather than extend support to the thousands of poor in our community, the federation is convinced that its 50-acre fantasy land will do wonders. And it will, for senior Jewish civil servants.

Passover in Sderot: standing firm in the face of terror

By RABBI AVI BAUMOL

"Mah nishtanah halailah hazeh" – "How is this night different from all other nights? We were once slaves in Egypt, but God redeemed us, bringing us out from the land to freedom."

Very soon Jews from around the world will chant this familiar refrain, as we have done at the Passover seder throughout the ages. During the reading of the Haggadah, we will solemnly recount the pain, humiliation and suffering endured by our people in Egypt, but we will also rejoice at the miraculous turn of events – the sudden salvation, redemption and freedom.

Some of the spent shells of the thousands of Qassam rockets that have been launched against Sderot.

Symbolically, we eat bitter herbs, but quickly transition to the sweetness of the wine and charoset (a pasty delicacy symbolizing mortar), and then recline to show that we are as safe and secure as kings in a palace.

There are some, however, who will not share our sense of security this year. These people, although they live in the homeland of the Jewish people, will not be singing joyful songs with full gusto, or reclining in freedom with the same sense of relaxation as royalty this coming Passover. They are the citizens of the city of Sderot.

This Israeli community, which borders the recently declared autonomous Palestinian region of Gaza, is victim to an average of two to three rocket strikes daily. Sirens, which notify residents of an impending attack, can only give an advance warning of 15 seconds. That is all the time that separates life and death in Sderot.

So this Passover, the residents of Sderot will not be observing the holiday as others will be doing elsewhere in the Jewish world. Instead, they will be confined to their homes, in running distance of a shelter, and parents will have to convince their children of the merits of celebrating the holiday of freedom when they themselves do not feel free at all.

Guy Nagar is one such citizen. He, his wife and two children have been living in Sderot for the past six years. They came as part of a group of idealistic young Orthodox Jews who wanted to integrate into a city with a cross section of Jews in order to influence and be influenced – that is, to live with Jews from different countries and backgrounds, but to share common goals and responsibilities.

Guy works for the Orthodox Union (OU) in Israel, which provides social, educational and Jewish programming to thousands of people all over the country. For the past six years, he and his wife have operated a branch of Makom Balev, an institution that provides much-needed social programs for underprivileged children.

Sadly, enrolment increased exponentially when children began to suffer from the psychological affects of something previously unknown to them – the Qassam rocket.

Guy and the other parents of Sderot were shocked and saddened when their children's first words were not "Abba" or "Ima" but "[code] Red, Red, Alarm, Alarm…"

How does Guy deal with this crisis on a religious nationalist level? He struggles, he questions, he even has moments of weakness, mulling over the idea of leaving with his wife and children for a safer environment so he, too, could recline in peace this Passover.

Brenda and Norm Kaman of Toronto on a recent visit to Sderot talk with some children in their kindergarten in the nearby bomb shelter.

But then he collects his thoughts, stands proudly, and says he will not retreat – he will stay and fight.

As a result, Guy and the other residents of Sderot are truly able to fulfil the rabbinic dictum, "One must picture oneself as if experiencing the Passover story."

Guy Nagar

Just as Guy had his moment of truth when he chose to stand up and be counted as a believer, so, too, did the Jewish people have their moment during the Passover story itself.

God commands each Israelite to take a lamb, a god venerated by the Egyptians, and to tie it up and prepare it for sacrifice. Sacrifice a lamb in front of the Egyptian taskmasters? "It's certain suicide," they must have thought!

Some fled, and some refused to carry out the order. But there were others who had the courage to stand up against the Egyptian regime, who were willing to follow the will of God, and unite as one nation, a nation that merited the great redemption of the Exodus.

There is a dark irony for the citizens of Sderot when they compare this year's Passover to the one thousands of years ago that we commemorate. The pinnacle of the Passover experience was the Exodus from Egypt, when each family had to pack up, leave the only home they knew, and in the middle of the night run and never look back.

Today, each family musters up the courage to stay put, to find the inner strength to believe in the holiness of the Land of Israel and to fight for the right to live freely in our Promised Land in peace.

Guy Nagar, his family and thousands of others in Sderot, are standing firm and defending their city, knowing that retreat is only an invitation for those who seek to harm us to terrorize the rest of the citizens of Israel. There is no question that these people are the heroes of this year's Passover story, role models for every Israeli to emulate during the current situation.

With the daunting threat of a nuclear Iran, and a difficult war last summer, as well as what looks like another inevitable war, this Passover will be a test for the rest of us, the residents of Israel. We, too, will stay put, in our cities and towns. We will not be deterred, terrorized or maligned into thinking that we do not have a right to live in our homeland in peace.

Mah nishtanah halailah hazeh – how different is this Passover from the great Passover of old?

Sadly, in Sderot in particular, and on some levels, in Israel in general, it's not very different. The same trials afflict us and complete redemption still eludes us, but like the Israelites of old, we, too, will stand firm in our commitment to follow God's command: we will maintain the inner strength to unite under adversity, and we will strive to fulfil our destiny of returning to our homeland and spreading ultimate peace and tranquility throughout the land.

Guy Nagar, like countless Israelis, defends his home.

Rabbi Baumol is director of communications for OU Israel.

A teacher points to the hole in the wall in one of the school classrooms made by a Qassam.

I can't say this enough

New things are exciting, and old stuff is boring. This is true of cars, clothes and even concepts. No one likes to hear the same idea over and over again, and teachers and preachers who continually repeat themselves are boring.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But repetition is important. The Haggadah tells us that we must repeat the message of the seder year after year, and "even if all of us were wise, all of us understanding, all of us knowing the Torah, we would still be obligated to discuss the Exodus from Egypt." We might know the story already, but we have to do the seder all over again, year after year.

But repetition is not about knowledge. Repetition is about keeping focused.

Even idealistic people can forget their ideals. The stress and pressure of everyday life can make us lose focus on the big picture and obsess about the petty concerns of our quotidian existence. Even the wise, the understanding and the idealistic can lose their way.

Israel is currently experiencing a crisis of leadership. Political and military leaders have been disgraced for a variety of crimes, from sexual assault to bribe-taking to faking credentials. There is no doubt that these scandals reflect a loosening of Israeli idealism.

The root of this crisis is in a collective loss of focus. As Israel has prospered, it has moved away from the idealistic values of its pioneers. The old narratives of the Tanach have been displaced with business school courses. Repeating the lessons of Jewish history, or patriotic narratives of sacrifice courage, is considered passé and inappropriate for a 21st-century, First World economy.

But repetition is how we remind ourselves to keep focused on our ideals. Indeed this is a lesson one can learn in business school.

Companies spend enormous amounts of money drafting mission statements. Some companies do so because it is trendy, and then promptly file them away and forget about them. But companies that are transformed by mission statements never stop thinking about them.

Mission statements are about making sure corporations keep focused on their fundamental values. Successful mission statements are referred to on a daily basis. Without repetition and reinforcement, a mission statement is just an expensive book report.

Societies, religions and countries need mission statements too. The seder reminds us, on a yearly basis, about the mission statement of the Jewish people. It teaches profound lessons about hope, redemption, compassion and determination. We'd know the values of these concepts without the seder. But we still need a seder, because the seder inspires us to live these values in our day-to-day lives.

To live by our ideals, we need to make sure we never lose our focus. That is why repetition is important. Repetition is important. Repetition is important.

Quebec's accommodation debate is unreasonable

The Quebec media is rabble-rousing against Muslim girls who want to wear hijabs during soccer games, chassidic men who prefer taking driving tests with male examiners, and the Jewish General Hospital's policy of keeping unkosher food away from kosher eating facilities.

Gil Troy in Montreal

What the press calls "reasonable accommodation" rests on an unacceptable assumption. The "us" and "them" language assumes that one collective with one behavioural standard occasionally indulges some deviants.

To "accommodate" means "To do a favour for or service for, oblige." But North American-style, multicultural democracy assumes cultural and political equality, not hierarchy. One group of citizens is not privileged to do favours for another marginal or inferior group.

We all get equally burdensome bills at tax time, whatever our beliefs, backgrounds, or clothing choices. Similarly, we all deserve equal rights, whether we wear hijabs, turbans, kippot or tuques on our heads.

"Reasonable accommodation" – which oozes authoritarian assumptions about one "collective" behavioural norm – is particularly absurd, given Quebec society's transformation over the last 40 years. Stereotypical, pure laine Québécois have gone from being church-going Catholics to anything-goes secularists. Considering modern identity's freewheeling nature, assuming that some collective standard exists is absurd, rigid, ahistorical and insulting.

This whole debate is a throwback to the 1930s, when Canadian and American Protestants "tolerated" Italians, Greeks, Jews and Catholics. The Holocaust sensitized western society. You "tolerate" bad smells, not fellow citizens. Free civilized societies offer – and celebrate – acceptance, equality and mutual respect.

Canadian immigrants are not issued passports with an asterisk – even in Quebec. We all belong to one polity and one nation, with equal rights and responsibilities. A hierarchy of cultures is insidious and illusory. If one group sets the norms and doles out the indulgences, it infantilizes others, reducing them to little Oliver Twists, begging "Please sir, I want some more."

That attitude invites immigrants to disengage from society, playing the victim, maximizing what they can "get," then absolving themselves of communal responsibility.

Debating "reasonable accommodation" by quibbling about where to draw the line, wondering what special favours will be granted Muslims or Jews, Sikhs or kosher hospitals, we all lose. We must reject this oppressive fiction. Instead, we should speak of rights and responsibilities, tempered by good sense and mutuality.

Civil society's goal is to maximize freedom. Rights inhere in the individual, they are not granted for good behaviour to some of us by others of us, or by the nation. These fundamental rights include freedom of religion and freedom of expression – in clothing as well as conversation. With rights come responsibilities – to be good citizens, following the law, paying taxes and serving in the army, if necessary.

Of course, citizenship is not a carte blanche. Freedom is not a licence to act willy-nilly. Sometimes, rights conflict with other rights, or with other needs. Religious devotees who decide they need heroin to achieve nirvana are not free to violate legitimate anti-drug laws. More benignly, if liquor were prohibited, Jews would have to be teetotalers, even on the ribald Purim holiday. As with most legal balances, the question is, where should the burden lie? The standard should be one of avoiding unreasonable infringements on others, unless health, safety or public order are at risk, not begging for some "reasonable accommodation" from some non-existent, self-important Big Daddy.

This healthy emphasis on maximizing rights, and only restricting them in compelling cases, can shift the conversation toward where it needs to be: the essential idea of mutuality. To make society work, everyone should be vigilant about the rights of all, protecting rights wherever they are unreasonably infringed.

In that spirit, Muslims must tolerate cartoons and speakers that they would rather ban, because that kind of tolerance preserves their freedom to practice Islam, just as secularists must respect benign religious preferences and accept overt displays of religiosity, because doing so protects their freedom to express themselves fully.

Civil society is a glorious collaboration, a mass work of art with citizens bringing out the best in each other by doing their best to accept one another. We need to navigate the challenges of a multicultural democracy with equal measures of common sense and good cheer, weaving a welcoming social fabric that envelops and elevates and does not single out and castigate.

Lessons that are not for women only

I've always wanted to write a woman's guide to Passover.

No, not about the cleaning thing or the cooking thing, and not even about the ubiquitous orange on the seder plate or the kos miriam, or Miriam's cup, filled with water and placed alongside kos Eliyahu, Elijah's cup. Perhaps because in my earliest memories of Pesach, my mother, grandmother and aunts arrived boneweary to the seder table, too tired to jump into discussions that branched off from the text of the Haggadah, I've always wanted to write a guide that would put women front and centre in the seder ritual and the telling of the story.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Women never made it into the text of the traditional Haggadah, which encapsulates Jewish memory of enslavement and redemption and early celebrations of the festival. They are not mentioned among the ancestors who journeyed to and then sojourned in Egypt. Nor were they among the venerable celebrants in Bnei Brak who became so engrossed in discussion that, we read, before they even realized, it was time for morning prayer. And the famous passage about the four daughters? Never made it into the standard text.

Yet women play a central role in the first two chapters of the Book of Exodus. In a sequence of events in which Egyptian men behave ruthlessly and cruelly, and Hebrew men seem to fade away, both Israelite and Egyptian women are depicted as defying Pharoah and resisting the passive resignation that comes with enslavement. The Hebrew midwives, we are told, refuse to kill Israelite babies, in a risky act of civil disobedience. Commentators are divided about the nationality of these midwives – that is, whether they are Egyptian midwives ministering to Hebrew women, or midwives who are themselves Hebrews.

The life-affirming collaboration between Israelite and Egyptian women is more explicit in the passage that follows. In a desperate ploy to save her infant who will later bear the name Moses, a Hebrew woman places her baby in a basket among the reeds of the Nile. We all know what follows: the compassionate impulse of the Egyptian princess; the intervention of the sister; and the canny offer of a wet-nurse who turns out to be the boy's birth mother. All this is in sharp contrast to what comes immediately afterward: an Egyptian man beating an Israelite man, and two Hebrew men fighting.

This foregrounding of women's courage and compassion was noted by many traditional commentators, who elaborated on it in a series of midrashim, or narrative commentaries, that focus on gender. One source, for example, expands on the life-saving measures taken by Moses' mother on her child's behalf, and extends it to all Israelite women. According to this midrash, Israelite women would hide their infants in holes to keep them from being killed.

Another midrash depicts the babies saved by angels who would catch them when the Egyptians tossed them into the waters of the Nile. The angels would carefully place these children on rocks, above water level. In a stunning image, the midrash depicts these rocks as miraculously growing nipples and suckling the Israelite babies – standing in, as it were, when their mothers were no longer able to protect and nurture them. In a related midrash, the earth swallows up the Israelite infants to protect them from the Egyptians. The babies later spring up healthy and vigorous. Nature, in essence, becomes feminized – breasts, a womb – in an enactment of divine compassion.

What do these texts add to our seders? Needless to say, they balance the depiction of gender in the Haggadah, so that women, too, can see their reflections in the story of the Jewish collective past.

But the value they add to the seder is not for women only. They teach us that even from a position of seeming powerlessness (not only a slave, but female!), people can find the inner resources to act on what is right. In reminding us of the connection between rachamim, the Hebrew word for mercy, and rechem, the Hebrew word for womb, they tell us that the impulse of compassion can draw people past the boundaries (Hebrew and Egyptian) that could have turned them into enemies. They help us aspire to the triumph of mercy over aggression.

The Kirshner File

Town planning and Zionist settlement

The founder of modern political Zionism, Theodor Herzl, wrote Altneuland, his utopian 1902 novel of a new Jewish society in Palestine, when that dusty backwater of the Ottoman Empire was home to some 50,000 Jews. Herzl, an assimilated Viennese journalist, sought to create a little Europe in Palestine, which was then largely inhabited by Muslim and Christian Arabs.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

To Herzl and like-minded Jews, the successful colonization of Palestine, the Jewish ancestral homeland, would necessitate the transplanting of western notions of science, technology and town planning to a poorly developed land dotted with gardenless, overcrowded and unsanitary Arab villages, which, from a distance, looked picturesque, as one British observer tartly noted.

The first generation of Zionist pioneers and planners in Palestine imagined a country of bucolic agricultural villages and Jewish peasants. Translating their dream into reality, they established the moshva, whose members farmed their land independently; the kibbutz, a collective settlement; and the moshav, a cooperative farming village. But their conception of town planning in Palestine was not only confined to building rural communities. On April 11, 1909, a band of Jews gathered in the desolate sand dunes north of Jaffa to consecrate Tel Aviv as a European-style garden suburb.

Whether rural or urban, these national projects were designed by a dedicated corps of professional planners, architects and officials recruited to resuscitate the historic Jewish presence in Palestine, S. Ilan Troen writes in an intriguing book, Imagining Zion: Dreams, Design and Realities in a Century of Jewish Settlement (Yale University Press).

From the 1880s onward, the Zionist movement built nearly 700 villages, towns and cities in what is now Israel – 250 before Israel's independence in 1948 and more than 450 after that – with the result that Jews would become a significant majority in Israel for the first time since the Roman-occupation era.

Zionists deliberately distinguished between "colonial" policy and "colonization." Abraham Granovsky (Granot), a Zionist planner, defined colonial policy as the exploitation of the natural resources of a nation and the domination of another people. Colonization, he said, was bound up with settlement and cooperation with an already existing population (Palestinian Arabs in this case). Zionists like Granovsky, though acutely cognizant that Palestine was populated by a majority of Palestinian Arabs, assumed that a confrontation with them could be avoided by bringing the economic benefits of Zionism to all its inhabitants, including new Jewish immigrants.

Of course, the Arabs were not impressed with that argument. Nevertheless, Jews realized that Zionism could not be seen to be infringing on the rights of the Arabs. The Balfour Declaration, issued by the British in 1917, stipulated as much.

Zionists were disappointed when, some years later, Britain, the mandatory power in Palestine, released a White Paper recommending a retreat from an open-door policy on immigration, a major Zionist objective. Zionists were thereby forced to demonstrate that Palestine's "economic absorptive capacity" could accommodate both Arabs and Jews.

To that end, Zionist organizations mobilized the resources of a wide range of Jewish academics to prove that thesis so that the flow of Jewish immigrants would not be impeded. Jean Gottman, one of these scholars, was a prominent geographer. He produced a series of essays in the mid-1930s claiming that Palestine could easily cope with a large population. The publication of his essays coincided with the persecution of Jews in Germany. But these efforts had little effect on the British. Succumbing to mounting Arab pressure, Britain, in 1939, issued a White Paper restricting Jewish immigration. Until that defining moment, the Zionists pressed ahead with the colonization of Palestine, knowing full well that facts on the ground would be of crucial importance.

The World Zionist Organization (WZO) was greatly influenced by Germany's pre-World War I colonization model, the Templar colony, says Troen, a professor of history at Brandeis University and Ben-Gurion University of the Negev.

The Zionist emphasis on agrarian settlements was risky, since precious few Jews had been farmers, Troen observes. Zionist officials soon discovered that the lack of farming skills among potential Jewish immigrants was a greater threat to colonization than inadequate funding. To remedy that problem, philanthropists in France, including the Rothschilds, founded Mikve Israel, an agricultural training school near Jaffa for Jewish youth.

The first Jewish settlers in the late 19th century went to the coastal plain, the Jezreel Valley, the Beit She'an Valley south of the Sea of Galilee and the Upper Galilee. Since Arabs lived mainly in the hills and mountains of Palestine, Jews could more easily purchase land in the valleys from absentee Arab landlords.

Until the mid-1930s, the moshav was the planners' village of choice. But from then on, until the early 1950s, the kibbutz was the spearhead of Zionist settlement policy. When planning authorities concluded that family-oriented, non-ideological immigrants would better adapt to the moshav, the kibbutz suffered an irreversible decline.

Jews were settled on lands that had been bought fairly and squarely. But in the wake of the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, captured Arab lands were also used for settlement purposes. The chief advocate of this policy, Josef Weitz, was the director of the Jewish National Fund. He had advocated the expulsion of Arabs from Jewish areas.

Troen's discussion of Zionist settlement in urban milieus is instructive. The bulk of Zionist capital was channelled almost exclusively into developing the rural sector. By the outbreak of World War II, 35,000 Jews had been settled on 119 agricultural settlements.

Private funds, however, built Tel Aviv and other centres. Proponents of urban settlement maintained that only cities could attract and absorb substantial numbers of Jewish immigrants. Tel Aviv serves as an example of their philosophy. In the second decade of the 20th century, Tel Aviv was a sleepy burg with a population of about 2,000. But by 1939, its population had skyrocketed to 150,000, or one-third of the entire Yishuv's population.

Tel Aviv, not Jerusalem, emerged as the Zionist cultural capital, attracting many of the country's poets, novelists and painters. The poets Chaim Nachman Bialik and Shaul Tschernichowsky celebrated the city in verse.

Zionist attempts to influence the development of Haifa – a small, somnolent city in the 19th century – were considerably harder because Jews were a minority there until about 1945. Nonetheless, Zionists were confident about Haifa's possibilities. They may have been swayed by Herzl. In Altneuland, he wrote glowingly of Haifa as a major metropolis in a technologically advanced Palestine.

Aerial view of Jaffa and Tel Aviv in 1917

In 1908, long before Jews became a majority there, the Hilfsverein der deutschen Juden – a major German-Jewish philanthropic organization – began raising funds for a technical school in Haifa. Known first as the Technikum, the Technion would become one of Israel's stellar universities, producing some of its finest scientists. Interestingly enough, the Hilfsverein was motivated by the goal of advancing Germany's interests in the Middle East.

In the remainder of Imagining Zion, Troen deals with a variety of related topics, from the development of the Dead Sea region to the rise of Jewish settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip after the 1967 Six Day War. Troen's mastery of the material is admirable. Imagining Zion is a definitive account of the Zionist enterprise in Palestine and Israel.

Israeli medical pioneer wins Bronfman Prize

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Dr. Amitai Ziv is literally creating a virtual revolution in the world's medical communities, and he just got a whole lot of recognition for his efforts.

The pediatrician and former Israel Defence Forces fighter pilot will receive the 2007 Charles Bronfman Prize for his considerable contributions to the burgeoning field of simulation-based medical education.

According to the Bronfman Prize website, the $100,000 award is given annually to one outstanding individual, under 50, whose "Jewish values infuse their humanitarian accomplishments and provide inspiration to the next generations."

Ziv, 48, certainly qualifies.

In 2001, his passionate drive to change the longstanding paradigm of cognitively focused medical education and assessment led him to found the Israel Center for Medical Simulation (MSR) at the Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer.

Designed as a "virtual hospital," MSR was one of the first specialized training facilities of its kind in the world, and the Israeli government has made many of its courses mandatory for licensing in various health professions.

The centre allows medical professionals in various disciplines to enhance their hands-on skills in a variety of scenarios within a safe, controlled environment.

The equipment used ranges from low-tech actors and mannequins to high-tech virtual reality computers and imaging systems.

Need training in how to treat victims of chemical warfare? MSR can set it up. Want to test the mettle of military doctors with a full-blown, terrorist bombing re-enactment? That can be arranged.

It was Ziv's own simulation training as a pilot that inspired him to embark on his quest to change the medical education system.

While doing his residency after his army service, Ziv experienced a culture shock.

"The aviation field was based on a safety culture of training. [Pilots used] simulators long before they were put on an aircraft," he told The CJN in a phone interview from Israel last week.

"But when you enter medicine, you realize the profession has been skewed for… generations to deal mostly with the cognitive aspect [of training]. We admit candidates on the [basis of medical theory], without putting enough emphasis on cultural skills, manual skills and coping under pressure."

Ziv believes that medical students, paramedics, anesthesiologists and other health professionals can only benefit from confronting the "nightmare scenarios" that occur in emergency rooms, in the field or almost anywhere else.

"Simulation education has the advantage of not coming [at] the expense of the patient's safety," Ziv said.

"In aviation, [one] assumes that the pilot has been well-prepared and is ready to take off with passengers in the back seat," he added. "Whereas in medicine, the mere fact that you've been in the school system for years… does it mean that you've been checked for readiness and you can actually deal with that heart attack, alone, in a clinic somewhere in Toronto? This is far from being true."

Ziv knows the medical establishment is reluctant to integrate his methods into training and certification practices.

"One would expect people to adopt and embrace [medical simulation] in an intuitive manner… Why not train ourselves in a safe environment?" he asked rhetorically. "But it's not that simple. [Doctors] come from a very conservative field. For too many years, medicine has not been open enough to the transparent debriefing that takes place in simulation [training]."

Still, Ziv continues to push for a cultural change, and his vision is slowly being adopted by institutions around the world.

In Canada, he is a prized consultant to universities and medical organizations, including the Michener Institute for Applied Health Sciences in Toronto and Montreal tech giant Canadian Aerospace Electronics.

Last year, McGill University opened its own medical simulation centre after consultations with Ziv.

And after recent talks with contacts in Edmonton, Ziv expects to see a centre there sometime soon as well.

In fact, Ziv is particularly fond of this country. His parents emigrated from Montreal to Israel in 1949, and although he was born in the Holy Land, he has dual citizenship and retains friends and family across Canada.

Ziv will receive the Charles Bronfman Prize on May 1 at a ceremony in New York.

Irish-born teacher has grand time with students

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's a long way from her childhood home on a farm in County Cork, Ireland, to Toronto's Montessori Jewish Day School (MJDS), but the path that led Catherine O'Keeffe to the classroom where she now teaches began when she was just eight years old.

The middle child of five in her family, O'Keeffe attended a three-room country schoolhouse where she was in the same class as her brother, who was two years older. She witnessed his struggles with reading and the "tough" way their teacher dealt with it.

At the age of eight, O'Keeffe made up her mind.

"I'll be a teacher, but I'll be nice," she decided.

Discussing that turning point of 32 years ago in a recent interview, her tone of voice became firm, undoubtedly reflecting the resolve she'd felt as a youngster.

In fact, her calm, gentle manner is evident in just a few minutes of seeing her interact with her students. The distinctive, southern Irish lilt in her voice just enhances the effect.

"Part of the Montessori training is that you have to always be thinking about how you're going to bring out the best in this child," she said. "We feel we model for children how to behave in society."

A lesson from the teacher: "The nice thing about [the Irish expression] 'grand' is that it's not amazing or wonderful; it's just fine... We should celebrate ordinariness. We're having a grand time."

All this, however, doesn't preclude a bit of forthrightness, although not in an unkind way. "I like to be very direct with them. I won't tell a child their work is great if it's not, if I know and they know they could have presented it better."

Now her students sometimes pre-empt her by showing her a half-hearted attempt and – borrowing one of her own expressions – saying, "It's rubbish, isn't it?"

"They laugh because they know it's true, and it doesn't lower their self-esteem," she said.

"I would like to think that all children feel good about themselves... They feel good about themselves when they know they're doing something productive and constructive."

O'Keeffe, who has lived in Canada for most of the past 17 years, is in her second year of teaching at MJDS. Previously she taught at private schools and had her own tutoring business.

Although as a teenager she considered pursuing a career in industrial design, O'Keeffe pursued a Montessori education at the suggestion of her high school guidance counsellor.

At first, she was reluctant to limit herself to working in a preschool, which was all the two-year training would qualify her for at the time. However, after visiting a Montessori classroom, she was impressed with the children's independence, and after learning more about the Montessori teaching method, she concluded it was "the only way to teach."

But, she said, "I did everything backward." At age 25 she returned to Dublin for a time to qualify as an elementary school teacher, and now she is studying for a BA in history at the University of Toronto.

At MJDS, O'Keeffe team-teaches a combined Grade 1, 2 and 3 class of 19 students with Sarit Yurovitch, an Israeli-born teacher who was raised on a moshav.

"Sarit is from Israel and I'm from Ireland. We figure we know all about peace – and nothing about peace," said O'Keeffe, referring to an underlying theme in their classroom.

The teachers strive to create a "peaceful environment" by showing their students "how to be a peaceful person" and being welcoming and accepting of everyone. Their students even prepare mint tea and offer it to classroom visitors.

On a recent Friday morning, students sat at small tables, either working on individual projects such as a 3-D map or having small group lessons, as is typical in Montessori classes.

One of five teachers at the school who is not Jewish, O'Keeffe is responsible for core subjects including math, language, history, botany and zoology, while Yurovitch, who is also Montessori-trained, focuses on Judaic studies.

There is some cross-over, when Yurovitch works with students on core subjects in Hebrew, and when O'Keeffe – who loves storytelling – tells Torah stories for some of the Jewish holidays.

The tales are familiar from her days as a Catholic school student, but even more so from the well-used children's Bible her mother kept at home.

O'Keefe said she has "a great job.

"The children are so funny, and you can learn so much from them... [They're] more real than just about any group of adults out there, and they're great fun."

Students look for experience beyond university

Parents told to let kids pursue their dreams

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past 20 years, there has been a tremendous change in the way high school graduates view their future, says a JVS Toronto psychoeducational consultant.

"Students are not only excited about immediate post-secondary options, they are interested in delaying the process and gaining other kinds of experiences," said Joy Koplowitz, facilitator of an evening titled Beyond the Bachelor, co-sponsored by the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's parent association and JVS.

Speakers were Sean Friedman, a TanebaumCHAT graduate and current Ryerson University student; Alan Bross, a social worker who recently sold a multi-million dollar business; and Jane Rendely, a career management consultant, psycho-educational consultant and transition coach.

Koplowitz, who has counselled students for 20 years, including for six years at CHAT, said that a number of students consider a transition or gap year after high school or university, and almost 50 per cent of this year's 175 TanebaumCHAT graduates are thinking about spending next year in Israel.

"[Rather] than the standard yeshiva or seminary type of experience, they are interested in a more diverse experience that entails a combination of learning and community service," Koplowitz said.

Friedman, who will graduate this year with a bachelor of fine arts in theatre, has applied to attend the Rothberg Institute's community leadership and philanthropy studies at Hebrew University.

As a former math and science student at TanebaumCHAT who considered studying engineering, he said that people may wonder how he ended up in theatre.

"I thought I needed to be an engineer, but [I took theatre] for the love of what I was going to do."

At Ryerson he learned life skills and got a bachelor's degree, and "today's plan is to blend my theatre career with a career in Jewish fundraising," he said.

"No matter what you do, you can always change your career. There are enough programs out there that you can take whatever interests you."

He is planning for the moment, he said, "because if you plan for the future, things change. I plan for today and hope for the best for tomorrow."

Bross, a father of four, began his career as a marriage and family therapist, and in 1981 established FGI, a company whose mission is to maximize people's effectiveness in their personal, family and workplace lives.

Today, the company works with more than 6,000 corporations, has more than 600 full-time employees and 5,000 associates worldwide, and delivers services in more than 100 countries.

He has also written books, been a consultant to organizations in the private and public sectors, and lectured around the world.

"I'm also confused and in transition now. I'm no more an expert than anyone else," said Bross, who added that he expects to take on "a couple more careers."

As parents, he stressed, it's our responsibility to be concerned about our children's futures, "but not overly concerned. That is the important message."

His oldest son, he said, studied science in high school, journalism in university, and is now a lawyer.

As an employer who hired such professionals as social workers and lawyers, Bross said, "I hired based on their ability to think, to have a heart, and to relate to people.

"We know we can inject people with expertise, but it's not easy to find people who can process information and solve problems."

The workplace is changing rapidly, he said, "and people need to be flexible, adaptable and be willing to take on more responsibility."

Rather than tell people to "think outside the box, [I say] there is no box. You can learn many things in many places and [young people] have to do what they want. If they're confused, they will find their way."

He said that parents need to let kids pursue their dreams. "Don't be their obstacle, and don't tell them how to do things. Tell them what you want them to achieve, and they will surprise you with their ingenuity."

Rendely has assisted thousands of clients to make career and employment decisions, and coached them to develop self-marketing, resume writing, networking and interview preparation.

She assists her clients to develop strategies for overcoming education and life obstacles so that they can reach their goals.

She said that she advises students to look inward at what they want to do, "then learn about the world of work."

In the past 10 years, she said, joint courses have started up between colleges and universities, and they're a good way to help students keep their options open.

"University is not for everyone, and the awareness of colleges is going up," Rendely said.

"I always like people to have backup plans, so they are not dead-ended."

Her message, she said, is to take risks, try and do things, and remember that volunteer experience is "an important thread."

Trips to Israel provide supplement to Bible study

Channa Sargon teaches students onsite in Jerusalem.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Next month, Channa Sargon will take her fifth group to Israel on a tour she dreamed up on a winter day about nine years ago to complement the adult Bible classes she holds in her Thornhill home.

"I was teaching about the desert," she recalls, citing the exact verse of Genesis. All of a sudden, it struck her as she looked outside at the snow how far away the sun-filled Israeli desert really was.

"I said, 'Listen, guys, would you like to go with me where it really happened?'"

When the class, consisting of young women, returned the next week, they committed to the trip, despite car pools and other obligations, she said.

"I think I was a pioneer," Sargon said in a recent interview in her small, art-filled living room, which is often crowded with students from diverse Jewish backgrounds sitting together on comfy couches and even on the floor. Some of them have been studying with her for years.

A former day school teacher, Sargon, who grew up in Haifa, has been teaching adults exclusively for the past 15 years, following a sabbatical from the United Synagogue Day School.

Her early adult classes consisted of the mothers of some of her younger students.

Sargon, who immigrated to Canada as a teenager, traces her love for the Bible – and her inspiration for creating the tours – to a teacher she had as a child while attending a secular school in Israel.

The teacher, a Holocaust survivor, often took his students out of the school. "We never knew where we were going to study," said Sargon, who now keeps Shabbat and follows the laws of kashrut.

"If we studied Deborah, we went to Mount Tabor. I remember being mesmerized as a child, thinking 'I'm sitting in a place where the stories took place, and where the heroes were born.'"

After the first trip she led, which focused on the Bible, Sargon decided she wanted to bring in other elements including poetry, art, theatre and music – "the voices of the people that made this country."

Over the years, her tours have evolved to include a few participants who are not her students and to add new experiences, such as this year's planned walk in the desert under a full moon. It was inspired by the way the Jewish lunar calendar works and the meaning of the moon in Jewish tradition.

The desert, both in biblical times and more recently, is inspirational, she believes. "Abraham and Isaac brought the message that we can make the impossible possible. You see the desert dryness, and they found water to share with others."

Recalling the impact on her students of actually being in Israel, she hit the side of her head with the heel of her hand to illustrate their gestures – indicating "I get it" – when the message got through.

Relevance of the text is important to Sargon and her students, who have raised a significant amount of money for Israel's Shabtai Levi Home, an institution for babies who are about to be adopted or who are at risk.

After they visited there, the fundraising came about from an understanding that "action has to be the result of learning. It cannot only be an intellectual experience."

Although she can't remember a time when she didn't want to teach, Sargon sees herself more as a "mediator" between student and text. "By being a mediator and a vulnerable human being, you allow others to become vulnerable too, and real learning takes place."

Sargon said she loves the men and women of the Bible "because they're imperfect. That allows me to attempt to perfect myself."

She approaches texts by beginning with classical commentaries, but when new ideas arise, "we discuss them. This is what it's about – making it meaningful, helpful and relevant," she said.

"I love the idea that we have such a rich tradition that the journey into learning is never-ending.

"I am obsessed," said the mother of three adult sons. "I love my work."

'Zionism is not a nice word,' says shaliach

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

While there may be people who strongly oppose the concept of Zionism, Ofer Guttman would rather have people hate the concept than meet it with indifference.

Guttman, who is currently serving his third year as the central shaliach for the Hagshama department of the World Zionist Organization, presented a lecture titled "When did Zionism become a bad word?"

"Zionism will never be a nice [word] because a nation that returned after 2,000 years to the same place they were before to establish a state from nothing against all odds, and do amazing things in 58 years could not be considered by anyone in the world as 'nice.' People can either [love it] or hate it," Guttman said.

About 20 students gathered at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto last week to discuss the perceptions that people have regarding Zionism.

Earlier that same day, Guttman also paid a visit to York University and spoke to students in the Hillel board room.

Guttman said he understands if people don't identify with the Zionist concept, but what frustrates him the most is the discussions people have about whether the State of Israel has a right to exist.

"Everyone discusses whether or not Israel has a right to exist," he said, adding that no other country in the world is subject to this kind of debate.

"Every nation in the world has a right to have a country of its own. The fact that it is discussed in universities across North America and Europe, about whether Israel has a right to exist is beyond my understanding."

Guttman, a practicing lawyer, also spoke about people's reluctance to identify as Zionists, when their views clearly fit into that ideology.

He said that as long as you connect to an issue that is relevant to Israel, if you have an opinion about what the Zionist movement should be – whether you approach it from the left wing of the political spectrum or the right – and you can criticize the state from "a loving point of view," you are a Zionist.

"If you think that the settlement in the Gaza strip is the best thing that ever happened to Israel… and you really think that the government of Israel [made] a horrible decision in disengaging from Gaza, you are criticizing the government of Israel for doing so, but you are a true Zionist," Guttman said.

Whether one is in favour of the government's decision to disengage or not, as long as one criticizes the government out of concern for the welfare of the Jewish state, one is a Zionist.

He said that the reason Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadenijad often refers to destroying the "Zionist enemy" rather than Israelis is because he understands that Zionism is much bigger than Israel."

But since 1992, the number of Israelis who affiliate with Zionistic political parties has declined.

"Look what happened in 15 years. The parties that represent a Zionist's full vision of what they want the State of Israel to look like lost 20 seats to sectarian parties," Guttman said.

While it is important for Diaspora Jews to advocate for Israel and express support for the Jewish State, it is also important to establish and explore personal connections to Israel, and most of all, have an opinion.

"I'm a lawyer by profession… But if I'm a lawyer and I'm advocating for a client, no matter what [my client] did, I will defend him. He is my client. When I defend him, I don't get attached to him. I don't get closer to him," he said.

"It's fine if you are advocating for Israel so that others know that Israel has a right to exist, but don't treat Israel as a client. Israel is not your client. Israel is a part of you."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Linking tikkun olam and Israel on Pesach

By RABBI DEBRA LANDSBERG

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

As a young, rather naïve child, I thought that Abraham Lincoln was honoured at every family's seder. I was raised in an American liberal Jewish household, one in which, every year, my father would supplement our Haggadah with poetry, prayers and songs that addressed the situation of other enslaved peoples.

He did this in an effort to distil universal values from the Jewish story of exile and redemption and to explicitly link our particular identity to the wider universal struggle of all peoples in their quest for liberty, be it emerging nations in Africa, or the real segregation of the American South that was only beginning to be disassembled when I was growing up. This was, for us, an essential core of our Jewish self-understanding: tikkun olam, our work to repair this world, a world that has been broken by human failings and human evil.

These modern paeans to universal liberty would stand alongside, although otherwise disconnected, from the other prayers my father included in our Pesach seder: those for the well-being and the security of the State of Israel. We were Zionists – proudly and actively – who saw a deep connection between the Jews' ancient and modern returns to Israel.

Today, as I plan the seders for my family and my congregation, I reflect on this dichotomy. Our commitment to tikkun olam and our commitment to the State of Israel remain both vital and necessary today, yet they each are weakened by their separation from one another.

There are signs that a growing number of Jewish youth are deeply disengaged from the State of Israel as they struggle to locate the values of tikkun olam in the seemingly never-ending struggle between Israel and the Palestinians and the wider Arab world. And there are signs that – too easily and too often – Israel advocacy leaves little space to attend to the most urgent tikkun olam of all, that of Israel and the Jews. The Jewish nation faces existential challenges from sharp social inequalities (greater than even in the United States) and from deprivation among its neediest citizens, which bring shame to the Jews' commitment to Klal Yisrael.

Just as the Kabbalists recognized the unity hidden behind the 110 distinct sefirot (emanations) from God, so is it time for us to acknowledge the necessary unity underlying our diverse Jewish commitments. Tikkun olam and Ahavat Yisrael – the universal and the particular – need to become reunited, each strengthening the other. In so doing, we can give new meaning to our beloved story of liberty and redemption that we retell each Pesach.

So this year at my seder, I am planning to introduce my family and my congregation to the work of Community Advocacy, a social change organization in Israel that enables disadvantaged residents to band together to purchase food at a discount. It is a jointly funded project of UJA Federation of New York and the New Israel Fund, which works to build social solidarity and to encourage active citizenship among those who are marginalized.

I know that this is only one example. I choose it because there is a resonance between the fact that we celebrate our redemption from Egypt with a vast amount of food and an organization that helps Israelis eat. I choose it to give life to the vital insight that many Jews share: that there is a deep connection between our worship of HaShem and the fight for change in the world here and now. And I choose it because I am my father's daughter. Like him, I strive to instil in my children a passionate, activist, progressive, Zionist Jewish soul.

Chag kasher v'samayach. May your Pesach be one that brings ever more liberation into our world.

Rabbi Landsberg is spiritual leader of Temple Emanu-El in Toronto.

A true open-door policy

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

As we prepare for Passover, it's very easy to forget that the day after Passover begins, we begin the counting of the Omer, or the period known as sfirah, the counting. Starting on the second day of Passover, we count for seven weeks until Shavuot.

During this time, the community refrains from public celebrations and rejoicing of all kinds.

Wedding parties and bar or bat mitzvah celebrations are postponed until later and with the exception of certain specific holidays, the community reverts to a semi-mourning status. The time of sfirah overlays the holiday of Passover and we engage in both commemorations simultaneously.

At Passover, we commemorate our redemption from Egypt in our homes with the seders. It seems to be a private celebration, yet before we are allowed to begin, we must make an open proclamation to the community. Anyone who needs to partake of our seder is invited to join us. We open our homes to welcome a community presence. Passover symbolizes our greatest joy for having experienced redemption at the hands of God. From within this joy, we open our doors and invite all those to enter.

Immediately afterward we begin to count the days of sfirah, which symbolize a period of semi-mourning. When a family is in the first week of mourning, the doors to their home are likewise opened and the community enters to comfort them. In those moments, the family inside the home is in need and the community responds with no questions asked. In fact, it's customary not to ask any questions of well-being to a mourner when present in their homes. One doesn't question the need, one simply responds.

Passover, symbolizing our greatest joy, and sfirah, a time of mourning, invoke the same images of community connection and response. Whether one responds to a need or expresses the need, the door remains unlocked and there are no questions asked.

But no questions asked must include no judgments passed.

The first community of Jews where everyone inherits covenant equally is the generation of Joseph and his brothers. That first community struggled enormously with judgments and jealousies. Even when trying to be righteous, there were underlying judgments. A midrash recounts how Joseph's brothers searched for him upon entering Egypt. Although they themselves were starving, they tried to right the wrong they had committed by taking the opportunity to find their brother. Interestingly, according to this midrash, they searched for Joseph among the prostitutes of Egypt. When asked why, they explained that Joseph was so attractive, surely he ended up as a prostitute.

Their attempt at redeeming Joseph is tainted by their judgment of him. We celebrate their intent and we mourn their presumption.

Another text that teaches us a similar lesson is in the book of Samuel when Hannah is praying and Eli, the High Priest, thinks she is drunk. In the Talmud, there are two opinions offered for her response. In one opinion, she says to Eli, "You are not my superior, nor does the Holy Spirit rest upon you for you suspect me." Another opinion states that she responded: "You are not a lord, neither the Presence nor the Holy Spirit is with you for you have taken a harsh and not a lenient view of my conduct." In either case, this remarkable woman has chastised the High Priest for passing judgment rather than offering help.

Passover flows into sfirah and although our doors remain open, we must remember not to judge. When we bring someone to our seder tables, it must be without question and when we respond to someone in need, it must be without judgment.

Jewish Life

Faith and proof

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

This time of the year with its celebration of Pesach and Easter, there is always some sensational documentary on an "amazing" archeological discovery with some fabulous claim or another that catches the popular imagination.

These presentations beg the question of whether there is any earth-shattering find that has changed people's perceptions of their religion and altered their spiritual lives. There have been a number of sensational finds that have withstood the test of time and whose study has enriched our knowledge and is continuing to do so.

Foremost among these discoveries in the popular realm have been the Dead Sea Scrolls. Yet 50 years before the Scrolls were found, the discovery of the Cairo Genizah provided a treasure-trove of hundreds of thousands of documents whose study is still enriching our knowledge of Judaism.

Another significant discovery, which was made at about the same time as the Scrolls, has not received the same publicity yet is also of great importance for biblical studies, especially the Christian Gospels. These are the Nag Hammadi Codices, named after the town of Nag Hammadi in Egypt where they were discovered. Originally hailed as "Lost Gospels," we now know these documents belonged to the Gnostics, a heretical sect that was persecuted out of existence when Christianity became the official religion of the Roman Empire in the fourth century CE.

My association with the codices goes back almost three decades, to the first time I did a show on them for CBC Radio's Ideas series. It was while researching the material at Harvard that I became acquainted with one of the world's authorities on these fascinating works, the late professor George MacRae. MacRae was a brilliant, erudite man of the world, possibly because of, or despite, his being an ordained member of the Society of Jesus, more popularly known as the Jesuits. We spent many hours engrossed in lively, wonderful conversations. I finally got around to asking the inevitable question – how would a discovery that impacted on Christian faith affect him?

The reason this conversation came to mind recently was because of its bearing on the Simcha Jacobovici film The Lost Tomb of Jesus. It is a film that has garnered a tremendous amount of publicity that I am sure will not do Jacobovici any harm in promoting the accompanying book that he has written. But the vast majority of scholars question the film's hypothesis and the evidence Jacobovici presents. (For an excellent critique see Mark Goodacre, in his academic blog, blog@ntgateway.com.)

The reason I bring up this film is because if its dubious assumption is true, and Christ's bones have been found, then it would call into question the very essence of Christian belief, which is that Christ arose bodily after his crucifixion. It is here that MacRae's answer to my question becomes relevant. He said that faith and proof are contradictory by nature. Faith implies belief without proof. Once something is proven, it can no longer be part of one's faith.

MacRae went on to say that Christianity is much more than a belief in miracles. For the educated believer, it is the message and morality that matters. MacRae made the point that one also had to separate the historical Jesus from the Jesus of faith and myth (which Gregory Nagy, MacRae's colleague at Harvard, defined for me as something that people believe to be universally true).

Just as the Exodus sets the stage for Judaism, the belief in the Resurrection defines the message of Christianity. You accept it on faith; if you have to prove it, then your faith is gone. It is a case of the message from the Past resonating Forward into the future. One can not have it both ways and use the present proof to move forward into the past.

Passover cleaning, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Cleaning and cooking and so many dishes/ Out with the chametz, no pasta, no knishes/ Fish that's gefilted, horseradish that stings/ These are a few of our Passover things.

[http://tinyurl.com/4ekod]

The Jewish Highway

If Passover cleaning isn't one of your favourite things, you're not alone. But there's plenty of advice for you on the Internet. And surprisingly, you'll even meet some people who look forward to the annual ordeal.

Like Emuna Braverman. In "The Joys (?) of Passover Cleaning," Braverman says: "I'm beginning to feel like an endangered species, because I like Passover." This fact dawned on her after she attended one of those Passover getaways where everything is done for you. "Studying the ideas underlying Passover was not the true preparation… It was the physical effort that led to the emotional and intellectual preparation… I've returned to what I enjoy. I can't wait to start cleaning." [http://tinyurl.com/ytrnk4]

Braverman may have found a kindred spirit at the Chabad.org site. Bella Shapiro's revelation hit about "40 minutes to the deadline to get rid of all remaining chametz. I commandeer the kids, assigning rooms, brooms and vacuums… There is so much to do, so little time, and failure to finish not an option." And then it dawns on her. "What an incredibly easy religion." Those really are Shapiro's thoughts (and not the byproduct of industrial strength cleansers). [http://tinyurl.com/25z7qu]

Whether or not you enjoy cleaning, do take care with those industrial-strength cleansers. A few years ago, Yona Amitai, a senior toxicologist at Hadassah University Hospital in Jerusalem, warned that "the number of accidental poisonings of children from cleaning fluid triples during the two or three weeks before Passover, and poisonings from all other causes doubles, compared to the rest of the year." He also advised parents to be extra cautious when cleaning out medicine cabinets to ensure drugs do not end up in the hands of children. [http://tinyurl.com/yvejrc]

As you clean your home for the holiday, are you greening it at the same time? According to the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life, "the average house contains three to 10 gallons of hazardous cleaning products that threaten your respiratory health and could end up in our air and water. You can find environmentally responsible ways to dispose of hazardous products and identify alternatives to replace them" on the coalition's site. [http://tinyurl.com/ysaq6y]

Beyond human health, there's the health of your small appliances. According to one blog that I chanced upon, the pre-Pesach season also proves to be a bonanza for appliance repair shops in Israel as people "remove screws that can't be replaced by mere mortals," or soak and dunk things that were never meant to be soaked or dunked. [http://tinyurl.com/yoo8fw]

I'm not quite sure how the survey was conducted, but according to the Brandman Research Institute, 43 million man-hours are spent in Israel in cleaning preparations for the Passover. Curious use of the term "man-hours," since the study found that 29 million cleaning hours are done by women and 11 million hours by men. Persons paid to clean account for the remainder. [http://tinyurl.com/4frn6]

Speaking of roles and responsibilities, let's just say that one husband didn't win big points when he broke it to his wife that he couldn't do his share of the Pesach cleaning because he'd be on the road the week before the holiday. He tells all in his blog entry, Mars & Venus on Erev Pesach Cleaning. [http://tinyurl.com/2hajqu]

A few years ago, I came across a story in the Jerusalem Post about Yael M., a resident of Jerusalem's Old City who made sure her cleaning paid off – literally. "Every couple of years, Yael M. enters a frenzy of Passover cleaning… Then she moves out." In exchange for renting out her home to a family eager to spend Pesach near the Kotel, Yael earns $1,500 to $2,000 in cash. [http://tinyurl.com/5pmup]

How to keep your family Jewish

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

People don't have to make radical or all-encompassing changes in their lives to keep their families Jewish, says author Doron Kornbluth.

As an example, he suggested moving weekly family dinners from Sunday to Friday – and lighting candles beforehand.

The Montreal-born author, who made aliyah in 1991, presented five "principles" for parents and grandparents in a recent talk titled "How to keep my family Jewish if we're not religious" at Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.

Shabbat dinner arose as a real-life point of contention when the mother of a young teenager said in a question-and-answer session that her child can't understand why she's not allowed to go out on Friday nights, unlike her friends, most of whom are Jewish but non-observant.

"The teenage years are hard. There are no guarantees," said Kornbluth, who has spoken widely in North America and Europe.

He believes the only thing that will help teens become more connected to Judaism is to help them "develop a set of Jewish friends who are involved in Jewish things." He advocates "manipulating" rather than forcing the situation.

Summer camp and youth group experiences, family trips to Israel and "Jewish events" are some of the opportunities he cited that parents can make available to teens. Also, he recommended setting a longer-term goal, perhaps three years, for becoming connected to other families with Jewishly-connected children the same age.

A thirty-something mother in the audience, whose baby slept through most of the presentation, said her family compromised on the issue of Friday night dinner when she was a teenager. She had to stay home for the family meal, but she was allowed to go out afterward. Now as an adult, she wants to be with her family on Friday nights, she said.

"For us to keep our kids Jewish today, we need to be proactive," said Kornbluth, who received private smichah in Israel but doesn't use the title "Rabbi" in his writing and on his lecture tours.

He believes his system can "radically increase the odds," he said.

His first principle is based on the impact that visual images have on people. Jewish homes should have visible Jewish elements like mezuzot, Shabbat candlesticks and Jewish books, and kids must see parents doing Jewish things, he said.

Although Kornbluth used to find a quiet corner at synagogue to study Jewish texts on Shabbat, now he studies at home, even though he gets less done, so that his young children will see him studying.

Also, he said, children have to be involved Jewishly themselves. Aside from summer camps, Jewish schools and youth groups that provide opportunities for involvement, he said that if children are "not involved on a regular basis in preparing for the holidays, then it's not their holiday."

He added that there is much joy in being Jewish, and that focusing only on the serious side of Judaism is "a recipe for failure."

There is a "deep, real connection" between all Jews, past, present and future, he said. Foster that connection and sense of belonging by being part of a synagogue community, by visiting Jewish sites when travelling, and by talking around the dinner table about Jews in different countries, he advised.

His fourth principle – likely the most delicate issue – deals with interdating and intermarriage, subjects he addresses more comprehensively in his 2003 book, Why Marry Jewish? Surprising Reasons for Jews to Marry Jews.

"You have to talk about this early," he says. He said marrying a born Jew or a sincere convert is "better for them, better for their marriage, better for their Jewishness."

However, Kornbluth said, his fifth principle is "in a sense, the most important one.

"All the studies show that the more Jewish education people have, the more likely they are to stay Jewish." He added that, according to studies, it is better to have "good Jewish education part-time through college" than to have it full-time only to stop at bar or bat mitzvah age.

City of Eilat celebrates its 58th anniversary of liberation

Torontonians join PM Olmert, Eilat mayor at ceremony

By FLORENCE LOW

The Israeli city of Eilat - Jewish Toronto's twinned city through UJA Federation's Partnership 2000 initiative, recently celebrated the 58th anniversary of its liberation.

Members of UJA Federation's Israel and Overseas Committee were on hand for the festivities, joining Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Eilat mayor, Meir Yitzhak HaLevy, and other dignitaries.

The modern city of Eilat began at the only building in the area, an old Ottoman police station known as "Um Rashrash." In March, 1949, in the middle of ceasefire negotiations with Jordan, the Negev and Golani Brigades met at this point and raised the famous improvised "Ink Flag," claiming the city of Eilat in the last military operation of the War of Independence. The recent ceremony was held at the very point where this historic moment took place.

"The beautiful city of Eilat was, without a doubt, the greatest and most exciting prize the young State of Israel received at the conclusion of the War of Independence. The famous "Ink Flag" we recall today symbolizes the enthusiasm, dedication and vision of the founders of this city," said Prime Minister Olmert.

"We've already done the hard work developing and building the land, and we've succeeded in building a flourishing city deserving of praise," said Mayor HaLevy. "This area can and must be a vibrant urban center and an international meeting point by land, air and by sea, accessible and recognized by travelers from across Europe, Africa and Asia."

Members of Toronto's Jewish community joined Israelis - including Prime Minister Ehud Olmert (standing, centre) - in Eilat, to celebrate the city's 58th anniversary.

"UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is a leading force in Israel and specifically in the Eilat/Eilot Region," said Brian Schachter, co-chair of Partnership 2000. "We have a historic partnership with the city, warm, personal relationships with its residents and a longstanding commitment to social initiatives."

Citing examples of this vital partnership, Schachter spoke about the emphasis on youth and education. "Education changes lives," he explained. "UJA Federation is proud to support and develop a number of programs that encourage educational excellence and offer equal opportunities for at-risk youth in this region."

Following the official ceremony Prime Minister Olmert praised Jewish Toronto's commitment to Eilat and Eilot and their vast involvement in the region. "You are building a better future for Eilat, for Israel and for our people through your unprecedented vision and dedication to developing this vibrant town and your personal commitment to supporting its people."

Ensuring a meaningful Passover for Toronto's vulnerable

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

As Jews the world over celebrate Passover next week, UJA Federation and its partner agencies are ensuring that even the community's most vulnerable members are able to participate fully in the holiday.

Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) is matching new clients to local host families for the seders, enhancing the holiday for the newly-arrived immigrants and facilitating their overall acclimation to Toronto.

"For many newcomers, the first holiday away from family and friends can be difficult," says Joanna Sasson Morrison, community integration worker at JIAS Toronto. "They very much appreciate having the opportunity to share the holiday spirit of warmth and togetherness around the seder table with a local family. This program gives newcomers the message that Toronto is a warm, welcoming community."

Employees of Jewish Family & Child Service, a partner agency of UJA Federation, pose in front of boxes of Passover food which they will be giving out to their clients.

Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) is making sure another marginalized group – the poor – can enjoy a meaningful Passover.

"There's a recognition that people who are poor will not be able to afford the food that allows them to celebrate and recognize the holiday," says Eric Kirsh, supervisor of the financial assistance and rehabilitation program at JF&CS. The agency, therefore, supplies its financial assistance clients with extra Passover funds and submits requests on their behalf for holiday provisions to National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (NCJW), which runs an annual Passover food drive.

The supplementary Passover funds are made possible by UJA Federation allocations, and while recipients can use the extra money at their discretion, "they're encouraged to use them for Passover foods," explains Kirsh.

Through its strong relationship with NCJW, JF&CS refers over 700 of its clients to the organization for holiday packages, which include matzah, juice, and other Kosher-for-Passover foodstuffs. "We make sure clients are aware of the program," says Kirsh. "And we send those on financial assistance or low income a letter from the executive director telling them we've requested a box on their behalf, so they can decide if they'd like it delivered or if they want to pick it up."

"These programs are an important part of our philosophies of inclusion and continuity," Kirsh continues. "We place a premium on living Jewishly, and we recognize that by providing people with the food and the money that allows them and their children to participate in the holiday, we help them feel a part of the Jewish community."

If you are interested in hosting a newcomer family for one of the seders, please call Joanna Sasson Morrison at 416-630-6481 ext. 30.

Perspective

UJA Federation intern readies for new life in Israel

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY

As Toronto prepares to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut with a huge party on April 24 in the park behind the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, I prepare to make aliyah and begin a new chapter in my life.

Although I will be at the UJA Federation sponsored Toronto celebration, I'm sure it'll be odd knowing that it will be my last year celebrating Israel's birthday as a Canadian citizen and not as an Israeli.

So far, preparing to leave for Israel has been easier than I had expected, as my friends and family have been surprisingly encouraging. The outpouring of support that I have felt has reinforced my decision to make the big move. People always ask what my parents think, and I respond by saying that my mother feels if she raised a daughter who wants to make aliyah, then she succeeded as a Jewish mother.

Shoshana Poznansky on a Tel Aviv beach in January of this year.

Once I made the decision, I have not questioned it. Although, if two years ago, when I was living in Jerusalem, studying at Hebrew University, someone had told me that I would make aliyah, I would have said they were out of their minds. Because of that year, Israel has grown on me; is always in my thoughts, and since I have been back to Canada, I cannot imagine living anywhere else but Israel. This feeling was only reinforced when I went to volunteer in Israel's north over the December break.

Although I was brought up living in relatively small Jewish communities in Canada, I had the opportunity to have a strong Jewish education. This, along with my home life, reinforced my Jewish identity, and moving to the Jewish homeland feels like the next logical step as I start my life as a young professional.

On a daily basis I am asked why I have decided to make aliyah. To explain myself around Yom Ha'atzmaut feels especially relevant. I was not alive in 1948 to go to Israel and fight for my country and my right to a Jewish homeland. I cannot make the same difference that many lost their lives to make. What I can do is make a statement in my own way. I'll stand with Israel in Israel.

As communities around the world celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, I have great comfort in knowing that next year, for Israel's 60th birthday, when I am celebrating in Zion Square in Jerusalem, Jewish communities around the world – including Toronto's incredible Jewish community – will be celebrating with me. B'shana Haba Byerushalayim!

UJA Federation's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebration takes place on Tuesday April 24 from 6 to 9 pm. For more information call 416.924.6211 ext. 154

Keeping memory of missing Israeli soldiers alive

Outdoor advertising part of comprehensive advocacy initiative

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

After some nine months at the hands of terrorist kidnappers, the silence surrounding the well-being of Israeli soldiers Ehud Goldwasser, Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit is the most prominent aspect of their continued captivity. Yet, the three captives are on the minds of millions around the world and, in Toronto, nearly 200 reminders of their plight are inescapably evident on the lawns of synagogues, Jewish schools and other private property throughout the Greater Toronto area.

The lawn signs and a giant billboard at Bathurst and Eglinton are sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to ensure that Goldwasser, Regev and Shalit will never be forgotten.

Each of the outdoor signs says "We don't leave our sons behind," and includes the names of the kidnapped soldiers

"These young men who are still missing are our brothers; they're our family," said Peter Ekstein, a long-standing supporter of UJA Federation and a strong proponent of using every vehicle available to heighten awareness of Israel's missing in action. "It's incumbent on all of us to keep them in our hearts and to remember that out of sight does not mean out of mind. Remember, these three young men are where they are now for one reason; they were defending Israel and our very way of life as Jews."

This UJA Federation of Greater Toronto billboard, situated at the intersection of Bathurst Street and Eglinton Avenue, along with nearly 200 lawn signs located throughout the GTA bearing the same message, are part of a UJA Federation advocacy initiative designed to keep the memory of three kidnapped Israeli soldiers alive in the public consciousness.

"We debated long and hard about how to keep the issue of the kidnapped soldiers front and centre," says Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto . "With everything that has gone on in the last few months we feared they would be forgotten. We wanted to give a voice to our community's concern, a voice that says we indeed have not forgotten and that we all share responsibility in keeping their cause alive and their freedom achieved as soon as possible. Those three soldiers fought for our freedom and their lives have meaning and value and must be secured at all costs. Our sons are not raised to die as martyrs, they are raised to live as free human beings."

The outdoor publicity is part of a more comprehensive advocacy initiative that includes a section of UJA Federation's Web site - www.jewishtoronto.com - devoted to the Israeli captives. Among the Web components are a petition to the secretary general of the United Nations and letters to families of the captives.

"This campaign is not about UJA Federation and it is certainly not about fundraising," said David Engel, chair of the UJA Federation board. "It's about one of the most sacred Jewish values - doing whatever we can to remember and, if possible, help, in a small way, to rescue Jewish captives."

Holocaust Centre reaches out to non-Jews for Yom HaShoah ceremony

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

The UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto is hoping that this year's Yom Hashoah community commemoration will include more representation than usual from the larger Toronto community.

The Centre is specifically reaching out to area churches – many of whom host events during Holocaust Education Week – and, for the first time, is formally inviting them to attend the commemoration, which will take place on Sunday, April 15 at Earl Bales Park (Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard Ave.), at 11:00 am.

Behind this expanded outreach effort is the fact that this year's keynote speaker will be Sibylle Niemoeller von Sell, former member of the German Resistance and widow of Pastor Martin Niemoeller.

"Sibylle Niemoeller von Sell comes from a family of courageous Christians who held fast to their convictions, despite the suffering it caused them at the hands of the Nazis," says Joyce Rifkind, The Holocaust Centre's chair of the Yom Hashoah Community Commemoration along with Lou Greenbaum of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. "We would like to invite members of the larger community to attend the Holocaust commemoration this year and hear, firsthand, what she experienced."

Ruth Fazal, Toronto composer and devout Christian, performed at last year's Yom Hashoah Community Commemoration. The Holocaust Centre of Toronto is hoping more members of the broader Toronto community will join in this year's commemoration.

Niemoeller von Sell, who converted to Judaism in 1990, was forced out of her high school for refusing to join the Hitler Youth and later endured arrest and abusive interrogation by the Gestapo. Her family was involved in an unsuccessful plot to assassinate Hitler and participated actively in an underground railroad in Berlin-Dahlem, hiding and saving Jews on the run.

In 1971 she married Pastor Martin Niemoeller, founder of the anti-Nazi Confessing Church in 1933 and author of the famous statement: "First they came for the Communists, but I was not a Communist so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Socialists and the Trade Unionists, but I was neither, so I did not speak out. Then they came for the Jews, but I was not a Jew so I did not speak out. And when they came for me, there was no one left to speak out for me."

"Pastor Niemoeller's observation expresses the need for those who are not immediately in danger to take action when the values embraced by civilized nations are threatened," says Jennifer Ritter, director of the Holocaust Centre. "Ultimately, it is about the responsibility we all carry as members of a human community. In the same spirit, we hope that the broader community will come out this year to participate in Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah and hear his widow tell her story of resistance against evil."

For more information about the upcoming Holocaust commemoration service, please call 416.635.2883 ext. 301.

Active retirees get opportunity to volunteer in Israel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Like many newly retired people, Sid Brail was eager to spend some of his newfound free time on an adventure.

And since he's a staunch Zionist, a trip to Israel made perfect sense.

But rather than hop on and off a tour bus, Brail and wife Judy opted to participate in the Gideon Program, a hands-on odyssey that involves volunteer work and field trips across Israel.

"My wife and I are still pretty active, and since we wanted to go to Israel to do something different, we went online, found Gideon and chose to do it," he said.

The Brail's were part of a contingent of eight "active retirees" from Canada who spent 25 days in Israel on the program this past January and February.

Their trip, which was based in full-service accommodations in Netanya, included such diverse activities as teaching English to elementary school students, picking citrus fruits on a moshav for a food bank, and volunteering in a soup kitchen.

"I went to an all-boys school to tutor English to students in grades 7 and 8," recalled Brail, who worked in Toronto's Jewish community for 15 years.

"I took the sports page from the Jerusalem Post and we talked about it. It was really nice to get to be with the kids and learn about their lives in Israel."

Carmella Shiponi, left, the wife of the founder of the Gideon Program, and Judy Weinman of Ottawa observe production of synagogue furniture at a factory on Kibbutz Lavi.

The program mixed volunteering with sightseeing at both historical and contemporary landmarks.

For example, the group toured historical sites such as Atlit, a detainee camp near Haifa where illegal immigrants to British Mandate Palestine were held, as well as modern-day institutions such as a training facility for seeing-eye dogs.

"[The touring] made us more informed about Israel and its history," Brail said.

The program was launched under the auspices of the Jewish Agency for Israel and B'nai Brith in the early 1980s by Netanya-native Gideon Shiponi, who wanted to foster solidarity between Israel and Diaspora through volunteering.

A group of Canadians, including Sid Brail, second from right, and his wife Judy, third from left, picked oranges and grapefruits for the Israel Food Bank

It has grown significantly over the years and today is overseen by the Shiponi family.

Brail noted that the program has traditionally been aimed mostly at Americans, but there is now an active effort to recruit Canadians.

"In terms of all the trips we took and all the things we did, this experience was excellent," said Brail.

"It met all our expectations."

Another trip under the auspices of the Gideon Program is set for April and June.

Russian-speaking Jews form first umbrella body

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the first time, Russian-speaking Jews in Montreal have an umbrella organization that aims to unite a richly diverse group of 20,000 people while making them a more visible and integral part of the wider Jewish community.

"We have been working on this a long time," said Mark Groysberg, who is president of the new organization, called the United Community of Russian-speaking Jews of Quebec (UCRJQ).

The group has applied for charitable status, but Groysberg, a journalist who for 12 years has published the Russian-language newspaper Voice of Community, said much remains to be done and the challenges are substantial.

Joined for an interview by Rabbi Israel Sirota, who for 20 years has worked on behalf of Russian Jews at a community centre on Bourret Street, Groysberg sees the new group serving the interests of all Russian-speaking Jews in the province, regardless of origin.

The majority, Groysberg said, came directly to Montreal over the years from the many ethnic states that made up the former Soviet Union. Thousands of others came from Israel.

That diversity has been a barrier to forming such an organization, Groysberg said.

Besides the ethnic differences, the range of Jewish cultural and religious identification is wide – from Orthodox to completely secular. Moreover, Russian-speaking Jews have tended to settle all over the city, including a significant number in the West Island, and even in other areas of the province, such as Quebec City and Sherbrooke.

Although these disparate locations have not served to unite Russian-speaking Jews, the UCRJQ wants to represent them all, "from A to Z," Groysberg said.

One of the group's priorities will also be to set up a much-needed database with the names of as many Russian-speaking Jews as possible. Eventually, Groysberg also hopes to have an Internet site.

An increase in the number of anti-Semitic incidents targeting Russian-speaking Jews over the last two years was also a factor that motivated Groysberg to create the UCRJQ, but only a minor one, he said, since community structures already exist to deal with it.

Groysberg and Rabbi Sirota also made it clear how they will seek to make the organization active in the community.

It announced its existence to all Federation CJA agencies and will maintain important links to relevant agencies such as Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, Jewish Family Services, the YM-YWHA and the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors.

In regard to the latter organization, Groysberg noted: "Twenty-five per cent of the community is elderly, but half is younger than 50."

The group also expects to meet with community leaders.

The new group, he and Rabbi Sirota said, will allow existing groups such as Rabbi Sirota's centre and a program for Russian Jews at the Y run by Olga Freiman, a UCRJQ vice-president, to network under one body. (Other UCRJQ officers include Rabbi Sirota, who is a vice-president; treasurer Yeoshia Fuks; and secretary Fanya Jivotovsky-Hilelson.)

Groysberg said his group also wants to attract Russian-speaking professionals who could contribute in meaningful ways to its viability.

In addition, since cultural activities such as music, theatre and literature have always been cherished values for Russian-speakers, the UCRJQ also wants to be prominent in those areas, he said.

"We were invited to the St. Patrick's Day parade, and we had 15 people there," Groysberg said. "We want to be a real part of Montreal Jewish community life."

An effort close to a decade ago to establish a similar body failed during the planning stages, but Groysberg and Rabbi Sirota said the key to success this time around is to have the right structure, to establish a formal budget, and to run things professionally, not on an ad hoc basis.

Groysberg said that, ideally, the UCRJQ will one day have its own full-time professional.

"Once you have the people, you are going to have the money," Rabbi Sirota said.

Montrealers' suit against Coke gets go ahead

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A U.S. Supreme Court decision has given new hope to a dispossessed Egyptian-Jewish family in its 45-year battle for justice that involves one of the world's biggest corporations, the Coca-Cola Company.

On March 19, the Supreme Court said it would not hear a request by Coca-Cola to halt a lawsuit against it by Refael Bigio and two other family members, all of Montreal, which they launched 10 years ago because of the company's use of commercial property seized by the Egyptian government from the family.

The decision means an appeals court ruling allowing the lawsuit to proceed in the United States stands. Coke's main argument has been that it bears no responsibility and the case belongs in an Egyptian court.

According to information filed in the case, the regime of Gamal Abdel Nasser expropriated the family's land and factories near Cairo in 1962, without compensation. The Bigios claim the reason was that they were Jewish. The family moved to Canada shortly thereafter.

"The Coca-Cola company has been insensitive to the claims and rights… of our family," the Bigios said in a statement. "The decision of the U.S. Supreme Court… will allow us to pursue adequate redress against this company and to seek proper compensations. This, in turn, permits us to be in a position to support Torah institutions and perform acts of kindness towards our fellow men."

The Bigios had owned the property since the early 1900s, when it was acquired by Refael's grandfather. Refael's widowed mother and sister are the other litigants.

Their claim against the soft-drink giant is based on one of its subsidiary's buying in 1994 a minority interest in the Egyptian bottling company that leased the Bigios' seized property. Three years later, the family sued Coke for trespass.

In 1980, the Egyptian government had ordered that the property be returned to the Bigios, but the Egyptian bottler, which was at the time government-owned and operated, refused to vacate, the court was told.

Around 1993, the Egyptian government privatized the company.

A federal district court in New York dismissed the Bigios' case, upholding Coke's defence that the family should pursue its claims in Egypt. Before turning to the U.S. justice system, the family did sue the Egyptian government in Egypt 12 times, but the case was thrown out each time. They feel it is unsafe for them to litigate once again in their former country.

Later, the U.S. 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the federal district court ruling, saying, "It was perfectly reasonable under these circumstances for the plaintiffs to bring their action against Coca-Cola, the only U.S. company involved, in the United States."

Coca-Cola spokesperson Crystal Walker said the company is not responsible. "This case involves a dispute over ownership of property in Egypt. The Coca-Cola Company is not the proper defendant. We have never had, and currently do not have any ownership interest in the property at issue in the litigation."

Refael Bigio referred any further questions to the New York-based Zionist Organization of America (ZOA), which is actively supporting the Bigios' cause and has called for a boycott of Coca-Cola products until the company makes what it considers a fair settlement with the family. ZOA president Morton Klein said the property is worth about $200 million (US) today.

The ZOA accuses Coke of knowingly "occupying" property that was "stolen" by the Egyptian government from Jewish owners.

The Bigios had a longstanding business relationship with Coca-Cola in Egypt. Coca-Cola leased a factory building from them for over 25 years, and the Bigios' supplied bottle caps and other products to the company.

When the Bigios learned that Coca-Cola intended to bid for a stake in the bottling company after the Egyptian government privatized it, they informed Coca-Cola of the family's claim of right to the property and asked for compensation.

They say company officials ignored their repeated requests.

According to Bigio, the subsidiary, known as the Coca-Cola Bottling Companies of Egypt, have a 42 per cent interest in the Egyptian bottler.

In 1997, the Bigios filed suit against Coke in a federal district court, but they lost.

The Bigios then engaged Washington, D.C., attorney Nathan Lewin, who successfully argued before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit that the Bigios were entitled to proceed with their claim in an American court.

Lewin, the ZOA notes, is a member of the advisory board of its Centre for Law and Justice. He's taken on many high-profile cases involving the Jewish community, and is currently the American Israel Public Affairs Committee's lead lawyer in the case against two of its ex-employees, Klein noted. "He's argued before the Supreme Court at least 20 times."

At Lewin's request, the ZOA submitted an amicus curiae ("friend of the court") brief to the Court of Appeals supporting the Bigios' claim that an American court is the appropriate forum for Coke to be held accountable and that they would not get a fair hearing in Egypt because they are Jewish.

In December, Leonard Getz, ZOA national vice-president and a Coca-Cola shareholder, submitted a request on behalf of shareholders that the company fully compensate the Bigios. But Coke excluded his proposal from the proxy materials for the 2007 annual shareholders' meeting, citing non-procedural reasons.

Chassidim OK with no frosting at Y

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Representatives of Montreal's chassidic communities say they can live with a local YMCA's decision to remove contentious frosting from windows that face a synagogue and install blinds instead, as had been the case for 12 years until a change was made last March.

"They are good neighbours. They could have shown a certain openness; they could have said, 'To hell with you guys,'" said Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Outremont Chassidic Organizations.

Mayer Feig, head of the Jewish Orthodox Community Council, was more resigned in his response, but didn't fault the Y. "There's nothing we can do about it… It's their right. I understand they have to listen to their paying members. But it's obvious they were also under a lot of outside pressure."

Both agreed that the matter had always been one between friends and was blown out of proportion by the media. The window frosting was seized on last November as a glaring example of the reasonable accommodation of a minority religious practice that had gone too far, and as a violation of one of Quebec's most sacred values, the equality of men and women.

Last week, the Y announced that it was removing the frosting in accordance with the wishes expressed by the great majority of its members in a survey conducted by a professional polling firm.

"The poll told us that installing clear windows with blinds controlled by users of the room was deemed to be a somewhat satisfactory or very satisfactory solution by 72 per cent of respondents," said Serge Saint-André, manager of the Park Avenue YMCA.

The poll was conducted from Feb. 17 to 28 among 302 members, about a 10th of the branch's adult membership.

The Y's Local Advisory Committee, composed of members and non-members, including area residents and representatives of partner organizations, also made a similar recommendation.

"We discussed the situation with representatives of the chassidic Jewish community. We feel confident that our decision is the best one possible under present circumstances," Saint-André said.

The Y will make the modifications at its own expense. The Yetev Lev Congregation, which had wanted the windows covered, had paid for the frosting.

Werzberger and Feig are both members of the synagogue, a Satmar congregation that has been in its present location for about 20 years. The back of the synagogue, which also houses a yeshiva, looks across a lane to the back of the Y.

After a renovation of the Y a dozen years ago, which included the addition of four large windows on the second floor of the building's rear wall in an exercise room used by women, members of the congregation requested that the view be blocked.

They said the sight of the women was a distraction, especially to the yeshiva boys.

After discussions that included the Local Advisory Committee at the time, a decision was made to put in blinds, Saint-André said.

A congregation member paid for those blinds, Werzberger said.

By March 2006, the blinds were in disrepair and in need of replacement.

Werzberger said the person who paid for the original blinds balked at paying for new ones, and a less expensive alternative – frosting the windows, which cost about $1,500 – was agreed upon with the Y.

Saint-André said a few of the room's users where consulted informally at that time.

"Some wanted to keep the blinds for the privacy they afforded," he said, but ultimately the Y opted to put in frosted windows because "this kind of window lets in light, and is also safe and more durable than blinds."

There was no apparent protest until November when a member, Renée Lavaillante, who takes a class in that room, began circulating a petition calling for the removal of the frosting.

Feig said the blinds will address the congregation's concerns, if they are used. The interior of the Y is most visible after dark when the lights are on, he said, but it can also be seen at other times, because the room is straight across from the synagogue.

The windows of the synagogue and yeshiva are also frosted, he noted. But they are sometimes open, and members walk or play in the lane, he said.

The Y insisted that this was "an example of good neighbourly relations," not an incidence of reasonable accommodation.

"All YMCAs in greater Montreal are involved in their communities and must field different kinds of requests from their neighbouring communities every day," said communications director Marie-Josée Meilleur.

"The many requests we receive always are and always will be treated with diligence and respect. However, the [Y] will build on this experience to improve its guidelines for the handling of future requests."

The uphill battle to change Israel's reputation

In the last two issues of The Canadian Jewish News, editor Mordechai Ben-Dat drew attention to a recent BBC poll that ranked Israel among the least-liked countries on a list that included Iran and North Korea.

One reason for Israel's dismal rating is that, overwhelmingly, the media portray it as a militaristic aggressor when it tries to defend itself against relentless terrorist assaults.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Still, in "Countering misperception" (The CJN, March 22), Ben-Dat urged readers not to despair "of the ultimate triumph of truth over falsity… As much as we can, we must become informed and educated about the truth of Israel, its unabating efforts toward peace with its neighbours, the fabulous diversity of the people who live there and the cacophonous but exciting society these people have created."

To which we must add the decency of Israelis, who have welcomed the victims of conflicts ranging from Vietnamese boat people to Bosnian Muslims to, most recently, refugees fleeing ravages in various African countries.

These rescue operations are sometimes covered in the media but, unfortunately, they don't have the same impact as repetitive stories about alleged Israeli aggression.

A recent example is "Sudanese in Israel Hope They Have Found a Home" by Dina Kraft (New York Times, March 18).Writing from Moshav Herev La'et, Kraft describes the ordeal of some 300 Sudanese seeking refugee status in Israel, an enemy country according to the Muslim-led Sudanese government.

Kraft writes: "Roughly 200 of the Sudanese in Israel are Muslim, including about 100 who fled the bloodshed in Darfur. Others include Christians who say they are fleeing persecution from southern Sudan and those simply looking for work."

The Sudanese entered Israel illegally from Egypt, where they were treated, in many cases, brutally. Once in Israel, many were detained pending an identity check, due to security concerns.

Human rights groups in Israel got involved in advocating for their request for asylum. It took the Israeli Supreme Court and pressure from the Israeli public for some of the Sudanese to be released to kibbutzim and moshavim while their refugee status is being determined.

Kraft quotes Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev as saying: "Israel has a special understanding of the genocide in Darfur. We have a very real compassion for the refugees and no one is being turned back. [But] Israel does not have the capability to deal with all of Africa's refugees, so we have to be mindful."

Kraft also interviews Theo Kaminer, an Israeli working for the kibbutz movement who feels a "moral obligation" to help the Sudanese refugees.

Kaminer says: "If not us, who will help them? No one else is lifting a hand. These people are refugees from a holocaust."

In "The racist hatred that just won't quit" (Toronto Star, March 18), columnist Anna Morgan reminds us that the United Nations Human Rights Council, headed by former Canadian Supreme Court justice Louise Arbour, has refused to pass even a single resolution condemning the genocide being perpetrated in Darfur by the Sudanese government and the Arab Janjaweed militia that it supports.

Morgan writes that instead of passing any resolutions against Sudan, the Human Rights Council "spent its first year focused solely on the evils of the Israelis; it passed eight resolutions against Israel and none against a single other country."

This fact alone is a shocking indictment not only against the council – led largely by human rights-abusing Arab and Muslim countries – but also against Arbour. As the human rights commissioner, she should be the first to speak out against this abuse of the council's announced mandate.

Yet when the Human Rights Council was formed about a year ago, it voted (with Canada and the EU voting against the measure) to guarantee that Israel's alleged human rights abuses were reviewed at every council meeting.

The council apparently has only one mission: to condemn Israel and thus to add to its isolation and deligitimization in world public opinion.

No end to this farce is in sight.

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 200 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind promise "big changes" in the days, weeks and months ahead. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Jewish educator gets hate letter

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On Dec. 8, Chuck Duboff experienced one of the high points of his career when he received the 2006 Manitoba Human Rights Commitment Award for an innovative program he created 12 years ago at his high school to raise students' awareness of human rights issues.

But on March 15, the longtime high school English teacher was brought down to earth with a thud when he found a hate letter directed to him in his mailbox at Maples Collegiate in north Winnipeg.

Duboff, whose brother, Neil, is a past president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, opened the letter in his classroom.

"I started to read it and my hand started to shake," he said. "It was the most vile piece of anti-Semitic writing that I have ever seen. I almost threw up."

The letter contained phrases such as "bloody Jews," "Jews are going to die" and "Hitler had the right idea," Duboff said, adding that the writing was in pencil block letters and it was unsigned. It was postmarked in Winnipeg.

Initially scared for his safety, Duboff called the police. They have no suspects, and he doesn't believe one will be identified.

He said he appreciates the support that he received from his school board and the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights.

Although he said that he doesn't make a point of telling people that he is Jewish, it's obvious from the wording of the letter that the writer knew. The writer also referred to his human rights award.

He said that he has since learned from police that two other prominent Jewish Winnipeggers who don't want to be identified received similar hate letters around the same time he did.

The letter, Duboff said, has inspired him to work even harder to teach his students and others respect for human rights.

"This has been a real eye-opener for a lot of people who didn't believe that this sort of thing was still happening," he said. "If people learn from this that the problem still exists, then my speaking out has been worthwhile. I have had tremendous support from across Canada and even for as far away as the Bahamas."

Duboff has been a high school English teacher for 31 years. He has been teaching at Maples Collegiate since 1984. The school is in an area with a large number of Asian immigrant families. Twelve years ago, he founded the Maples Unity Group in reaction to a racist comment by a federal politician.

"Each year in May, we march from the school to the Manitoba Legislature [a trek of about 12 kilometres] to demonstrate against racism and for human rights," he said.

"We usually have about 600 students participating [out of a student body of about 1,300].

"We also have a yearly 'Rock Against Racism' concert that combines music and speakers talking about human rights."

Duboff said his program has received widespread support over the years, including the support of the Asper Foundation.

Community banner will bear Shoah victims' names

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to the CJN

HAMILTON — Hamilton's annual Yom Hashoah commemoration will have an additional feature this year: a portable banner bearing the names of Hamilton residents' family members who died in the Holocaust.

At past Yom Hashoah events, names of lost loved ones were read during the ceremony.

"With this, people not only hear the names, they actually see them," said Benson Honig, a member of the city's Holocaust remembrance committee, which created the banner. "It makes it more tangible. They are real names connected to real people."

The banner has more than 500 names, and more will be added as new families move to Hamilton or families uncover more details on relatives who were lost through geneology and Holocaust programs.

"Incredibly, the number of names keeps growing and with so many names, we wanted to do something to demonstrate our commitment, to promise the seniors we will never forget," said committee member Gilda Ennis, a member of the city's Holocaust remembrance committee.

Committee member Abe Szpirglas said the banner includes a photo of a work by artist George Wallace and has a definite "Hamilton flavour."

As far as the group knows, no other community has created something quite like this memorial. Its portability was necessary because Hamilton's Yom Hashoah ceremony rotates between its three synagogues each year. As well, the banner can be taken to educational events at other times of the year.

Holocaust survivors started the remembrance committee in the mid-1950s to make sure there would be an annual ceremony.

Archie Lieberman, Honig, Szpirglas and Ennis – all children of Holocaust survivors – make up the current committee.

Ennis said that while many survivors prefer not to discuss their experiences, her parents told her many stories.

"My dad thanked me. With survivors passing, he worried people are not going to remember it, not going to believe it or people are going to forget," Ennis said. "With this, he sees they have our respect and they are being honoured. He said to me, 'You really listened.'"

This year's event will also feature speaker Ruth Davis, who as a child witnessed Kristallnacht and lived in a British orphanage after being part of the Kindertransport from Germany. Davis lives in the United States and published a book about her experience.

The community is invited to the Yom Hashoah commemoration April 15 at 7:30 p.m. at Beth Jacob Synagogue, 375 Aberdeen Ave. Memorial candlelighting starts at 6:30 p.m.

The committee is also urging current and former Hamilton residents to provide names of family members to add to the banner. Call the Hamilton Jewish Community Centre at 905-648-0605 or e-mail Abe Szpirglas at aszpirglas@sympatico.ca.

Passover Food Ideas

Pan-pals share their Passover fare

By NORENE GILLETZ
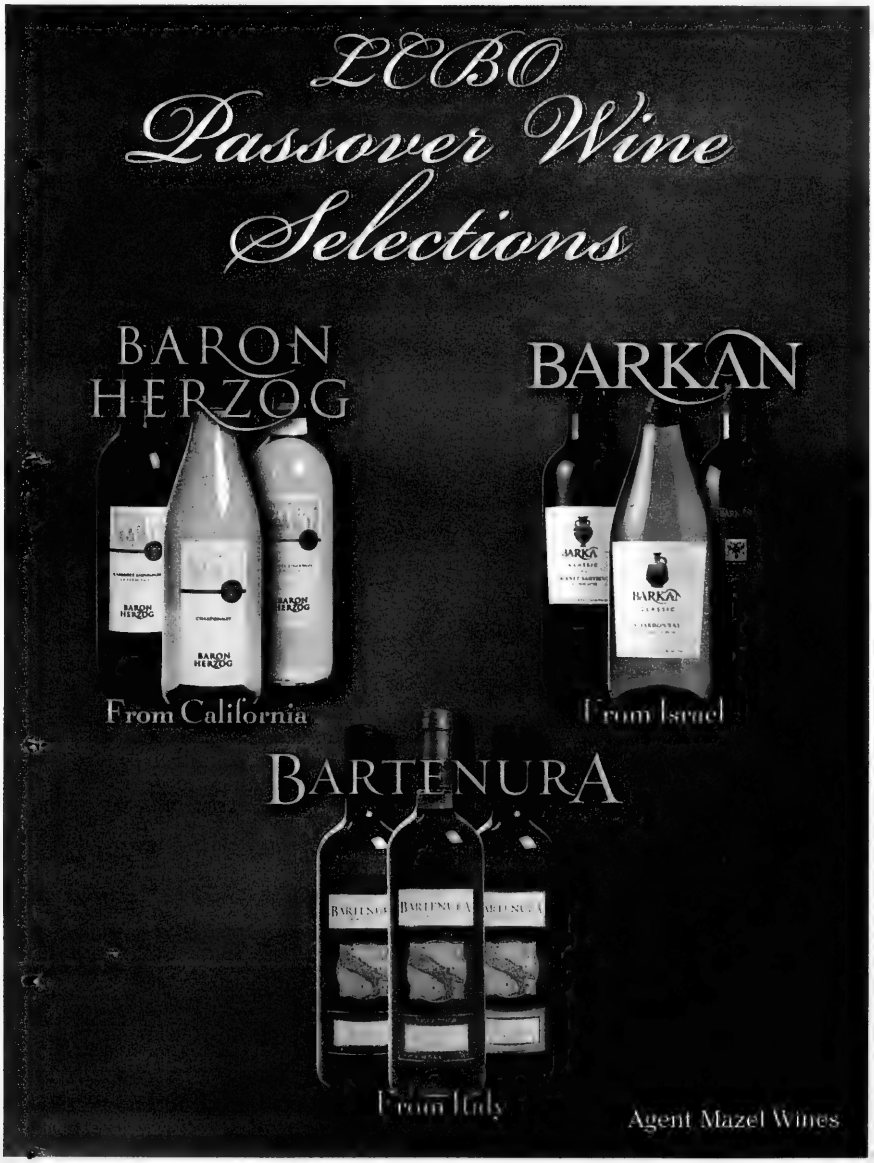
Special to The CJN

Here are some terrific recipes that my "pan-pals" from near and far have shared. They're great for a family meal or if you are expecting guests.

If you're looking for ways to use up that leftover charoset or need ideas on what to serve for breakfast or as a snack during Pesach, look no further. The recipe for these muffins originally came to me via my friend Bev Steinberg of Toronto. When I asked Bev what they tasted like, she said, "I've never made them, but here's my friend Ruth's phone number. I got the recipe from her."

I then phoned Ruth Silverberg, who told me that these muffins are "to die for!" Ruth said she always has lots of leftover charoset after the seders (she makes one that is a combination of Ashkenazi and Israeli styles). I asked her to share her recipe with me so that I could share them with you, my readers.

Ruth sent me her recipe by e-mail, along with her comments: "I keep them in the fridge (if they last that long) and zap them in the microwave for 20 seconds. Taste like they just came out of the oven!"



RUTH SILVERBERG'S CHAROSET MUFFINS

Charoset

4 apples (either Empire or Spy), peeled and cored
1/2 cup pitted dates, chopped
1/2 cup figs, chopped
1/2 cup raisins
1 cup ground almonds
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon
1 tbsp. honey
Manischewitz or Mogen David wine (as needed)

Chop apples in the food processor until they reach a medium consistency; empty into a large mixing bowl. Put dates, figs and raisins into processor bowl and process to the same consistency as the apples. Place them in the bowl with the apples. Mix in the ground almonds, cinnamon and honey. Add enough wine and mix to a paste texture. Taste. Add more cinnamon or honey if needed. Remember that the taste will be enhanced when it sits a day or two.

Preheat oven to 400. Arrange large paper muffin cups in muffin tins.

Muffins

1 cup charoset (above), drained
3 eggs
1/2 cup oil
3/4 cup sugar
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 cup matzah meal
1/2 tsp. salt

Separate the eggs and bring to room temperature. Place the whites in a medium bowl and beat with an electric mixer at high speed until stiff peaks form. Set aside.

Place the yolks in a large bowl and add the oil, sugar, lemon juice, matzah meal and salt. Whisk until thick, about 1 minute. Add the 1 cup drained charoset and stir until well blended. Gently stir half of the beaten whites into the batter, then gradually fold in the remaining whites until no traces of white are visible.

Fill the prepared tins about three-quarters full. Place on middle rack of oven and bake at 400 for 20 to 25 minutes, or until the tops are lightly browned and a toothpick inserted into the centre of a muffin comes out with just a few moist crumbs attached. Cool completely. Store in a covered container at room temperature. Makes 1 dozen. These muffins do not freeze well.

Lela Kornberg and I were born in Winnipeg and went to high school together. We reconnected when we both moved to Toronto several years ago, and treasure our friendship. Lela shared this recipe favourite with me. She got it when she lived in Calgary and has been making it for 35 years. Although it's supposed to be a side dish, Lela loves it for dessert topped with whipped cream and often serves it during the year. Add this to your recipe repertoire and receive rave reviews for it.

LELA KORNBERG'S UPSIDE-DOWN APRICOT PUDDING

16 dried apricots
1 lb. pitted prunes, cut up
1 cup warm water
4 eggs
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup matzah meal
1 tsp. potato starch
2 tbsp oil
4 apples, finely sliced
½ cup honey

In a medium bowl, soak dried apricots in warm water to cover until plump, about 1 hour. Drain well and set aside.

In another bowl, soak prunes in 1 cup warm water to cover until plump, about ½ hour. Do not drain. (You need to add the soaking water to the batter along with the prunes.)

Preheat oven to 350. In a large bowl, beat eggs, sugar, cinnamon and salt until well blended. Add matzah meal and potato starch; mix well. Let stand 30 minutes.

Add oil, apples and prunes, along with their soaking water; mix well.

Grease a 9 x 13-in. glass baking dish. Pour honey evenly into the bottom of the baking dish, then arrange the drained apricots in the honey. Pour batter over. Bake at 350 for 1 hour, or until a toothpick comes out clean.

Turn upside down on a serving platter while still warm. Delicious warm or cold, either as a side dish or a dessert. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

I met Marlyne Abramson of Toronto when she came to my book launch for Healthy Helpings, at the Jewish Book Fair, and we have since become friends. Marlyne shared this family favourite from her recipe files. She originally got the recipe from a fundraising cookbook published by the Sisterhood of Congregation Beth Sholom in Northbrook, Ill.

MARLYNE ABRAMSON'S MOCK OATMEAL COOKIES

2 cups matzah meal
2 cups matzah farfel
1½ cups sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup nuts, chopped medium-fine
⅔ cup oil (Marlyne uses mostly apple sauce with a little oil)
4 eggs
½ tsp. salt
½ cup raisins (optional)
1 tbsp. water

Preheat oven to 325. Mix all dry ingredients with an electric mixer or hand mixer until combined.

Add oil, apple sauce, eggs, salt, raisins and water, mixing well. Add a little more water if mixture is on the dry side.

Drop mixture by spoonfuls onto parchment paper. Bake for 25 to 30 minutes, until golden brown. Makes about 4 dozen.

A wide variety of quality Israeli wines available

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Boutique wineries throughout Israel have worked hard to change people's perception of Israeli wine, says a representative of Simcha Wine, a kosher wine agent.

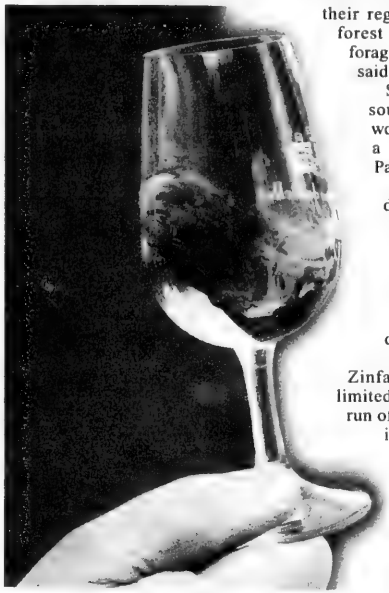
"With the quality and variety of wine they have to offer, they are getting the attention of wine drinkers everywhere," Janet Klugsberg said.

One such boutique is the Dalton Winery, located in the Upper Galilee in northern Israel. Established in 1995, it is one of the few family-owned wineries in the country.

Dalton lost quite a lot of its vineyards and production because of the war with Hezbollah in Lebanon this past summer, Klugsberg said.

She said Dalton owner Alex Haruni reported that they lost about 15 per cent of their production, or about 100,000 bottles, as a result of damage caused by the war.

"Some was bomb damage, some damage due to inability to spray the vineyards in a timely manner, and some damage due to hungry wild boars who were dispossessed from their regular habitat due to forest fires and had to forage elsewhere," Haruni said.



Simcha, the only source of Dalton wine worldwide, is carrying a large kosher for Passover selection.

Dalton's wines are divided into three series: Reserve, Dalton and Canaan, and it is the first winery in Israel to plant and produce a kosher red Zinfandel.

The Dalton 2005 Zinfandel – the first limited edition wine was a run of just 9,300 bottles – is produced from an experimental plot of about 0.6 hectares in their Safsufa vineyards located at the foothills of Mount Meron, Klugsberg said.

"The Dalton Zinfandel is an incredibly powerful wine with a dark inky hue. The nose is rich with currants, berries and plums spiced with cinnamon and vanilla from the barrel. The wine is long on the palate with sweet fruit and soft tannins."

Another boutique winery, whose products are available at Simcha, is Yatir, located at the foot of the Judean Hills.

Releases include Ya'ar Yatir 2003, a blend of 85 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon and 15 per cent merlot, reflecting its 12-month development in barrels with gently spicy and lightly dusty wood and showing fine balance between tannins, wood and acidity, Klugsberg said.

Also popular is Yatir's Cabernet Sauvignon-Merlot-Shiraz 2003, a blend of 56 per cent Cabernet Sauvignon, 33 per cent Merlot and 11 per cent Shiraz.

"Aged in oak for one year, this medium to full-bodied wine shows ripe berry, cherry and currant fruits, those with just a hint of toasted oak, backed up with vanilla and spicy aromas and flavours."

Binyamina Winery, larger than a boutique winery, has named one of its labels Yogev, which means farmer, in recognition of the farmers or vine growers "who work day and night to provide Binyamina with its wine grapes.

"The label is based on blends, and includes Cabernet Sauvignon Merlot, Cabernet Sauvignon Shiraz, Sauvignon Blanc Chardonnay and Cabernet Sauvignon Zinfandel (Rose)."

Recipes to try when you're tired of the traditional fare

By MAIA FILAR
Special to The CJN

We all know it well. The experience of going to Bubbie's, only to roll yourself home after being stuffed to the gills. This experience differs, depending on the occasion. Shabbat means a healthy heap of cholent. Passover? Well, Passover usually involves gefilte fish, brisket and a century-old charoset recipe. Not that there is anything wrong with the traditional recipes – and it is nearly impossible to incorporate new ideas into the repertoire. Nevertheless, here are some recipe ideas that can spice up your table while keeping everyone happy.

CHIPOTLE GEFILTE FISH

This recipe was created by Polish immigrants in Mexico and usually calls for sweet gefilte fish. In Mexico today there are close to 50,000 Jews, a majority of whom live in Mexico City. There are synagogues, kosher restaurants and a plethora of family recipes different from anything we are used to. Some would even call it fusion for the Jewish set. Enjoy this one as much as I do.

2 medium onions, thinly sliced
½ green pepper, sliced
½ red pepper, sliced
4 chipotle peppers, chopped
1 tbsp. adobo sauce (recipe follows)
1 cup Spanish olives, pitted
1 can crushed tomatoes, strained
½ cup coriander, roughly chopped
1 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. cooking oil
9 pieces sweet gefilte fish
salt and pepper

Preheat the oven to 325. In a large pot, heat the oil until shimmering. Add the onion and sweat until translucent, about 5 minutes. Add the peppers and cook until a bit softened, about 3 minutes.

Add the chipotle peppers and adobo sauce until aromatic, about 1 minute. Add olives and tomatoes. Crush the tomatoes with a wooden spoon until blended. Add the honey, salt and pepper and let simmer until all flavours are incorporated, 8 to 10 minutes.

Line the gefilte fish in a baking dish and spoon the mixture on top. Cover dish loosely with foil. Bake until the fish is warm, about 25 minutes. Top with fresh coriander.

Adobo Sauce
7 to 10 medium-sized dried chipotle chiles, stemmed and slit lengthwise
⅓ cup onion, cut in ½-in. slices
5 tbsp. vinegar
2 cloves garlic, sliced
¼ cup kosher for Passover ketchup
¼ tsp. salt

Spice up your Passover meal

Chipotles in adobo are chipotles that have been stewed in a lightly seasoned liquid. They have become very popular in southwestern cooking because they provide a distinctive warm heat and delicious smoky flavour. They can be added to almost anything, including sauces and salad dressings.

Combine all of the ingredients in a pan with 3 cups of water. Cover and cook over very low heat for 1 to 1½ hours, until the chilies are very soft and the liquid has been reduced to 1 cup. This recipe will keep for several weeks in the refrigerator in an airtight container.

VEGETARIAN MOUSSAKA

This dish is a great alternative for vegetarians or people who are trying to eat healthy. A classic moussaka alternates layers of minced meat, tomato sauce and vegetables topped with a béchamel sauce and baked in the oven. But béchamel is out of the question on Passover, so I substitute a healthier and equally delicious alternative, sweet potatoes.

2 medium eggplants, cut on a bias
2 large zucchini, cut on a bias
3 medium sweet potatoes, peeled and cut into cubes
1 tsp. cinnamon
3 tbsp. boiling water from potatoes
salt and pepper
cooking oil for frying

Tomato Sauce
1 tbsp. margarine or butter
1 can crushed tomatoes, strained
1 medium onion, sliced
salt, pepper, oregano

To make the tomato sauce, melt the margarine in a saucepan, until foaming. Add the onions and cook until translucent, about 5 minutes. Add the tomatoes and mix, crushing the tomatoes with a wooden spoon until well blended. Add salt pepper and oregano to taste. Keep simmering on the stove until ready to use.

For vegetarian moussaka: preheat oven to 350. Salt the eggplants and let them sit until you see beads of perspiration starting to form.

Place the sweet potatoes in cold water and on the stove at a high heat. Let them boil until the potato is tender enough to mash. Check consistency with a fork.

When the eggplants have started sweating, wash them off under cold water and dry completely with a dishcloth or paper towel.

Heat the oil in a large frying pan and lightly fry the eggplants and then the zucchini until half cooked.

When the sweet potatoes are soft, place them in a large bowl and mash with a fork. Add 3 tablespoons of the boiling water plus the cinnamon, salt and pepper to taste.

In a baking dish, place a layer of tomato sauce on the bottom. Add a layer of eggplants and zucchini and top with tomato sauce. Continue this until all the vegetables are used. Top with the sweet potato mash and bake for 30 minutes or until the mash is golden brown.

Low-Carb Gefilte Fish as seen in Enlitened Kosher Cooking by Nechama Cohen, Feldheim publishers.

SWEET QUINOA PILAF

This is an amazingly healthy, kosher alternative to the usual carb dish on the table. Light and fluffy in texture, but nutty and complex in flavour, quinoa isn't called "the mother of all grains" for nothing.

1 tbsp. oil
1½ cups quinoa, rinsed though a strainer with cold water
2½ cups water
½ cup dried cranberries
¼ cup chives, finely chopped
salt and pepper

Heat the oil in a medium pot, until shimmering. Add the quinoa, coating in the oil until you can smell the nutty aroma, about 2 minutes. Add the water and bring to a boil. Cover and simmer until all the water has been absorbed, about 20 minutes. When it is ready, add the dried cranberries and salt and pepper to taste. Serve sprinkled with chives.

Canadian producer branches into corporate world

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

From live theatre and short films to corporate videos and television commercials, Michael Gelfand has dipped his hand in almost every part of the production world.

Michael Gelfand, in his Toronto office

At only 30, Gelfand has amassed years of experience since he was a teenager and began producing musicals in high school.

After graduating from the University of Western Ontario with an honours BA in media, information and technoculture, Gelfand landed a job in 2000 at Rogers Productions, a production company based out of the Rogers head office, where he produced several commercials and corporate videos for the marketing department throughout his four-year stint.

But it wasn't until Gelfand was invited to take part in a program offered by the Canadian Film Centre that he saw an opportunity to branch out into producing short films.

The centre, which was founded in 1988 by Canadian filmmaker Norman Jewison, provides training for emerging directors, writers, producers and other professionals in the film industry from Canada and abroad.

Gelfand participated in the six-month Allliance Atlantis Residency Program.

"That was an amazing experience. We would have amazing industry professionals come in and teach us, lecture and give us an opportunity to network and work with some good, young Canadian talent," Gelfand said.

Since taking part in the program, Gelfand worked on two short films that have received critical acclaim.

Big Girl, a film that won the Bravo! FACT Short Cuts Canada Award at the 2005 Toronto International Film Festival, is about a nine-year-old girl who attempts to cut her mother's boyfriends out of her mother's life, by entering in a playful competition with him. If she wins, Gerry must stop seeing her mother, but if he wins, she has to accept him.

Gelfand also produced a 2006 short film titled the Ninth Street Chronicles, which was nominated for a 2007 Genie Award, and tied for second place.

Gelfand recalled one of the memorable moments on the set of that film, which is a coming-of-age story set in the 1980s.

"We were working with an actress on Ninth Street Chronicles named Samantha Weinstein, who was also in Big Girl. In one of the scenes, she was in a car with one of the actors, where his character has been really hurt..."

"Samantha just pulled this performance where she was crying out of nowhere, and it was so gratifying because it was one of the first times where she was legitimately crying. It was amazing and very rewarding to see a performer get into the part so much," Gelfand said.

But as gratifying as it is to witness members of your filmmaking team put everything they have into a project, the ultimate reward for a producer, he said, is to have the finished project seen and enjoyed by people.

In 2005, Gelfand fulfilled his dream of launching his own production company called Look Ma Media Inc., which is geared toward the corporate side of production.

Drawing on his experience as a producer for Rogers, Gelfand offers big businesses marketing support using a filmmaking approach to corporate and commercial production.

"These days, businesses have really specific needs and it is getting harder and harder to reach their perspective markets, so I really want to continue helping businesses reach their targets," he said.

Look Ma Media inc. was commissioned by Holy Blossom Temple to produce a documentary for its 150th anniversary.

While Gelfand said that he'd love to one day work with the team that produced the comedies Best in Show, A Mighty Wind and For Your Consideration, he doesn't see that in his immediate future.

"But I am looking towards doing more family-geared entertainment... There is something really special about a family being able to sit down and share the experience of watching a film together that I know I always enjoyed when I was growing up and I still enjoy it to this day."

On top of the goal of trying to keep his work fresh and ground-breaking, Gelfand also wants to do what he can to remain in Canada.

"It is really important to me. I'm really attached to the community here. My family is in Toronto and I think the Canadian industry is an exciting industry. I think as an industry in general, it produces a poignant variety of entertainment. It is a great place to work," he said.

"As an independent producer, it is possible to get your stuff produced in Canada. Being in Toronto, it's a great film market, too."

Jewish high school holds cancer fundraiser

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Students at the Gray Academy, Winnipeg's Jewish high school, held their annual "Loonie-Toonie Day" event last week and raised more than $1,000 for CancerCare Manitoba.

As part of the March 21 drive, the students went out into halls of the Asper Jewish Community Campus, where their school is located, and solicited donations of loonies and toonies from fellow students, parents and passersby. They then attached the coins to a one-mile line of masking tape on the floor, with milestones penciled in along the way.

The event has been held for the past six years, and last year it raised more than $750 for CancerCare Manitoba.

"Our goal this year was $1,000," said student council president Yael Shrom. "At the end of the day, we collected just over $1,000."

This year, Shrom and her student council decided to invite other schools throughout the province to join the initiative and have their own Loonie-Toonie Day.

"My vision since Grade 7 has been to unite all student councils across Manitoba in a singular cause," Shrom said. "Two years ago, in Grade 10, I had the idea to bring together schools in a large-scale fundraising event. I figured why not this one. It's a simple project. It doesn't take much planning. All you need is masking tape."

Last November, Shrom sent out 350 letters to all the student councils at high schools across the province.

"Fifteen schools responded," she said. "Most were from rural Manitoba. The student councils were very excited about the project."

The Winnipeg high schools that responded were the University of Winnipeg Collegiate and St. John's-Ravenscourt School, one of the city's leading private academies.

Shrom said the goal for all the schools was to raise $5,000 in total.

In addition to her role as Gray Academy student council president, Shrom heads the United Way of Winnipeg's student leadership conference committee, a position she inherited from her older sister, Lainie.

The committee organizes an annual leadership conference each fall for high school students from all over Winnipeg.

Shrom will be graduating from Gray Academy this year and plans to study science at the University of Manitoba next fall.

Iran says it will limit co-operation with nuclear watchdog

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran said on Sunday that it will press ahead with its nuclear program despite what it called an "illegal" UN resolution imposing new financial and arms sanctions, adding that it will limit its co-operation with the UN nuclear watchdog in wake of the sanctions.

"Iran will not stop its peaceful and legal nuclear trend even for one second because of such an illegal resolution," Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said on his website, www.president.ir.

The UN Security Council unanimously approved the sanctions against Tehran on Saturday for its refusal to suspend a nuclear program, but major powers also offered new talks and renewed an economic and technological incentive package offer.

"The Iranian nation will not forget those who backed and those who rejected [the resolution], while adjusting its international relations," he said without indicating what that adjustment would entail.

The sanctions will stay in place until Iran halts the enrichment of uranium and the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel, which can be used to make a bomb or to generate power. Iran has 60 days to comply or face possible new sanctions.

Major powers have previously said negotiations on Iran's nuclear program could not begin until Tehran halts uranium enrichment.

A government spokesperson, Gholam Hossein Elham, said Iran will limit its co-operation with the UN watchdog, the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) until Iran's nuclear case is referred back to the agency by the UN Security Council, Elham said.

The European Union will seek to revive dialogue with Iran after the UN Security Council toughened sanctions on Tehran for refusing to halt sensitive nuclear work, EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana said on Sunday.

Solana spoke a day after the Security Council voted unanimously to impose tougher sanctions on Iran to push Tehran to meet the international community's demand that it suspend its nuclear enrichment programs.

Tehran meanwhile escalated its rhetoric, maintaining that the 15 British naval personnel arrested by Revolutionary Guard units in the disputed Shatt al-Arab waterway on Friday had "confessed" to entering Iranian territorial waters in an act of "blatant aggression."

Solana said he planned to speak to chief Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani on Sunday to assess the possibility of relaunching negotiations that collapsed after Iran refused to suspend its uranium enrichment program, which the West suspects is aimed at developing nuclear weapons.

"I'm going to get in contact with Mr. Larijani this morning if I can, to see if we can find a route that would allow us to go into negotiations," Solana told reporters in Berlin, where he was attending a summit marking the 50th anniversary of the Treaty of Rome under which the EU was formed.

The Security Council approved a ban on Iranian arms exports and a freeze of the assets of 28 additional people and organizations involved in Iran's nuclear and missile programs. The list includes Sepah, a government-owned bank.

"This resolution sends an unambiguous signal to the government and people of Iran... that the path of nuclear proliferation by Iran is not one that the international community can accept," said British Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry.

Iran has vowed the sanctions will only motivate it to pursue nuclear power, a message Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki was expected to deliver to the Security Council.

Mottaki made the trip instead of Ahmadinejad, who claimed he cancelled his appearance because the United States failed to deliver his visa in time.

The new sanctions – a compromise between the stronger measures favoured by the United States and the Europeans and the softer approach advocated by Russia and China – are considered modest.

The Security Council imposed its first set of sanctions in December, but Iran responded by expanding enrichment. Iran says it will never give up its right to enrich uranium to produce nuclear fuel, though it has offered to provide guarantees that its nuclear program won't be diverted toward weapons.

Ahmadinejad had said he wanted to make those arguments before the Security Council himself, but Iran accused the United States of thwarting his planned trip by delaying the delivery of his visa. U.S. State Department deputy spokesperson Tom Casey said the visa arrived in time and suggested the Iranian president was unwilling to stand before the council and take the heat for his continued defiance of the international community.

In December, the Security Council ordered all countries to stop supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and to freeze assets of 10 key Iranian companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

The new resolution calls for voluntary restrictions on travel by the individuals subject to sanctions, on arms sales to Iran and on new financial assistance or loans to the Iranian government.

It asks the IAEA to report back in 60 days on whether Iran has suspended enrichment and warns Iran could face further measures if it does not. But it also says all sanctions will be suspended if Iran halts enrichment, and makes clear that Tehran can still accept the package of economic incentives and political rewards offered last year if it complies with the council's demands.

In a key compromise, the document refers to a past resolution from the IAEA calling for the Middle East to be free of weapons of mass destruction. Indonesia and Qatar had wanted the council to make that appeal outright, but the United States intervened, adopting instead an IAEA statement that "a solution to the Iranian nuclear program would contribute to international efforts against nuclear proliferation including efforts relating to the Middle East."

Meanwhile, Iran has moved the 15 British seamen it has held in custody since last Friday to Tehran for interrogation.

The British Marines and sailors were arrested after they searched a merchant ship Friday morning in the disputed Shatt al-Arab waterway.

Britain immediately demanded the return of its troops and denied they had strayed into Iranian waters.

In London on Saturday, Foreign Office undersecretary Lord Triesman spent more than an hour with the Iranian ambassador to London, Rasoul Movahedian, demanding the safe return of the 15 and seeking assurances of their welfare and consular access.

Foreign Secretary Margaret Beckett and the Ministry of Defence said the troops were in Iraqi waters at the time they were picked up.

In June 2004, six British Marines and two sailors were captured, then paraded blindfolded on Iranian television. They admitted they had entered Iranian waters illegally but were released unharmed after three days.

Iranian hard-liners have already called for the 15 Britons to be held until Iran wins political concessions from the West.

British opposition lawmakers called on the government not to allow Iran to use the capture of the military personnel as a tool in the nuclear dispute.

On Monday, a senior Iranian military official warned the United States against launching any attack on the Islamic Republic.

"If America starts a war against Iran, it won't be the one who finishes it," Morteza Saffari, naval forces commander of the elite Revolutionary Guards, was quoted as saying by the ISNA news agency.

Arabs might change peace plan, Saudi says

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Saudi Arabia's foreign minister suggested Monday that Arab leaders would be willing to consider changes to their 2002 peace offer to Israel to make it compatible with new developments.

The public words from Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal came as Arab League foreign ministers convened in Saudi Arabia to prepare for a leaders summit expected to focus on how to revive Mideast peace efforts. Arab leaders have, until now, publicly rejected Israeli calls for changes to a 2002 peace offer – which would see them normalize relations with Israel if it withdraws to pre-1967 borders – as a first step toward ending the decades-long Palestinian-Israeli conflict.

But al-Faisal, in his opening remarks, suggested change is being considered.

"It is expected from us to take notice of new developments, which require additions and developments in whatever is offered from our leaders about the issues and problems, in order for our resolutions to be compatible with what is dire and new," he said.

"The kingdom is keen that this summit should come out with one Arab voice toward issues of destiny, and in particular the Palestinian issue."

A day after U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced a new peace initiative, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said Monday that he's not familiar with any new suggestions for talks with the Palestinians.

Speaking at a joint press conference with UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon in Jerusalem, Olmert said he maintains ongoing contact with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and that the basis for any new talks would be the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan.

On Sunday, Rice said the United States is planning to hold separate talks with Israel and the PA aimed at achieving an accord that will lead to the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Rice, who was on a visit to Israel, said Sunday night that the United States will hold separate talks with the two sides and present questions and request clarifications regarding their positions in an effort to reach an agreed-upon agenda for the renewal of peace talks.

Rice planned to query the sides on two main issues: territory and security.

She said it's possible to learn from the experience since the end of talks in 2000, particularly with regard to security arrangements. She also said she would ask Israel as to how it intends to implement the vision of a territorially contiguous Palestinian state in the West Bank.

On Monday, Olmert said he would continue contacts with Abbas, but said he has no plans for a major Mideast summit.

Rice arrived in Israel on Sunday, and, speaking to U.S. reporters before dining with Olmert, she acknowledged that her approach was cautious and that chances for quick dramatic progress are low.

"The question here isn't speed. The question is trying to really move forward toward the establishment of a Palestinian state," she said.

Her meeting with Olmert lasted about three hours, Israel Radio reported. She was scheduled to meet Monday with Defence Minister Amir Peretz and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni.

On Monday evening, she was to hold a press conference in Jerusalem, which was to open with a short statement summarizing her visit.

Israeli officials held talks with Rice's aides Sunday in an effort to soften the statement. They wanted to avoid formulations that would be binding in a final deal or that touch on issues of serious dispute, such as Jerusalem and refugees.

Rice told reporters Sunday that her earlier visit to the region five weeks ago, and her tripartite meeting with Abbas and Olmert in Jerusalem, took place against the background of the Mecca agreement to establish a Palestinian national unity government.

Unlike that meeting, which Rice hinted took place because it had already been scheduled, this visit aims to jump-start separate negotiations.

Rice said she sat for many hours with U.S. President George W. Bush in order to formulate a diplomatic strategy, and she said she doesn't exclude the possibility that a special envoy will be appointed for talks with the two sides.

Rice's statement on Monday was expected to relate to the Arab League summit in Riyadh, scheduled for Thursday, which will likely reaffirm the the Saudi peace proposal of 2002.

The Americans are hoping the Saudis will provide a regional aegis for the renewal of the peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

Also on Sunday, Olmert strongly attacked Abbas for agreeing to participate in the unity government.

"He violated, in a blatant fashion, a series of commitments that were made to Israel, and especially his commitment not to set up a Palestinian unity government prior to the release of [kidnapped Israeli soldier] Gilad Shalit. This commitment was made to me repeatedly, including at the tripartite meeting. It was also made to the leaders of other countries, and these leaders, who heard this clear commitment of the chairman, wondered how it could be violated so blatantly."

Olmert added that the "political platform of the Palestinian unity government grants legitimacy to violent resistance, violating the promise of [Abbas]. All this will not make contacts between us and the PA easier in the near future."

Hamas political bureau chief, Khaled Meshal, told Saudi officials Sunday that his party would not oppose the Arab Peace initiative, which is expected to be reaffirmed during summit this weekend.

However, the Palestinian unity government doesn't intend to announce its support for the plan and will make do with the kind of statements made during the Mecca summit, in the form of "commitment to the Arab decisions."

WZO, Jewish Agency launch online anti-Ahmadinejad campaign

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

As world leaders and UN member states continue to wrangle over the issue of Iran's quest for nuclear power, Jewish organizations continue to take action against the belligerent regime and its anti-Semitic president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

The latest campaign comes in the form of an online protest website created by a Tel Aviv public relations firm, Arad Communications, and launched jointly by the World Zionist Organization (WZO) and the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Called the "International anti-Ahmadinejad Campaign," the organizations launched the site on March 19 and hope millions of surfers will join their "virtual protest" against Ahmadinejad.

The Jewish Agency sees the site as the "first attempt to deal with anti-Semitism, Holocaust denial and hatred of Israel, while most of the world is focusing… on slowing the nuclear capacity of Iran."

Plans call for the website to link in with others worldwide and with all English websites in Israel, in the hope of sparking a virtual expression of worldwide solidarity against Iranian anti-Semitic rhetoric.

According to Jewish Agency spokesperson Michael Jankelowitz, the site received more than two million hits in the first two days of the campaign alone.

On the Jewish Agency's website, Shlomo Molla, the head of the WZO's department for Zionist institutes and the man who initiated the campaign, said, "The Iranian president's words are provocative and we must not ignore them. The aggressive anti-Semitic campaign led by Ahmadinejad, which is influencing millions of people, is not less dangerous than Iran's attempt to develop nuclear weapons."

The website is simple, yet stark.

Set against a black background, various images of Ahmadinejad fade in and out while soundbites play, in Farsi with accompanying English subtitles. They're snippets of speeches Ahmadinejad has given to the Iranian people, inciting them to violence against Israel.

A headline reads "When you ignore the risks… you get burned!" and there are three sections for readers to fill out at the bottom of the page in order to "join the virtual protest."

Surfers also have the option of e-mailing the site to their friends or firing off a protest e-mail directly to the Iranian foreign ministry.

"The purpose of this unique campaign is to draw the attention of the public to the anti-Semitism of Ahmadinejad and create a buzz on the web regarding this issue," Jankelowitz said.

Singer denies taking WJC money

JTA

NEW YORK — Rabbi Israel Singer has denied accusations that he took money from the World Jewish Congress without authorization or documentation.

WJC president Edgar Bronfman said last week that he fired Rabbi Israel Singer because he was taking money without proper authorization or documentation. Bronfman made the allegations in a March 14 letter to European Jewish Congress president Pierre Besnainou after WJC affiliates in Europe, Latin America and Israel expressed dismay about being notified in a conference call earlier that day that Rabbi Singer, who held a variety of top positions in the WJC over the past 30 years, had been fired.

Rabbi Singer "helped himself to cash from the WJC office, my cash," Bronfman wrote in the letter. "We thought we had that all cleared up, and then we discovered that he was playing the same game in Israel, taking cash from the office and never accounting for it."

He continued: "The final blow came when we discovered that he was playing games with his hotel bills in Jerusalem."

Last week, Rabbi Singer released a statement through his attorney calling the accusations "baseless" and adding, "I categorically deny them."

"I am shocked and deeply saddened that Edgar, a man with whom I have worked so closely for 30 years would go to such lengths to publicly shame both himself and me," the statement read. "For over 30 years, I have given of my heart and soul to achieve the objectives of the WJC and for the benefit of the Jewish people. I will not engage in any petty or mean-spirited or valueless arguments."

He concluded: "I will spend the rest of my life in pursuing causes for the Jewish people and human rights, and to remedy injustices against those victimized by prejudice and ignorance. My efforts will never cease."

In a statement, a WJC spokesperson replied, "These issues are now before the proper legal authorities.

"Our sadness continues, because underlying these issues has been Mr. Singer's inability to accept responsibility for his actions. Mr. Bronfman is committed to his continuing efforts to restore integrity to the World Jewish Congress, and that will remain his focus."

Rabbi Singer has been under a cloud since the revelation several years ago that he secretly transferred $1.2 million of WJC money to a Swiss bank account. The money was subsequently returned, but critics say the transfer was never fully explained.

A 2006 report by the New York State Attorney General's Office found no evidence of criminality on Rabbi Singer's part, but it assailed the organization for lax record keeping and said Rabbi Singer had violated his fiduciary duties by moving money around without authorization. Still, his firing has roiled the WJC, the umbrella group for more than 100 local Jewish communities around the globe.

Renowned in the Jewish world for his success in wresting Holocaust restitution payments from European banks and governments, Rabbi Singer remains a top official of the Claims Conference and the World Jewish Restitution Organization.

Laborites flock to Barak

Two senior members of Israel's Labor Party came out in support of Ehud Barak's leadership bid. Party Secretary General Eitan Cabel and MK Matan Vilna'i said last week that they would back the former Israeli prime minister in the May 28 primary for party leader. Barak already has the support of several top Labor figures, though polls of party rank-and-file show him trailing frontrunner Ami Ayalon, a retired admiral and former Shin Bet security chief. Israeli pundits speculate that if either Barak or Ayalon succeeds in toppling Labor chief Amir Peretz, they could team up to challenge Prime Minister Ehud Olmert for top office.

Lebanon war given name

Israel formally named last year's Lebanon war. The government's ceremonies and protocol committee has chosen to call last summer's conflict with Hezbollah the Second Lebanon War. The first was in 1982. The name was to come before cabinet for ratification Sunday. The decision came after pressure by Israelis bereaved during the 34 days of fighting who feared the government might try to play down the war's failings by choosing a less formal designation.

Maxim to gloss Israel's image

Israel's image-makers are turning to the pages of the U.S. men's magazine Maxim. A magazine popular among men for its "beer and babes" format, Maxim is sending a team to Israel for a photo shoot with seven local fashion models. The idea was hatched by the Foreign Ministry as part of efforts to counter Israel's image as a hotbed of conflict. The issue with the photo spread is expected on newsstands in June and will be followed with a review of tourism in Israel.

Birthright Haggadah

Birthright israel released its 2007 Passover Haggadah, which is available for download on the organization's website, www.birthrightisrael.com. The Haggadah, titled This Year in Jerusalem, is an outreach tool for birthright alumni. "Many Taglit-birthright israel participants return with a desire to sustain the connection with Judaism they found through their trip," said Jay Golan, president of the birthright israel Foundation. "This Haggadah serves as a resource for our alumni to themselves become a part of the Passover ritual, by virtue of their participation in it."

New Haggadah's 'add-ons' help make seder relevant to all

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

All too often, we rush through the Passover Haggadah to get to the seder meal as quickly as possible.

But Mishael and Noam Zion, a father-and-son team, and authors of A Night to Remember: The Haggadah of Contemporary Voices, have come up with a way to make the whole family appreciate the Passover story.

The easy-to-read, oversize paperback – chock full of stories, explanations, games, poems, illustrations and quotes – is sure to have something for every age group at the seder table.

Billed as "add-ons," these offerings are located in colour on the left side of the book, while the full traditional Haggadah text appears to the right on a white background.

The authors warn, though, that while we may want some innovations to our seder, it is a night of tradition and ritual, so adding too many new ideas may alienate some participants.

"It's best to feast on a few new 'side dishes,' and leave others for next year. Adapt your seder plans to the changing needs and interests of the participants around the table each year."

Among the side dishes to try if there are young children at the table are those accompanying the 10 plagues. They'll be sure to enjoy the poem by Shirley Cohen, Frogs on Pharaoh's Head: "One morning when Pharaoh awoke in bed/ There were frogs on his head and frogs on his bed/ Frogs on his nose and frogs on his toes/ Frogs here, frogs there/ Frogs were jumping everywhere."

On the same page is a reading for adults by Israeli educator Shai Zarhi. The plagues, "seem to me to be a parade of people's greatest fears. Starting from the blood of birth and of death, through primal human fears of small creatures (lice) and large ones (wild beasts), fear of financial ruin (locusts), fear of the dark (losing direction and meaning), we face the greatest fear: the fear for our children's lives – loss of the future," he writes.

"Tonight, a night to commemorate the past, we seek the mercy of God's protection, look out from our places at a world full of fears and dangers – and pray for another quiet year."

Pre-teens will want to try the Pesach math riddles to compute in their heads: "Number of Moshe's siblings, times number of years in desert, times (number of days Moshe spent on Mount Sinai without eating, minus number of tablets of law)." The answer is given at the back of book.

For women, a prayer to repair the world – written by Alice Shalvi, founder of the Israeli women's lobby – accompanies the candlelighting prayers. "As I delight in a loving marriage of true minds, may I never forget the thousands of women battered and beaten by their spouses. As I rejoice in the bliss of my children and grandchildren, may I never forget the pleading eyes and swollen bellies of starving infants deprived of physical and emotional nourishment… May there always be a place at my table for those who are homeless and hungry. May my woman's capacities for concern, compassion, and caring never by dulled by complacency or personal contentment. May my feelings always lead me to act."

Along with the story of Exodus, participants can also read an account by Israel pilot Pini Nahmani of his "seder" in a Syrian prison after being shot down over a Damascus suburb, or they can read about Golda Meir's hunger strike against the British in 1946.

As the authors say, there is so much to choose from in A Night to Remember that readers should "feel free to ask, and add on or skip. No matter your background, no matter your age, no matter your knowledge, make this seder your own."

Award-winning movie based on Israeli director's kibbutz experiences

By RISHA GOTLIEB
Special to The CJN

Director Dror Shaul directs Tomer Steinhof and Ami Vell in Sweet Mud.

MIAMI — This year's Miami International Film Festival (MIFF), held March 2 to 11, featured three Israeli films: The Cemetery Club, Someone to Run With and the highly anticipated Sweet Mud, winner of four Israeli Academy Awards, including best picture, and recipient of the World Cinema Jury Prize at this year's Sundance Film Festival. It also took home the World Dramatic Feature audience award at the MIFF.

Written and directed by Dror Shaul, Sweet Mud shows a serious side of this Tel Aviv filmmaker who is best known for his comedies Operation Grandma and Sima the Witch.

Sweet Mud is loosely based on Shaul's real experiences as a young boy growing up on a kibbutz in southern Israel in the 1970s. This poignant and provocative coming-of-age story pulls back the tattered laced curtain to reveal realities about the communal settlement.

The film unfolds through the eyes of 12-year-old fatherless Dvir, who finds himself coping with his emotionally scarred mother, Miri, in what is portrayed as a closed community bound by rigid rules.

When Miri's Swiss boyfriend, Stephan, a true mensch, comes to visit and proposes marriage, some hope finally emerges, but it's short-lived after the members of the kibbutz turn against him out of ignorance and he returns to Switzerland.

Fragile and broken, Miri is wrongfully institutionalized, and when she returns, Dvir comes to the bitter realization that he is the only one willing to help her.

In an interview Dror Shaul elaborated on his own experience of living on a kibbutz and the future of Israel's kibbutz movement.

"Most of the events portrayed in Sweet Mud were unfortunately not invented," Shaul said. "The kibbutz movement was established in Israel about 100 years ago. The idea was amazing but probably impossible to survive history. When Israel was a young struggling country, the kibbutz helped it a lot and was important in shaping and developing the state. But when the country no longer had the doubt in its existence (in the early 1980s), the kibbutz movement started to crash. Today, there are only a few of the 300 kibbutzim that are successful. Most of them are deserted and somehow neglected. It is sad to see."

Shaul says Sweet Mud is the first full-length feature film that "dares to say what generations of miserable kibbutz-raised children suppressed." Before its production, he adds, the script was kept as a tightly guarded secret. "Nobody besides the crew, actors and our financial backers knew what the project was actually about."

On one level, the film narrates the tragically personal story of a relationship between a dysfunctional mother and her son, while, on another level, it skilfully and seemingly without effort recreates the larger-than-life complexities of politics, religion and strife playing out on our planet through the symbolic portrayal of kibbutz society.

And although the story is at times heart-wrenching, the dreamlike cinematography that captures Israel's countryside – magnificent sunsets, a vibrant rain storm and endless rolling farm fields with two trees growing magically amidst parched soil – gives one hope that even if kibbutz society dies, its children won't give up on reconnecting with the original innocence and ideals the movement was founded on.

Shaul explained the passion that drove him to make this film was not from a need to criticize or even to educate, but to give a voice to the seldom heard. But that's not to say that this film doesn't challenge Jews to question long-held beliefs.

"I guess any society has to grow up in order to be able to criticize itself. This is what is happening to Israel," he said.

It was only as an adult that Shaul was able to find the courage to tell this story. "I did live on a kibbutz in the 1970s with an unstable mother. All her life she said, 'one day the whole world will hear my story.' When I grew up and became a filmmaker, I wanted to deliver this dream to reality."

The other Israeli films shown at MIFF also portray the complexity and power of human perseverance. Someone to Run With, directed by Oded Davidoff, follows the suspenseful and heartfelt story of two teenagers – one just trying to find the owner of a lost dog and the other desperately in search of a runaway brother – amid the underbelly of Jerusalem's junkies and homeless.

The Cemetery Club is a poignant, at times hilarious, documentary about two Holocaust survivors and members of a social club of elderly Polish-born Jerusalemites who meet every Sabbath at the Mount Herzl National Cemetery. At the MIFF's screening, director Tali Shemesh said that five years of filming not only brought her very close to her grandmother and great aunt, who have the film's lead roles, it also turned them into recognizable celebrities. "They now get invited to so many film festivals," she said with a laugh.

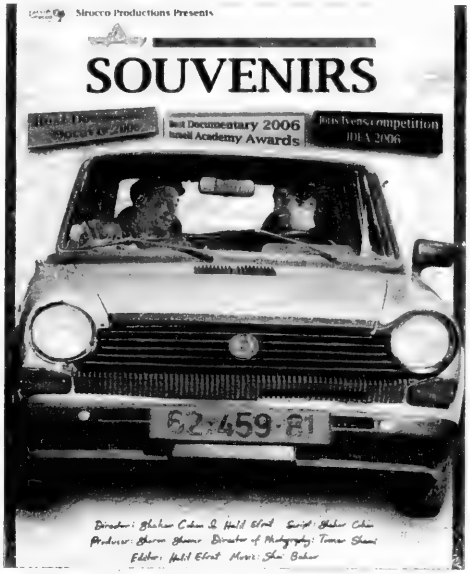
Souvenirs a road movie about a sentimental journey

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Souvenirs is charming as well as poignant.

This Israeli road movie, by Shahar Cohen and Halil Efat, is scheduled to be screened at the Bloor Cinema on Wednesday, April 4, at 6:30 p.m. and 9:15 p.m.

It is set in Israel, Italy, Germany and Holland against the backdrop of World War II. The protagonists, Cohen and his 82-year-old father, Sleiman, a Jew of Yemenite origin, embark on something of a sentimental journey to resolve a delicate issue left over from the Allied liberation of Holland.

Sleiman was a soldier in the Jewish Brigade, which was formed by the British in Palestine to fight the Nazis. In September 1944, the brigade was finally dispatched to the front lines in Europe.

When the war ended, Sleiman found himself in Holland, where he befriended several Dutch women with whom he was romantically entangled.

Although he does not admit it, Sleiman coyly suggests that he may have left behind "souvenirs" – offsprings from his affairs in Holland.

The notion that his father could have sired illegitimate children largely prompted Cohen to make this 75-minute film. While he was certainly interested in his father's exploits as a soldier, he was irresistibly drawn to his off-duty liaisons with compliant Dutch women.

It seems that they were particularly attracted to dark-skinned men like Sleiman, who, besides being handsome as a young man, was also a charmer.

As father and son retrace the Jewish Brigade's march through Europe, they pass through scenic countryside and a cemetery where the remains of 30 Jewish soldiers killed in action rest in peace.

When they reach Holland, Cohen places an ad and a photo of Sleiman in a local newspaper, hoping that one of his former lovers will respond.

Cohen discovers that one of Sleiman's paramours has long been dead. But Marie, his other romantic partner, now a grandmother, replies to the ad and agrees to meet him.

The reunion, which takes place in a small town, is replete with hugs and tears and words of mutual recognition and affection.

But did Sleiman impregnate Marie? That's the $64,000 question.

Souvenirs, the winner of two awards, deals with these issues straightforwardly and humorously, much to a viewer's satisfaction.

Rohr literary prize symbolizes new stature of Jewish culture

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — It's been a very good year for Tamar Yellin.

Last fall, the British writer and teacher won Hadassah Magazine's Ribalow Prize for her 2005 novel The Genizah at the House of Shepher, and the Reform Judaism Prize for Jewish Literature for Kafka in Bronteland, her 2006 short story collection.

Last week, Genizah bagged yet another honour when it won the first Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature, an award for outstanding work by an emerging writer that carries a whopping $100,000 purse.

"I'm thrilled and feeling slightly dizzy," said Yellin, reached at her home on the Yorkshire moors in the north of England.

That's understandable. The Rohr Prize is the largest in the Jewish literary world, and one of the largest literary awards of any kind.

The prize was established last April by Rohr's children to honor the philanthropist's 80th birthday. It will be given in alternating years to new works of fiction and non-fiction on themes of Jewish interest, and is meant to recognize the "unique role" of writers in transmitting Jewish values.

The prize has practical implications. "I see it as a subsidy for future writing," Rohr explained by e-mail. "Very often great talent is lost because of the press of the day-to-day need to earn a basic living. The prize should alleviate this pressure, giving the winning writer the necessary 'oxygen' and peace of mind to progress in his or her writing."

The Genizah at the House of Shepher tells of an English Jewish woman's search for a Hebrew text buried in her family's home in Jerusalem, and is interwoven with the story of her great-grandfather's 19th-century emigration from England to Jerusalem and her father's return to England a century later.

Philip Roth's darkest book

Everyman* by Philip Roth, Houghton Mifflin.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Cemeteries appear routinely in Philip Roth's fiction. In the 1995 novel, Sabbath's Theatre, two bereaved competitors make fools of themselves over the grave of their now-dead lover.

Norman Ravvin

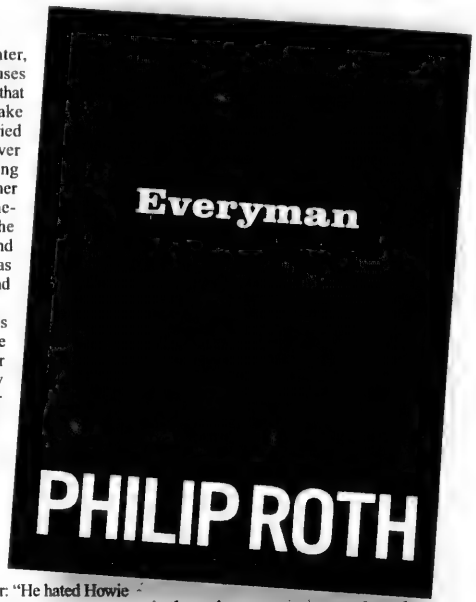
In The Anatomy Lesson, Roth's 1983 conclusion to his Zuckerman Trilogy, a ruined cemetery represents both urban blight and the abandonment of big city Jewish immigrant neighbourhoods. The cemetery introduced at the end of The Anatomy Lesson is something out of darkest Dickens, with a touch of the humour familiar to fans of Charles Addams' cartoons: "Beyond the black fence of iron palings, the gravestones began, miles and miles of treeless cemetery, ending at the far horizon in a large boxlike structure that was probably nothing but a factory, but that smoking foully away through the gray of the storm looked like something far worse."

In Everyman, Roth's most recent novel, cemeteries are among its key settings. The novel opens and ends in them, painting the darkest fictional portrait the author has yet presented.

Everyman begins in the midst of a funeral, where the man being buried turns out to be the novel's main character. The setting is not unlike the depressing landscape in The Anatomy Lesson. The "gates are rusted, the locks are gone, there's been vandalism." We learn, as the dead man's daughter informs the mourners, that her father's great-grandfather was among the burial ground's founders in 1888.

Though it's now an unpleasant and forgotten place, noisy with the "din of the New Jersey Turnpike," she explains the tribal logic behind the decision to bury her father among forebears.

Moving from the funeral to a deft set of detailed flashbacks, we are introduced to the dead man's parents and his devoted older brother; we learn the details of his three defunct marriages, the extent of his sons' disdain for him, and the quality of his one sustained relationship with the daughter who speaks at his funeral. Roth is a remarkable portraitist of family intimacies and resentments, conveying more about these things in a sentence or two than other writers do in a handful of pages.

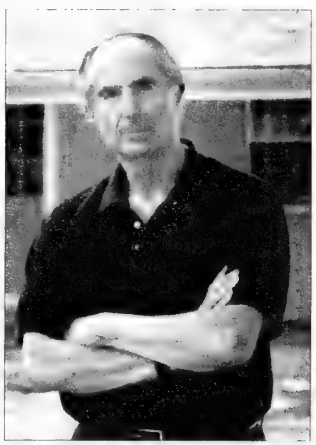


Of the beloved daughter, Roth's main character muses that sometimes "it seemed that everything was a mistake except Nancy. So he worried about her, and he still never passed a woman's clothing shop without thinking of her and going in to find something she'd like, and he thought, I'm very lucky, and he thought, Some good has to come out somewhere, and it has in her."

Roth's character evokes the same pathos in response to his mother on her deathbed: "What he saw was the high-relief contour of an elderly woman asleep. What he saw was a stone, the heavy, sepulchral, stonelike weight that says, Death is just death – it's nothing more."

And there is equal power in his admittance of what has spoiled his relationship with his brother: "He hated Howie because of his robust good health… because he'd never in his life been a patient in a hospital, because disease was unknown to him."

The character at the centre of Everyman is haunted not only by the mistakes of his past, the death of his parents, and alienation from those he was once close to. Medical indignities fell him one after another. In the seven years before his funeral – in his middle and late 60s – not one year passes without some major new bout of surgery. These trials transform his confident, life-affirming character and provoke an obsession with mortality. It is this predicament that is the source of the novel's title, which Roth links to the morality plays of 15th century England. Performed in cemeteries, the best known among these was called Everyman. In it, the main character receives a messenger who identifies himself as Death. Everyman's response, Roth has said in interviews, is the "first great line in English drama: 'Oh, Death, though comest when I had thee least in mind.'"



Philip Roth

It is just this sort of naiveté, and what seems at first to be an insouciant lightheartedness, with which Roth's character responds to his first losses. But as the calamities unfold the fictional tableau darkens.

Though Roth makes only tenuous connections between his character's trials and the broader culture, there is an offhand reflection in the early cemetery scene, where the many dead from a 1918 influenza epidemic lead the narrator to conclude: "1918: only one of the terrible years among the plethora of corpse-strewn anni horribiles that will blacken the memory of the 20th century forever."

Everyman ends with one of Roth's bravura set pieces – an encounter with a gravedigger in the New Jersey cemetery founded by immigrant Jews, who speaks with unsentimental practicality about what he does for a living. We meet this figure in the midst of his work, "standing about two feet down in the unfinished grave."

With humour and great pathos, implicitly conjuring Hamlet and Yorick's skull, but eschewing philosophy for plain talk, Roth closes his disquisition on how we live with the dead and the realness of our own death. "You couldn't have made things more concrete," Roth's Everyman tells the gravedigger. "It's a good education." And this is how we ourselves feel upon reading the last pages of Roth's novel.

Norman Ravvin's books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and the novel Lola By Night, which is due out in Serbian translation at the end of this year. He chairs the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

"Compelling...richly drawn...
Holding My Breath is a deft debut."

Israel's voice heard in Iran

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Israeli President Moshe Katsav wanted to address the people of Iran directly, he needed only travel to downtown Jerusalem to do so.

There in a radio studio of the Voice of Israel's (VOI) Farsi language section, he was able to call for rapprochement between the two countries and then answer phone calls from listeners in the Islamic state.

Katsav no doubt knew the VOI's Farsi broadcasts have broad appeal, with an estimated two million to six million listeners around the world at any one time.

The broadcast to Katsav's northern Iran hometown of Yazd was "a very emotional program," said Menashe Amir, the Tehran-born director of the VOI's Farsi section.

In answering telephone calls from Iranians (directed through a third country), he was asked how Iranian he had remained while living in Israel. "He said he liked Iranian culture, music, food and that he'd like to see again [the city] where he was born," Amir recounted.

He also delivered a message "that Israelis like Iranians, consider them friends and that we have had fruitful and good relations before the [1979] revolution and we hope for the day when those relations can resume."

Katsav's message of goodwill came in the midst of heightening tensions between the two countries, spurred on the Iranian regime's repeated denunciations of Israel, the denial of the Holocaust, the threat of obliterating the Jewish state and the pursuit of a nuclear weapons program.

Despite the stepped up rhetoric demonizing Israel by such Iranian leaders as President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the VOI has proven to be a remarkably popular media outlet in the Iranian republic, as well as among Iranians in the Diaspora.

It is, Amir claimed, "the most popular Iranian broadcaster all over the world."

Menashe Amir

The reason, he said, is simple. "We are known for our credibility and good programs, so Iranians are interested in our news."

Broadcasting 90 minutes a day on shortwave, VOI Farsi provides its listeners "full coverage of Iranian events" that the state-controlled media in Iran will not cover.

The broadcaster relies on information from people in Iran and out, including journalists, exiles, writers, poets – even politicians. "We have one million contributors," Amir quipped. "We have good sources of information. They are very reliable and very credible."

VOI is an independent entity that relies on funds from advertising and license fees from Israeli owners of radios and televisions.

Remarkably, the government of Iran has not tried to prevent the VOI broadcasts. "They consider us a [safety] valve for Iranians," he said.

Based on his global sources, Amir believes "at least 60 per cent of Iranians are very much dissatisfied with their regime and would like it toppled. But because of the lack of leadership and the suppressive nature of the regime they won't go on the streets."

Nevertheless, he continued, there are signs of dissatisfaction and of a willingness to confront the regime. Students conducted public protests at Amirkabir University of Technology in Tehran last month. More recently teachers protested publicly in Tehran and there have been reports of oil workers going on strike.

Inflation is high and teachers earn less than $200 (US) a month, which does not even cover rent. Poverty in Iran is expanding, unemployment is high, prostitution and addiction are growing. The country is beset by political corruption and the regime is impotent to solve its chronic economic problems.

Ahmadinejad, meanwhile, promised to use the country's oil wealth to bring economic benefits through social welfare projects. But people are actually rationing oil, he said.

"There is a big dissatisfaction."

Even Iranian parliamentarians are becoming unhappy with Ahmadinejad. Fifty of 290 representatives recently signed a petition criticizing his presidency.

These are important indicators of a shift in Iranian politics, Amir contended, since "whoever dares to open their mouth can be sent to jail."

Iranians believe the regime is weakening, that "it's not the same powerful and ruthless regime as before."

Opponents of the regime "feel Iran is under international pressure and that gives them support and increases their protests," he said.

"Most Iranians are fed up with shouting 'death to Israel' and 'death to the U.S.A.' For them, the important thing is their own good life and they are very dissatisfied their oil money is going to the Palestinians, Hezbollah and terrorist organizations.

"They want peace, good life and good relations with the international community. I believe most Iranians are against the assertive, hostile position of the Iranian regime against Israel and the Western countries."

As for the country's nuclear program, "until last year, most Iranians were in support of Iran getting a nuclear bomb, because Iran is a rich country, is [alone] in the region, without alliances and friends, [had] tasted invasion by Saddam Hussein and a war of eight years.

"So, many Iranians believe their country needs a deterrence weapon like a nuclear bomb to defend them. I have the feeling that in the last years, something has changed profoundly in Iranian opinion and they see that Iran's rulers do not want the bomb for Iran's security but for waging adventurous war against other countries."

However, should Iran be attacked Amir believes the people will rally around the government, though he acknowledged other observers disagree.

He said the regime could fall if sufficient pressure is brought to bear. He suggested a multifaceted program that included financial sanctions, encouraging minorities to oppose the regime, urging Iranians to demand their rights and by calling on the three million expatriate Iranians to advocate democracy in their homeland.

"I'm not a prophet, but if they go according to this plan, it will be a very good possibility of solving the problem without shooting even one bullet," he said.

Amir was in Toronto as a guest of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Jewish life continues

When 67-year-old Menashe Amir was a youngster, Iran was still in the grips of the Shah. The Islamic revolution was a far way off and the country's Jews could look back with some satisfaction on an uninterrupted 2,500-year history in the Persian state.

Amir was born in Tehran but his father hailed from Shushan Habirah, the biblical name for the modern city of Hamedan. An Iranian patriot who served in the country's military, his father turned down Menashe's offer to join him in Israel where he had gone to study in 1960.

Amir's educational sojourn turned into a full fledged migration. Soon after his arrival he was offered a position with the Voice of Israel (VOI) to broadcast in Farsi back to his homeland. Over the next 27 years, he juggled a number of additional careers, including consultant, lecturer and adviser on Iranian affairs, working for the Israeli and international media.

His efforts to persuade his family to join him in Israel bore fruit only in 1979, after the Shah was deposed. His family, including his father, left Iran for good, with his parents, one brother and two sisters settling in Israel and another two brothers and two sisters moving to California.

Once the Iran-Iraq war began in 1980, it became very difficult to leave the country, though many Jews and others were smuggled out through Turkey or Pakistan, Amir said.

In 1979, the Jewish population stood at approximately 80,000 with most living in Tehran, Shiraz and Isfahan.

Today, Jewish population estimates range from 17,000 to 25,000.

"Superficially, everything is fine," Amir said of Iran's Jewish community. "They have security. They have their businesses. They make a good living. Alcohol is forbidden for Muslim society, but permitted for Jews (for kiddush) and two Jewish schools are left. Every Jew can leave Iran anytime they want.

"But all these are superficial. In fact, the life for Jews in Iran is threatened. There is a great anti-Semitic propaganda, even on Iranian official TV and radio."

The Jewish schools are run by Muslim principals and most of the teachers are Muslims. Torah studies are conducted in Farsi, not Hebrew, even by Jewish teachers.

His review of school texts suggests their treatment of Judaism "is very superficial. There is data and numbers, but nothing of the essence of Judaism."

What's more, "Jewish schools must be open on Shabbat by government order."

Kosher food is available and Jews are free to attend synagogue.

"Jews want to keep close together and support and be supported by [each other]. The synagogue is a place of meeting, social gathering. It's a kind of social club.

"There are more kosher restaurants in Tehran than there was before the revolution," he added.

Israel is home to many prominent Iranian exiles, including the current president, Moshe Katsav. Other figures of Iranian origin include Shaul Mofaz, the Minister of Transport but also a former Defence Minister and Chief of Staff; Dan Halutz, recently resigned as Chief of Staff; Bahar Soomekh, a Tehran-born actress who played Dorri, the shopkeeper's daughter in the film, Crash; Sacha Baron Cohen (Borat, Ali G), whose Israeli mother is of Perisan descent; and the Ghermezian brothers, Canadian real estate moguls.

Home runs and matzah: baseball, Passover share openers

By MARTIN ABRAMOWITZ
JTA

BOSTON — This certainly won't be the first time that the opening day of the baseball season coincides with the first Passover seder, but the confluence seems particularly appropriate this year.

Why is this spring training different from all other spring trainings?

It turns out that this winter saw the greatest exodus of Jewish major leaguers, or JMLs, in the history of the sport. Six of last year's record-tying 13 JMLs will begin the 2007 season with new franchises, and three are among the top 10 Jewish players in career rankings.

After fading as a starter for St. Louis in the second half of last season – and being left off the post-season roster that eventually took the Cardinals to a World Series championship – Jason Marquis took advantage of his free agent status to sign a three-year, $21 million (all figures US) contract with the Chicago Cubs.

If Marquis wins as few as four games this year, it will send him past Barry Latman into seventh place on the all-time victory list for Jewish pitchers, with 60.

If Marquis has three decent years as a starter with the Cubs, he could become just the fifth Jewish pitcher with 100 victories and he'd still be only 32 years old. The other four 100-game winners, in descending order of victories, are Ken Holtzman, Sandy Koufax, Steve Stone and Dave Roberts.

Mike Lieberthal, a catcher who had spent his 13-year career with the Philadelphia Phillies, signed a one-year, $1.15 million contract with the Los Angeles Dodgers to back up Russell Martin. Lieberthal's first hit and first homer, in 1994, both came in Los Angeles.

Kevin Youkilis

Apparently in the twilight of his career, Lieberthal is in fifth place among Jewish home-run hitters with 150, seventh in runs batted in with 609 and hits with 1,137.

Scott Schoeneweis struggled in the Toronto bullpen during the first half of 2006 and was traded to Cincinnati, where he went 2-0 with a 0.63 ERA and three saves in 16 appearances. The second-half success for the Reds apparently helped the lefty earn a three-year, $10.8 million contract with the New York Mets, the fifth franchise of his career.

Schoeneweis is particularly effective against left-handed hitters, whom he has held to a .231 average over his eight-year career. He has 466 career strikeouts, 10th overall in the history of Jewish players.

If he makes 41 relief appearances this year, Schoeneweis will pass Larry Sherry and Allan Levine to move into third place on the all-time appearance list for Jewish relievers.

(Editor's note: Although his mother is Jewish, Schoeneweis once told The CJN that he doesn't consider himself Jewish.)

Late-season call-up Jason Hirsch was traded from the Houston Astros, where he went 3-4 with a 6.04 earned run average, to the Colorado Rockies. The right-hander was the Texas League pitcher of the year in 2005 and the MLB.com triple-A starting pitcher of the year last season.

In pitching to catcher Brad Ausmus last year, Hirsch was part of the first Jewish battery since the days of Koufax and the Sherry brothers.

The Boston Red Sox will open with at least two fewer JMLs than their 2006 complement of four. Outfielder Adam Stern was the "player to be named later" in the deal with Baltimore for catcher Javy Lopez, and outfielder Gabe Kapler retired to begin a managing career at the helm of the Sox's single-A Greenville franchise in the South Atlantic League.

If Kapler works his way back to the major leagues as a coach and manager, he would be the first former JML to manage in the bigs since Andy Cohen stepped in as Phillies skipper for one game in 1960.

The seven JMLs who are returning to their 2006 teams are Mets outfielder Shawn Green; Ausmus, a Golden Glove catcher for the Astros; first baseman Kevin Youkilis and lefty pitcher Craig Breslow of the Red Sox; second baseman Ian Kinsler and right-hander Scott Feldman of the Texas Rangers; and lefty reliever John Grabow of the Pittsburgh Pirates.

Martin Abramowitz produces Jewish baseball cards and lectures on Jews in baseball as president of Jewish Major Leaguers, Inc., on the Web at www.jewishmajorleaguers.org.

The great Halifax exodus, circa 1992

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

Israel may be the home of the Jewish people, but Halifax is where I'm from.

I have wandered 15 years since leaving for university, and if history repeats itself, when my time away equals 40 years, perhaps I'll find harbour again in the East Coast land of pubs and lox whence I came.

With 10 days until the first seder, I've just received my 88th nudge to come home this year for Passover. I miss my family daily. We're really close – just decidedly far apart. With a sister in New York, me in Vancouver and the executive branch in Halifax, we all finally get along.

To "find oneself" is not entirely self-indulgent. Historically, the phenomenon is well-known. The Hebrews spent 40 years in the desert sand, and I know some people who've never left their parents' basements.

Every Passover, I'll tell the tale of Father, reclined in his armchair. Looking across his living room kingdom, at all that he had built, he said – "My kingdom is greater than my father's, and his father's before that."

And the child who cleans that kingdom replied, "Let my people go – away to university."

The Father got angry and said, "Who will set the table? Who will change the batteries in the remote control – the tiny batteries, the ones that aren't quite AAs."

And in the years of high school, the work grew harder, the brain more taxed and the chores heavier. Lifting. Painting. Washing the car. And the children were made to toil – and their parents set before them tasks.

And the children asked again to go away to university. And the parents got angry. "Who will shovel snow? Do laundry?"

And the taskmasters made the children's workload double, with choir in the mornings and athletics after school. And still the Pharaoh's heart grew harder – "You will go to university – but you will go to Dalhousie across the street, where I went to school, where I met your mother. What's wrong with Dalhousie?"

He continued, "Why leave? To wander Canada for a time? It's way bigger than the desert. You'll be gone far longer than 40 years."

The parents did not understand – and so the children asked God to make them understand. And God heard their pleas, sending 10 plagues onto the parents (feel free to dip your baby finger in Pepsi as you read them out loud):

- Rap music.
- Porn magazines.
- Gameboy (specifically the looping Tetris theme).
- Early morning rehearsals.
- Late night rehearsals.
- Various house smells.
- The birds and the bees.
- Report cards with only four As.
- South Park.

And when the parents' hearts had grown stone-like, the final plague came down, and it brought fear:

- The first-born son took a non-Jewish girlfriend to the prom.

And the parents realized that they had "protected" the child from finding Jewish friends in the world. And so they let their son go to Ontario, and then to British Columbia.

Rushing out, with barely the sense to pack food, the child took only some counter-top bananas – which is why we eat matzah on Passover, because in our right mind we would never eat that many bananas twice, and only matzah approximates the complex constipation that was experienced during the hastened exodus that year.

My word to the wanderers: most of the world will feel like a desert. And "finding yourself" is awesome, but relatively outdated. In truth, most of what you need to know can now be learned on the Internet.

So backpack once or twice and perhaps don't spend as much time away from your family. Your foremothers miss you – and their stone hearts and bones have likely been softened by menopause anyway.

CARAMEL MATZOH CRUNCH
A favourite!

4-6 matzoh boards
1 c Passover margarine
1 c brown sugar, packed firm
3/4 c chocolate chips or semi-sweet chocolate, coarsely chopped

Preheat oven to 375°F.
Line a cookie sheet COMPLETELY with foil, then parchment paper. *Important as mixture becomes sticky during baking. Line bottom of sheet evenly with matzoh boards, breaking extra pieces of matzoh, as required, to fit any spaces on the cookie sheet.
Combine margarine and brown sugar in large, heavy-bottomed saucepan. Stir continually over medium heat until mixture boils. Continue cooking/stirring 3 more min.; do not let brown. Remove from heat; pour immediately over matzos. Reduce oven heat to 350°F. Bake 15 min., checking every few minutes to ensure matzohs are not burning (if browning quickly, remove from oven, lower heat to 325°F, replace)
Remove from oven VERY CAREFULLY; sprinkle immediately with chopped chocolate or chips. Let stand 5 min. then spread melted chocolate over matzoh. Chill in refrigerator until set and break up into chunks.

Let my people go

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Pesach is on our doorstep.

The phrase that rings in our minds is "Let my people go" – the instruction that Moses gave Pharaoh to release the Jewish people.

Let my people go. This slogan is not only found in the Torah. It was also adopted by the Soviet Jewry movement in the 1960s and '70s. It was the political demand of the Jewish world to the Communist leadership to throw open the doors of Russia to allow our people to emigrate to Israel.

These were indeed exciting times. Having been born in 1960, I witnessed many rallies on behalf of Soviet Jewry. One such gathering was held at the Inn on the Park in 1971, where Premier Alexei Kosygin (a Russian leader at the time) was attending meetings. The rally was attended by members of the Jewish community, as well as Ukrainians and other nationals who were demanding freedom for their own people.

I was 11 years old and remember looking up and feeling an overwhelming sense of awe at the oceans of people huddled together, singing, chanting and holding placards that read, "Russia is not healthy for all living things" and "Let my people go."

I also have traumatic memories of that rally, because things got out of hand and various groups became agitated and began hurling stones and debris at the RCMP on horseback. The officers stormed the crowd. I was terrified as I looked up and saw a gigantic police horse about to trample me. To this day, I can feel the fear that I felt at that moment. This may have been my first payment of dues as a Jewish activist.

I am also fortunate to have been part of another "Let my people go" moment in history. Two decades later, Soviet Jews were indeed allowed to leave Russia.

I began my career with the United Jewish Appeal in 1990, around the same time that numerous rescue missions were launched to bring Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) to Israel.

I recall our team sitting around an office table listening to daily reports on airlifts of Jews from places such as Azerbaijan, and soon afterward Odessa, and later dozens of other communities.

Those times played out like the Exodus story – adventurous but dangerous, and plagued with uncertainty, yet driven by bravery and the Jewish commitment to save Jews wherever they are prevented from being free.

Let my people go.

Soon afterward, the situation in the FSU became more relaxed and rescues became less frequent. Then, war broke out in the Balkans. Once again the Jewish world was called upon to liberate another Jewish community – this time, the Jews of Sarajevo.

Once again, the drama of our history resurfaced. Buses emblazoned with the logo of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee carried out hundreds of Jews and non-Jews from the capital of the former Yugoslavia as bombs went off in its main marketplace.

Guts. Valour. Jewish determination.

Let my people go.

According to Rabbi Joseph Telushkin in his book Biblical Literacy, "Let my people go" is found in the Hebrew word veye'av-duni, meaning "they may worship me." Rabbi Telushkin writes that Moses' goal was not only to win freedom for the Jewish people, but also to give them the ability to "worship God." He writes: "Freedom is not in and of itself a good. How one conducts oneself once one obtains it determines whether or not freedom is really worthwhile."

In essence, being Jewish means to have been rescued at some point in history. Our challenge now, as Rabbi Telushkin says, is to be free in the correct way.

At Pesach time, one way to achieve this is by remembering those who still need to be set free from their chains.

Let my people go.

Yell it loudly for all to hear.

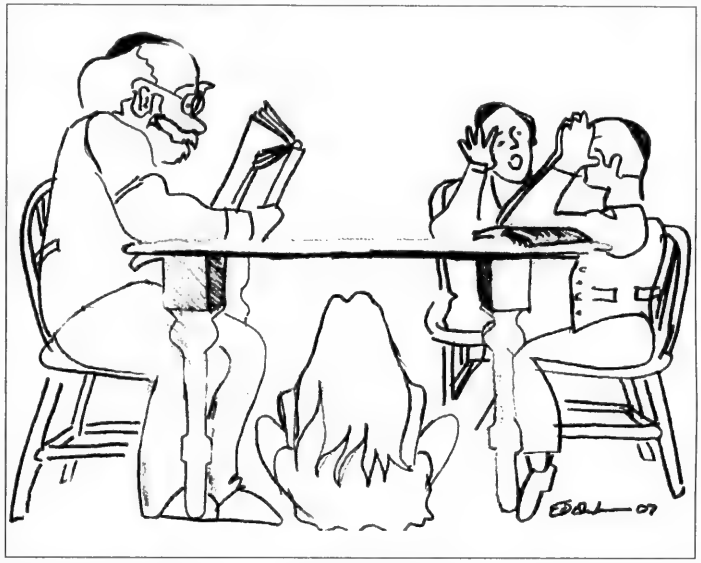
By CHANNAH MAGORI

When my mother was still small enough to fold herself up like an envelope, she would crawl under the table and wait for the letters to drop in. There, settled in a spot between her father's bent knees and three pairs of her brothers' shoes, she would collect the mail: the chapter and verse, the oral words and the written words, the text of the Holy Torah.

How much she understood, I don't know, but in the inwardness of her soul, she could perceive the whispers of God's Divine speech – a map and ladder to the highest worlds, where she alone could see the sounds and be the words.

They flew in flocks, storks with precious baggage, delivered from mouth-to- ear, from once-upon-a-time, and for one-day-when. Tiny letters wrapped in organza and taffeta, love letters tied-up-tight in little girl ribbons – my mother played mailman with God's Holy Torah.

She would wind these letters, one by one, round and round her make-believe curling iron. She would watch them grow big and fat. Every night, she would lock her letters away – for safe keeping, for protection. During the day, in her make-believe world, she built a cupboard for her treasure – strong and safe, warm and wise, polished and pure. So fine was her cupboard, so eloquent, so deep and endless its inner space, that she named it Aron – for her father. For what other name could be like his? Inscribed and sealed in the heart of her mind.



From one era to the next, from one Aron to the next, she would safeguard the sounds.

"Aron," she said, "I love you. I love inside of you. And I love you forever."

Too soon, the table was burnt for fuel; her brothers' shoes were running from spit-and-polished Nazi leather. Her father's knees lay stiff, unbent and buried. The storks – formations battered, baggage scattered. And she, little girl, lost her address under the table.

She was moved to the ghetto. Concentrations of cruelty. Her neck stiff with the stubbornness of survival, she stretched out the hand of her mind and locked the cupboard door. Turn, turn the locks this way and that way, in every possible permutation, in every possible incarnation, for safe keeping, for protection. Never wondering how the cupboard might be opened again. For again was a time that would never be hers to have. As the last action and the liquidation of the Lodz ghetto began, her soul, too, began rolling back over time, seeking out ancient and archaic locks for fortification.

When the SS officer ripped her mother from her arms, herded her, stuffed her, locked her into the transport car for Auschwitz, she – her daughter – climbed the car and begged the Nazi to release her. He laughed, threw her down, laughed again and bolted the stalls, guarding his cattle from animal rustlers.

For every Jew whose flesh was branded with the hot iron of Nazi Germany, she would hang another lock on the cupboard door. And when she, too, took up residence in Auschwitz, the nimble fingers of her mind took up the fine art of spinning flax and weaving linen.

Her outside hands would spend the days in forced labour while her inside hands created shrouds for the vapours of incinerated Jews. She taught herself the art of wrapping the bodiless dead: twisting the cloth into impossible knots – never to be undone until the resurrection. She encapsulated the dead into these linen knots, hanging them over her cupboard. Her magical cupboard could expand space within space, creating inner dimensions with room enough for more. After six million, she began looking for others. Little girl, but 20 now, she became a one-woman burial society. Searching the past, unravelling strands of time. Ingathering the exiled dead.

They were the unfound drowned, shattered bones, raked flesh, stretched necks, decapitations and crucifixions, staked, impaled, hanged, disemboweled, burnt alive, drawn and quartered, perforated, penetrated and gassed. But these were only the deaths caused from the outside-in. How many died from the inside-out, and by what means, was impossible to know because the torment of the mind was specifically designed for each and every soul. For the ultimate art of human torture, she would weave the final shroud, to grace her cupboard. And for the babies, and all the unborn children whose parents' death cut them off from entering the land of the living, she spun hymns on tiny spindles and wove psalms on little looms, wrapping their souls in lullabies. These, too, she hung from the cupboard as the crowning piece – for they alone could tinkle.

Fifty-four years of fallen dust. Layers grow thick over the cupboard, like facial powder covering the abrasions and the aberrations of life. And beneath, five more years of holocaust ruins. An archeology of pain. A sorrow of pieces to dig through and sort out and tag and remember.

This layer, over time, has settled so densely that the keyholes have been filled and forgotten. She remembers the cupboard, sometimes. She remembers her Aron. Her mind, once clear and focused, shifts back and forth, back and forth, through debris. And although time moves on, taking her unwillingly, her mind sinks into shafts, unable to gain future without her cupboard. Her doctors called this Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder. But, I know that she still searches for what was lost.

I know she still searches for what was lost

She named her son Aron, after her father. He was the unbroken echo of her father's voice. A miracle of sound born after silence. Hearing him, she was compelled to pass on the long lost letters. Blindly single-minded, she spent the years of his childhood, his adolescence, and his adulthood, burrowing furiously – her tunnels forever collapsing.

Her treasure, unmarked and unmourned for, has eluded her aged eyes – lost under the sands and the storm winds of her plaintive sighs. And so she prayed every night and every day for her young Aron to become an archeologist, an adventurer, a bibliophile. He would pick up the spade, the pan and brush, the pointer and parchment. He would search the rust and ruins for the artifacts of her memories. He would be the one to unearth the lost ark, open the locks, slip the knots, release the souls-in-waiting, unroll the scroll and say the words. He would find her cupboard. Her father. His grandfather. He would say the words. But yet, he never has.

She has lived 79 years now – their weight packs the loose earth, waiting, weary and mute. Lying motionless now, with a broken arm and a broken heart, her plans so powerless and her thoughts so thwarted, she says the Silent Prayer.

And the Silent Prayer echoes back in resound, in the wave of perfect pitch. This silent sound, this tremor, cracks the boulders, bites the rocks, creating chasms and waterways for the collective of tears. And this water – down, down, down – leaves the bitter salt in the earth behind and washes away the aching dust.

And she hears the tinkling of the bells, and the breaking of starched linen, and the rustling of taffeta and organza, and the slipping of the knot, and the creaking of old parchment, and the words, and the words, and the words, and the words, and the words…

May His great Name be blessed forever and ever.

For my mother, Sarah Sala (nee Zylberberg) Landgarten, of blessed memory.

An angel at our table

By NADJA ZAJDMAN

Aunt Felicia was a sour woman. The only person she showed affection for was my little brother Mikey. It unnerved him. "What's wrong with me? She likes me! She doesn't like anybody but she likes me! What's wrong with me?"

I suspect it went against my aunt's principles to demonstrate her true feelings for her own little brother. As a boy, my dad had been a prankster. As a man, he had donned the cap of the court jester. Yet each Passover, it was my father who led the seder service, even though it was held in his brother-in-law's house.

Raised to become a rabbi, Dad had turned to socialist rebellion. He could recite the Haggadah backwards, forwards, with full expression, and at any speed he chose. One year, Aunt Felicia informed my male cousins that they could be excused from the table to watch the hockey playoffs if the service ended before the game did. Hockey playoff games go on forever – but the seder service goes on longer. Auntie's mistake was to make this promise within earshot of my father.

At first, the shift in rhythm was imperceptible. Dad began chanting more quickly than usual, and the uncles dutifully picked up the pace. Incrementally, his chanting grew faster and louder and faster still, until he was hurtling through the Haggadah at the tongue-twisting pace of a Danny Kaye patter song. Daddy kept his head down, his face straight, and his eyes fixed firmly on the Hebrew text before him. The uncles were forced to follow as best they could. Aunt Felicia fumed in helpless fury. The boys beamed. Before the evening ended, they got to see the last part of the hockey game.

It is the role of the youngest child to open the door for Elijah – prophet, angel and protector of children – so that he can enter the household and drink from the goblet of wine that has been prepared for him. By rights, that task should have been performed by my little brother, but when the moment came for the participants to dip their pinkies into their wineglasses 10 times to symbolize the 10 plagues that befell Egypt – and it comes before the entrance of the angel – my little brother would cuddle up to our mother and merrily dip his pinkie into her wineglass along with her. Whereas my mother would then wipe the residue onto a napkin, like the rest of the grown-ups, Mikey would remove the wine from his finger by licking it off. Ten drops of wine would knock him out, and he'd spend the rest of a very long evening curled up on my mother's lap, his pudgy palms clasped as if in prayer and pressed against a cheek, his yarmulke askew on his flaxen crew cut, a beatific smile on his cherubic face. Thus, the role of gatekeeper fell to me.

"You mean to tell me that he comes to our house and to everybody else's house all at the same time?" I would query, when instructed to stand watch.

"Well he's an angel, he can do that. Except in Israel. In Israel he gets there seven hours later, because of the time change."

As my aunts and uncles and older cousins remained at the long dining table continuing the recitation, I was told when to open the door, I was informed when Elijah had finished his drink, and then I was directed to close the front door to my aunt's duplex because Elijah had just made his exit.

"But I can't see the angel!"

"Look harder," urged my father.

I squinted my eyes. "I still can't see the angel!"

Daddy smiled his warm, gentle smile. "Shepsaleh, you have to look with different eyes."

My big cousins snickered. The entire tribe insisted they could see Elijah clearly. It occurred to me that if I joined my relatives at the table, I'd be able to see the angel too.

"Why can't I just come back to the table and watch the angel drink the wine? Why can't he let himself out?"

"It's not polite to let a guest leave alone. With an angel, you have to be a gentleman."

I had no answer. Yet.

By the time I was eight, I was fed up with this game. "I don't care if I'm a gentleman or not! After I open the door, I'm coming back to the table! I want to see him drink!" I was adamant.

> Dad could recite the Haggadah backwards, forwards at any speed he chose

Daddy quickly improvised. "OK, You can come to the table and you will see the angel drink." (Mikey still couldn't hold his wine.)

When cued, I opened the door for Elijah, as I did every year. I marched back to my aunt's dining room table. Maybe I walked behind Elijah, maybe alongside him. If I bumped into the angel, I didn't notice.

I stood among the adults in front of my aunt's long dining room table, which held a large, ornate, silver drinking vessel filled to the brim with a deep burgundy-coloured wine. The moment of truth had arrived.

"OK," my father instructed, "watch. The angel's going to drink."

I held my breath. My father slipped his knee under the table and shook it. The silver vessel shimmered under the twinkling crystals of the chandelier. Within the confines of the oval-shaped cup, the dark liquid trembled.

I lowered my head and peered. "It didn't go down!" I scowled. "When you drink, there's suppose to be less in the glass! It didn't go down!"

My father's frustration was beginning to match my own. He pursed his lips and pointed to the goblet. "Watch again. The angel's going to drink again!"

This time, my father kneed the bottom of the table with such force that the wine spilled over the rim and onto the tablecloth – onto my aunt's snow-white tablecloth with the lace trim, which she used only on special occasions. Auntie stared in horror at the deep burgundy-hued stain.

I gazed at the goblet in wonder and awe. I gleefully clapped my hands, convinced, at long last. "What a sloppy angel!"

Daddy was satisfied. Auntie sat stewing over the ruin of her finest linen. She glowered at her youngest brother. Daddy met her smouldering glare and softly, sweetly, in accented English, he reminded her, "You can't get mad from an angel."

The last seder my father led was held in his own home. Our last seder was our last supper together. A week later, Daddy was felled by a massive coronary. My mother found him. He was wearing a smile. He had been getting ready to attend a hockey playoff game.

Poetry of the Jews

By Ken Kalman

HAIKUS OF THE JEWS

With joyous remembrance
He lifts the Torah
Giving thanks to God

The bar mitzvah stands alone
His nervous voice
Begins the brachot

Remembering the Temple's destruction
The young groom
Crushes the glass with his heel

I A Silent Prayer

The ghosts of you and me
Reside on the Wall
A young boy
Reads to us
From his prayer book

He was told
By his parents
Of the trucks and trains
That carried us away
To certain death

As young children they hid
In the walls of his church
This man of God
Who gave his sermons weekly
Knowing that they were safe
At dusk he brought them
Food and water
And blankets
To keep them warm
On cold winter nights

Now as the young boy reads
I say a silent prayer
For the man they call Jean Paul
A man I do not understand
But who granted him life

II A World Away

Sitting here so far away
I think of what you must be doing
Late afternoon here in Tel Aviv
Mid-morning in Montreal.

I sit and dream then let it go
I see soldiers arrest a troubled Muslim boy
You see a rabbi escort a young Jewess back to her parents
I see the sun setting on a pro-Palestinian peace rally
You see the sun rising on a pro-Israel student demonstration

I am exhausted from a swath of endless threats and sirens
You are refreshed watching our girls board the Hebrew Academy bus
I feel the cool breezes of evening,
For a moment I feel safe.
You feel the warm winds of morning,
You always feel safe.
I watch the news of a car bomb's devastation this morning
You are living this morning
I drink a relaxing cup of tea to calm me down
You drink a pick-me-up coffee to get you going
I am tired and weary of all this violence
You are energetic and ready for each new mission
And yet we are both here and there
What is a mile or two or a thousand or more
When we are both here together
You are in my heart this evening
I am in yours this morning.

HAIKUS OF THE JEWS

Listening to a sermon on goodness
I remember the young girl
Giving her watch to the bag lady

Listening to a sermon on duty
I think of my father
Attending minyan every morning

Listening to a sermon on violence
I remember my cousin
Gunned down in a market square

III Our Meadow

A bomb fell in our meadow today
We watched it from our front window
It just lay there exposed
A child wandered into our meadow
She just lay there laughing

A prophet once said
You see in everything
What you want to see
I see her frolicking
Every day in our meadow

They say if you can't find the pieces
Then they must still be part of the whole
Our meadow is awash in mud
The crater is a foot deep
Will the grass ever grow there again

Today my pain is so deep
That I take my rifle
And walk across our meadow
Up into the hills
And fire it into the air repeatedly

Is there no way for us
To ever find peace
In a meadow surrounded
By the pain and agony
Of two thousand years

Poetry of the Jews

HAIKUS OF THE JEWS

J(uden) Streets in Germany
Visible ghosts
Interspersed in every day life

On vacation in the Dominican Republic
I stand before
The first synagogue in the new world

Wedding music in his ears
An Israeli soldier stands on guard
At the entrance

IV The Good Boy

You must marry, Chaya
Before you are twenty
To an Orthodox boy
He will learn to love you
Give you children, lots of them

I want to find love, she said
How will I know
If he loves me
If I will more than simply care
Bringing his children into the world

He is a good boy, Chaya
His parents are good people
His brother married your cousin
You see how happy they are
With four little ones

But Ma, he is not his brother
He spends his nights
On the computer playing games
He is a good boy, Chaya
Using his logical mind

But Ma, I went out with him
As you suggested
He hardly said a word
Your father doesn't say much
But his advice is sound

Talk to him Chaya
He is a good boy
He will make you happy
But Ma, I don't just want to be happy
I want to be in love.

The girls at my school
They are waiting for Mr. Right
Why must I be chosen
For this nerdy guy
Who could never find a date

He is a good boy, Chaya
I'm sorry, Ma
I do not choose to marry him for your sake
I do not choose to listen anymore
My lawyer will speak with you

Within the month
Chaya went to court
To plead for her freedom
It was granted
And she moved out of her parents' house.

Her mother heard from her
It was a year later in a letter
She and the good boy
Had emigrated to Israel
To work on a kibbutz

HAIKUS OF THE JEWS

Listening to a sermon on human rights
I recall a young Filipino boy
Eating with his fork and spoon

Listening to a sermon on forgiveness
I remember my merciless words to you
For being unfaithful

Listening to a sermon on Jewish values
I remember my first marriage
To Ashrah, a Muslim.

V Not Jewish Enough

I cannot comprehend
Why you find me
Not Jewish enough for you
I was born a Jew
I am still one
Yet, no matter what I say
There is reluctance on your part
To accept me for who I am
A man who hates politics
And loves the human race

Each time we talk
I get the feeling
That you respect me less
And in so doing
We grow further apart

So here I sit
Sipping a coffee
Thinking of you
So far away
In Tel Aviv

I met you there
On my last visit
Saw you in a café
Went over to you
And quickly we became friends

I like to remember that time
It is a happy place in my mind
For now I sit here with this letter
Just a notice of sorts
Describing how you died.

VI To be a Jew

To be or not to be a Jew
That is the question
Should we remain
Or should we let the whole thing go
Is our time past or present

To be a Jew
You must be born
Of a Jewish mother

Or decide to convert
With the help of a rabbi

It is difficult to get in Easy to get out
Yet even so
Few denounce their Judaism
More actually join

Yet even when we count them all
We are but twelve or thirteen million
A mere pittance
When compared to Islam or Christianity,
Or the Eastern religions

We lost six million in the war
Who might have translated
To twenty-four million more
Not a big sum but a tragic loss
To all our people

It is hard being part
Of such a small minority
That as a holiday approaches
We are the only ones
Who know about it

And every day we must live
Constantly worrying
About our security
For the anti-Semitic rage
Is still strong in our world.

I suppose
We have only ourselves to blame
We let others best us, beat us down
Claim our inheritance
Crucify us

Is would be easier
Just to let it all go
Leave the flock
And live freely
Among the others

HAIKUS OF THE JEWS

Listening to a sermon on hunger
I see the sad faces
Of children in Darfur

Listening to a sermon on hate
I remember the swastikas
Painted on my schoolroom door

VII Extinction

I sit here trying to contemplate
A horrifying notion
The extinction of the Jewish people
A museum of sorts
Depicting who we were

Animals have become extinct
Many because of disease
Or some cosmic calamity
But none because all remnants
Were murdered by madmen

I try to imagine
How I might feel
Reading a history book today
Learning of a people
Who once walked this earth

That is what they want
A future rid Of God's Chosen People
Our ashes
A crucifix for their oppressive society

God, where are you now
During these trying hours
Did we lose favour with You
Did we do something wrong
To get You to ignore us

I try to pray
But in my heart there is no love
I cannot see
I am not whole
Yet long to be

And if I die
In nightly sleep
I pray the Lord
My soul to keep
And maybe then I will believe

VIII Sesame

I am a big yellow bird
On your TV screen
I show you how to strap bombs to my body
Enter a children's hospital
And blow myself up

I am the Cookie Monster
Who feeds cookies to the children
Each laced with poison
I laugh as each child
Curls up, and dies in agony

I am Oscar
I put bombs in my garbage can
I wait until lots of people are around
Then blow it up
Remotely

I am Kermit
Miss Piggy and I
Enter a classroom full of six-year-olds
We take out our toy guns
And shoot them all

I am Sesame on Palestinian TV
I am watched by millions of young ones
With impressionable minds
I teach them hate
They carry it to my enemy

My only fear
That some parent
May turn me off

IX Marching

We are marching today
To Jerusalem
Taking a path towards hope
Trying to ensure a more positive outlook
For all our peoples

As I hold your hand
We walk together
Contemplating
All who have walked before
These last twenty-five years

We walk for the youth
That they might drink
From the fountain
Of Israel's fort Against further annihilation

We walk for the middle aged
That they may go
And thrive
In Israel's abundant
Democracy

We walk for those who cannot walk
That they may stand up
For all Jews everywhere
And show the world
We truly want peace.

X The Arab Next Door

As Jews we often think
That we know
What others are thinking
What do we know
Of that Arab next door

They are part
Of our population
They vote as we do
They walk and talk and laugh
As we do

She is my neighbour
She is my friend
We work together
At the same firm
In adjoining offices

Some days
I take her kids to school
Some days she takes mine
We walk in the park
And talk together

She is happy
Her family is happy
Being citizens of our land
They wouldn't trade it
For a thousand Palestines

She brings her cousin Ashrah
To our company party
They eat and dance
And everyone enjoys Meeting her

Then as a speech is given
Honouring me for some selfless task
Ashrah walks into the crowd
Destroying the hopes and dreams of many
With her suicide bomb

XI A Longing

I too have a longing
A longing to return
To my life
As a Jew
In my own way

Yet as I imagine
Myself in shul
I see an aged man
Under a tallis
Davening

I am no longer
The young man
Who sang the Haftorah
At Rosh Hashanah
My wedding, the births of my children

It all stopped
When my father-in-law died
He was president of his shul
I was proud to be there
And sing out my Judaism

I haven't been
To services
For ages
Just deaths and births
Born of necessity

Yet now
I feel poised
To return
To re-Jew myself
But when

Let's celebrate our affinity

Happy Passover

Elul

By FRAIDA LIBA LEVINE

Inspired by Li Young Lee

he reads, a wise Asian poet, looking younger than his years,
but sounding older,
sounding holy, when he asks

did you pray today?

is he talking to me?
in this month of repentance and prayer is everyone answering silently, sheepishly?
or perhaps it is You, the voice that whispers

did you pray today?

I didn't open a holy book, yet, a prayer, like a poem begins.
his father asked him,
and my Father asks me too…

did you pray?

the question comes from within me, it's not the wind asking anymore, and the poet has gone on to talk about less sacred things.

Prayers at the Kotel

by Sharon Miller

They come from all over the world
To pray at the last remnant of the Temple of the King
The Star of David, proudly unfurled
The Lord's praises they will extol and sing
Solemnly, they insert their small notes
Asking for peace and good health
For twenty centuries, the world's scapegoats
Smuggled into a land, barren and devoid of wealth
Who are these people, two thousand years dispersed?
To gather once again, in their holy city
To return to Zion, they did thirst
Over two millennia, the host nations showed them no pity
The giant stones, as old as the hills
Have seen the land captured many times without a country, their blood did spill
Subjected to many unspeakable crimes
Oh, Jerusalem, city of gold
You have seen many, many, tragedies unfold
But now, they come again, to ask the Lord to give anew
A lasting peace, for every gentile and every Jew
Like the ancient stones, we have survived
The nation of Israel is still alive.

Passover Greetings

By DANIEL M. FINE

Two poems on visiting the former Vilna ghetto written in successive years, the second reflecting on and completing the first

Vilna '98

I stand alone at the silent convergence
Of the three great thoroughfares
Zydu (Jewish), Gaono (after the great teacher himself)
And Stikliu

Little more than cobblestone lanes
Lanes so narrow that when reaching
From the middle the walls on either side
Are almost touched

As the grey overcast rolls overhead
Threatening another assault
I imagine the voices of children playing
They sound alive – but there are none

I look for some identification with the past
There's nothing. Only a small plaque on a wall
Further down, near the end of Stikliu street
Life of the Quarter extinguished without a trace
Previously the centre of such a vibrant way of life

Yet the ancient walls and stones demand more
Amidst this omnipotent silence, this barrenness
My solitary presence is acknowledged
And I am told – Don't leave them behind
Alone once more

Where are the children, where are the sounds?

Anonymity – Vilna Revisited '99

They're paving over the sounds
As the sands of the millennium drain off
Drowning out the cries, the hopes –
Exteriors smoothed over with stuccos
And creamy coloured plasters

Decaying rough hewn edges boldly gripping
For posterity set aside by anonymous textures
Content to portray a present and future
Without the past

Only the cobblestones remain
Though subdued by the impact of all around
The walls calling to be touched seem farther apart
Suffocated by new forms and coats of fresh paint
– Anonymity –

Streets once empty filled with parked cars
Restaurants brimming, a boutique hotel
And antique shop whose wares
Bear no reference to what was Insane injustice profanely depicting a past Never resident here
– Anonymity –

No museum, no cultural site
No great stone synagogue razed after 400 years
In their place facing the hotel itself
The sad indignity of an Austrian Embassy
Arrogantly averting accountability for catastrophe
Inflicted by misfits who regarded people
In inane ways

The voices of children, the sounds, reside still Confined behind the new veneers
They'll work their way through again
For our words are their everlasting monuments
Sustained while all else comes and goes
But the infamy of those to blame

All the mothers dancing on the roof

By MARLEE PINSKER

The summer my husband Stuart left to find himself, finally, as an artist somewhere in the tropics, and the twins departed for university, I was left alone in an echoing house. I practically sat shivah for myself, unable to move past the living room couch. I couldn't stop crying. I, who had been surrounded by parents, brothers, sisters, husband, children and enough pets to fill a good-sized zoo, was alone for the first time in my life.

My only company was Goldie, the last living goldfish in the tank, who remembered, as I did, that a family had once whooped and yodelled through these rooms. The boys and their father had once tended a whole undersea cohort – the north wall of the front room had been renovated for a tank of colourful fish and tiny blue lobsters in a parallel universe. On the morning I found Goldie belly-up, I felt the last whoosh of air leaving the house, and I choked alone through the allergy season of late summer, floating in a sea of grief through Rosh Hashanah and the days leading up to Yom Kippur.

I went to the synagogue and nodded to my friends and stared at my prayer book and rose and sat many times, breathing a different, sharper air than everyone else. In my house the fish tank was beginning to smell, and I carried the smell with me. We rose and sat and swayed and sang with the holiday choir. Everyone else was breathing in the smell of renewal, the careful accounting of heshbon nefesh, weighing their souls and finding them fragrant, and I was inhaling decay. Somewhere my husband was delirious with island scenery and my children were attending Hillel. I forgot to cook and ate canned sardines and stared across at Goldie, my last company, delicately decomposing.

I remembered a wisp of a dream when I woke up the day after Yom Kippur. It came to me as dreams sometimes do, as a vision that wove in and out of my day. In some time and some place I had been looking up to the night stars through a hole in the roof. It was startling, as though I were now the one in the fish tank, and I was looking up, up towards the world of air. The dream made me stop weeping long enough to think about the next holiday, Sukkot.

From my former life as wife and mother I retained the family-sized house and the family-sized van, and the unfortunate family-sized fish tank. In the kitchen, family-sized boxes of Cheerios and Rice Krispies and Total the size of billboards dominated the cupboards. A huge refrigerator tended my tiny shelf of food like a giant cradling a just-hatched yellow chick. I walked into the garage to take out the family-sized sukkah kit, which I decided to put together with the help of God. Maybe that was a bit presumptuous, but within the first half hour my Serbian neighbour saw me struggling with the two by fours and came over to offer assistance. Together, we set up the framework.

The sukkah walls were crafted from white nylon, and the wooden beams across the top supported a roof of cut green branches, a gift from my front hedge that gets its yearly trimming just before the holiday. I had no little children to bring in their paper chains and pictures this year, and no zeal to go to the store to buy fresh fruits to hang up alone. I remembered the sukkah we used to make when the boys were little.

They fought each other for the chance to swarm up the ladder and hang up fruits and vegetables so thickly the roof seemed a field of produce and the sky could hardly be glimpsed beyond gleaming ruby apples and fat yellow pears. Putting it together had been an exercise in excitement and bravado, the children shouting with glee as they swung the rubber mallet to pound the sections together. The mallet made them feel like their father, who could reach the top of the sukkah without a ladder and put on the greenery without breaking a sweat. If Shalom of Safed had visited in those days, he would have painted a joyful scene with fruits and vegetables in graceful borders around a wheat-coloured hut, and plenty of twins with tiny violins on the surrounding hills.

My empty sukkah reminded me of my empty life, and I quickly set myself to work, scouting out my garden to find something to suspend from the ceiling. I couldn't face a trip to the supermarket for the produce. I was afraid I would confront my former self in the wide corridors, pushing a shopping cart with my young ones shouting encouragement at my sides. I had nothing to say to her, this Lily of the past. I didn't even want her to see me, grey as a ghost, gasping for breath.

We didn't have orchards or vineyards, but lavender and mint and rosemary were abundant, a gift from my former years as mother and gardener and cook and provider. I twisted their stems together with yarn and hung them from the roof of the sukkah. When I had hung many bundles of the herbs, I stood back and breathed in. Here was something different, a spice sukkah that I recognized from my dream. It glowed in muted lavenders and greens. I stood there alone in my spice sukkah and wondered about guests.

I was afraid that if I had invited my friends they might have capsized in a flood of my tears and washed away in a salt sea of misery. My first Sukkot alone in this world! I thought I would have to do with celestial guests, so I went to my kitchen and designed an elaborate ushpizin, an invitation to historic guests to come and sit with me.

The traditional ushpizin sets an order for our distinguished ancestors, all male, to come and visit. I started to write out their names, but threw out that copy right away. Did I really want Abraham and Moses and Aaron and King David? I pictured them lecturing to me about what I could have done to please my good husband. Cook better meals? Entertain his clients like a kitchen goddess? Squeeze into those skimpy negligees? Please. I imagined myself ushering the male sages out, one by one, to go off and visit other sukkot where intact families sat in readiness for their teachings. I put my head in my hands at my kitchen table and waited for the grey lead weight of despair to pass.

I sat like that for a long time, waiting. Finally, I stood and walked to the back of my house to the studio I had built into a corner of the mud room, sharing it with enough oversized shoes to outfit a platoon. I took out my acrylics and crafted an ushpizin for Sarah and Rivka and Rachel and Leah and Deborah and Miriam and left the last space blank for a mysterious finale. I didn't know who would be my final guest, but as so much of my life was so up in the air I couldn't bring myself to choose. Let it be a surprise, I thought. A little change might be just the thing to halt the downward plunge.

The night before Sukkot I went out and hung the ornate invitation, now covered with an acrylic fixative so it would be preserved through the rain. I had used a light purple to echo the lavender's tiny flowers, and grey and green like the roof to decorate the invitation, and I had written the names in gold. The whole thing was hardly visible at night, so I just imagined it hanging there, an invitation to another realm.

On the eve of Sukkot I went out to the sukkah with the red lantern flashlight that my parents had given me 57 years ago. I set it on the table with the round challah and wine. I lit candles right in the sukkah, which meant I would have to stay there until they burned down. I had brought two place settings, as though one of my invited celestial guests would surely appear. I lit the candles and said the Kiddush over the wine and turned around to see that my daft old neighbour, Mrs. Zucker, had entered my sukkah behind me. She let out a laugh like a donkey's bray, and I was startled by its volume, filling the flimsy room to the rafters.

Guests are a blessing, I told myself. After all, I had taken out two place settings. We poured water over our hands and recited the brachah (blessing), Al netilat yadayim. Mrs. Zucker settled herself down happily across from me and joined me in saying Hamotzi, and we tasted the challah, sweet with raisins and cinnamon. Then Mrs. Zucker looked around the sukkah.

"Apples aren't good enough for you?" she asked.

"This is a spice sukkah. I thought I'd try something different this year."

Mrs. Zucker rolled her eyes. "I didn't see your husband helping you."

"He's gone," I said.

She laughed like a car backfiring, and I wondered suddenly if sound could actually explode the sukkah. Then she sighed. "They come, they go… My Chaim left, too."

"What's the difference? You've got to keep on going just the same. I yell at my Chaim every night for abandoning me."

"I'm still at the crying stage, myself."

She laughed again, making me jump. She said, "I cried, too. What's for dinner?"

I passed the challah to her again. She took it, frowning,"That's it? That's all for dinner?"

I nodded.

"Oy! Such a thing! Your husband goes and you forget how to make a proper dinner. Did he take your pots and pans with him? I made a better dinner than that. I'll go get dinner."

So that is how the first night of Sukkot was spent in my sukkah. We ate noodle kugel, salad, salmon teriyaki and chocolate cake.

"You are a wonderful cook, Mrs. Zucker," I said.

"Oh," she replied, "just call me Sarah."

"Sarah?"

"That's my name."

"I just made an ushpizin inviting Sarah," I said. "Look!" The golden letters shone in the lantern's red glow.

"I don't usually make this much food, either," she said. "This afternoon I just started cooking. It's too silly, because tomorrow I'm going to my daughter's house."

"Maybe you are here to represent Sarah."

She shook her head, "You won't catch me nursing a baby when I'm a hundred."

We laughed at that, and sang the Birkat Hamazon together, our voices filling the sukkah, loud and discordant. Then I helped her take her platters back across the street.

I came back into the sukkah and thought about the visit while the candles dwindled down. If the biblical Sarah had come to me, she would have spoken like Sarah Zucker. After her lifetime of change and disruption and massive disappointment, she just kept on going, laughing whenever she could. We know that our mother, Sarah, had a laugh, for sure. Maybe, it sounded like my neighbour's, a sound like a shofar to startle me awake and start me laughing again.

When the candles burned down, I got up to walk back to my house. I was standing straighter in the night air and smiling like our mother, Sarah, as I reached my door.

Passover Greetings

Ode to Jonathan of Entebbe

By GEORGE BERNSTEIN

Jonathan, warrior of David's clan in haste, you left your Babylon in haste to reach your People's Land rising on wings of faith you shepherded your threatened kin into the silver eagle's craw and the devil's legions rose to crush your flame kindling anew
the fires of Zion to light the Ages in your new your ancient land

May it Be your Will

By BRANDON MARLON

We will be like dreamers
Our mouths filled with laughter
Our tongues with glad song

We will march forward with ease
Our feet will not falter in the night
Our step will not stumble by day

We will be catapulted onto spiritual summits
Our souls will not become spiritually stagnant
Our hearts will scale heights rising heavenward

Praiseworthy is the worldly warrior
Who fills his quiver with the arrows of the Almighty
Who summons his soldiers with the blast of the shofar

For if He will not build the house
In vain do its labourers construct it!
If He will not guard the city
In vain are the watchmen vigilant!

More than once were we worthy, may we be so still More than once we earned mercy, may it be Your will Beloved names of the dead

Engraved columns on a slate grey landscape in the orphaned park without a voice or a dream

The sun is buried too under swollen clouds the compressing sky near tears

to my legs like a frightened child

The air is in pain its dull white grasping breath makes the minutes crawl in naked trembling silence

Passion Fruit

By DONIA B. CLENMAN

At Hod Hasharon
we visited a young man of eighty;
still straight as a fir and handsome,
a pioneer who nursed a sick soil, dried swamps, survived malaria and hate – to build a home, a garden, a nation.

In the shade of a giant walnut tree we rest.
He will give us a bag-full as a parting gift,
I will crack them musing on history.
"Have you seen a passion fruit?" he asks.
"In love with the name already," I reply.
"Difficult to grow, preserve. – Delicate.
Each to be picked at its own time and kept still soft to the touch.
Capricious. It won't last."

I gaze at the green marvel:
spirals, concentric circles, crisscrossing lines.
A wondrous calligraphy.
He quarters it.
Sweet and sour, moist and mellow,
the creamy flesh firm and a taste of salt that lingers.

I ponder the essence of passion.
White flesh, green seduction, meeting of extremes?
Sweetness turning to acid, filling yet unrequited.
Fragile. Individual. Demanding.
And the salt:
Salt of the earth? Tears? Longing?

Gingerly I carry two home,
let them ripen, chill,
to neither restrain nor quicken.
A disciplined passion.
Yet the salt lingers.

Forgive

By SUSIE BERG

I am trying to keep myself from snapping at my five-year-old niece - after all her mother did collapse and die getting her morning Starbucks -

but she is kicking my chair
as we seek atonement

God
she really is getting on my nerves which reminds me that I wanted to ask

why:

Luke
cool at 15
foot caught between two rocks the rush of pure spring water pulling him under and keeping him

Ruby sparkling on her second birthday dead of pneumonia
the next month

Jane
on the hunt for a deal on shoes getting more than she bargained for from the bullet of a stranger

For sins against God the Day of Atonement atones
but for sins of one human against another the Day of Atonement does not atone until they have forgiven one another

All right then.
I forgive you.
What have you got to offer?

Our backyard: a short story of my life

By GEORGE BERNSTEIN

You can walk into our backyard through a stubborn gate that we share with our neighbour, Marge O'Brien, her two cats and a golden retriever, Cleopatra. On the other side, Salvatore Marietta lives with his daughter, Tiara.

Lots of grass in a war with islands of scrub. Gate to the alley groans when you shove it.

Getzela, the junk-man, comes by here on Monday and Thursday. His peeling chariot crunches when sagging Seltzer drags rhythmically in cadence with contrapuntal hoofs – the wagon in a perpetual race with collapse, overflowing with contorted sofas, broken chairs and broken dreams. Grey vest dotted with paint and sawdust, eyes clouded with history. Takes the shiny apple with fingers gnarled by battles and trouble.

"For your horse," I say.

"Adunk." He pats my messy hair.

Bubbe Rivka hangs towels on the clothesline, wheel screeching in rusty protest. Bubbe cups her hands and yells me to lunch. "Heshela, kumpt essen di hulipchas eder zai veren kalt."

Have to watch the third step on the porch – you can break your neck. In the corner, a leaky ice-box. Sandwiches and cold milk for exhausted indigents climbing out of boxcars two blocks away, looking for food and work.

Backyard of my childhood. Short story of my life.

Passover

By SARA LIPSEY

Passover 1924,
the Little Detective weaves through the exceptionally tidy rooms, his bare feet, flip flop along the glossy wood floors.
Bright eyes frantically search the bookcases,
Under the couch, he checks on all fours.
The drawers in the kitchen are pulled out,
the closets in their entirety, have been cleared.
He wonders where it is hiding,
It seems as if it has disappeared.
Frustrated, he escapes to the basement, and drops into his favourite chair.
Which is when he hears a crunch,
and finds the afikoman there.

Passover 1960,
the charismatic storyteller illuminates the events of Exodus, and suddenly there is sand under your feet.
Out of Egypt, with just your robes and staff,
In your sack there is only matzah to eat.
The miracles you have witnessed, still fresh in your mind.
But in reality your ancestors were there.
He sits at the head of the table, of his talent he is completely unaware.
The detective tools he once used have taken up dust, instead he is entertaining this young herd.
Growing from a curious boy to a father, the audience hangs on his every word.

Passover 2000,
my Zaida stares at each of us, grandchildren,
on his face there is a familiar smile.
Mah Nishtanah is coming up soon,
We have been practising for awhile.
The tantalizing smell of roasted chicken, permeates the air.
He turns to his wife, squeezes her hand, and gives her a loving stare.
Clearing his throat, he leans to the side,
and his glass is filled.
Another Pesach meal with his family,
He could not be more thrilled.

Passover 2007,
my family joins together as they do each year,
but the seder does not feel right.
Tonight we will remember the splitting of the sea, thoughts of my grandfather we will ignite.
The four sons will join our table,
bitter herbs and salt water will be eaten.
All the memories of his traditions,
The night, they will sweeten.
Pesach is a time to reminisce on not only how we became a nation.
But it gives my family a chance, to give Zaida's life a celebration.

Sara Lipsey is a Grade 12 student at Ulpanat Orot.

Let's Eat

By BRENDA SPIGELMAN AJZENKOPF

Let's eat, an endearing culinary word
Upon hearing any problem can be cured.
Chicken soup so soothing from the start
A glass of schnapps a must for the heart.
Let's eat, a form of traditional greeting
At holiday homes or the office meeting.
Chanukah latkes on a silver-plated dish
Celebrating Passover with gefilte fish.
Let's eat, are two words most auspicious
To feed the spirit's heightened wishes.
Bagels, cream cheese, lox and herring
A few extra pounds well worth bearing.
Let's eat, awakens memories of youth
To stimulate the proverbial sweet tooth.
From homemade tzimmes and honey cake
We distinguish the real thing from the fake.
Let's eat, I hear my father shout
Hot boiled potatoes and sour kraut.
The hunt is on for the best lokshen kugel.
Or a sensuous dessert of hot apple strudel
Let's eat, my mother's bold endeavour
To hold her children's loyalties forever.
A toast, to ward off evil and all strife
Wishing us l'chaim for a long and healthy life.

Passover Greetings

Peach Blossom: a Tu b'Shvat story

By RIVKA BERMAN

Once upon a time there was a beautiful garden where many wonderful trees grew – tangerine, lime, orange and peach. This garden was in a country called Israel, where every year the holiday of Tu b'Shvat was celebrated. This was a holiday for the trees, the Rosh Hashanah for the trees.

All the young children from all the schools would celebrate this day by singing and dancing, planting plants, carrying flowers, eating fruits and visiting gardens and parks to see the blossoming of the trees.

A few days before this holiday, a little girl told her teacher that the tree in her garden had started to blossom. The teacher asked if she and the whole class might visit her tree. The girl asked her parents, and they agreed that it would be nice to have all the children over for a visit.

The children began to sing and dance around the tree

On the day of the celebration of Tu b'Shvat, the class came into the garden to see the tree, but only one branch was in bloom. The teacher looked up at the tree and at the branch that was in bloom and said, "This branch does not belong to this tree, but to a tree in the garden on the other side of this high wall.

"Do you know to whom this tree belongs?" asked the teacher of the little girl. "And do you think we could go over there to see it?"

The little girl asked her mother to ask the next door neighbour, who was a very nice lady, if the teacher and the class might visit her garden. The neighbour was very happy to have all the children over to her garden. All the children went into the garden next door and, lo and behold, this tree was in full bloom, with beautiful flowers of white and a pale pink to almost white centre.

The children began to sing and dance around the tree. When ready to go home, they all received candy from this nice lady. The little girl went back home and into her garden, where she sat down on the ground and looked up at the tree that was still bare, and felt so sad because her tree was not yet in bloom and because no one was going to dance around it or sing to it. So the little girl said a prayer that her tree should soon blossom like all the other trees.

A week and more went by. Every morning the little girl would go into her garden to see if her peach tree was blossoming, and every day she went away sad because her tree was not in bloom. Then one day when the little girl was so discouraged and sad for her tree, she went into the garden and, lo and behold, she did not even have to look up. Her tree was full of flowers; all the branches were weighed down with beautiful blooms.

The little girl's eyes shone like stars and her face was aglow with joy. She was so happy that she started to dance and sing around her tree. Then she ran to her mother, to ask if she could take a small twig with flowers to school. Her mother cut a small twig with pale blossoms and pink centres, which the little girl took to school.

When the children saw the little twig full of flowers, they were all happy, and said, "These are the most beautiful flowers, of all the flowers."

The twig with its flowers was placed in a glass of water on the teacher's desk.

The Shabbos Queen

By PEARL SABAN

She shakes out the crisp, cream linen, placing it on the cherry wood tabletop.

Unfurling and spreading its edges and smoothing out its fine wrinkles,
she steps back to admire
her handiwork.

A set of silver salt-and-pepper shakers come next – a wedding gift from years ago.

Silver, yet tarnished,
it's difficult to make out the filigreed S and P.

Perhaps this Shabbos, like an earlier one, a little pepper will mistakenly do a dance with a little salt – the Lambada, the "forbidden dance" – atop our challah slices.

The olive wood challah board and its jagged-ridged knife have their place in the right-hand corner of this table –
two sesame-seed-sprinkled challah buns warm from the oven soon to take their place atop the board.
The bottle of grape juice
holds centre court, surrounded by little silver soldiers all lined up.
And nearby,
on a smooth melamine-wooded surface sits an elongated tray,
a modern piece of art that doubles as a wedding gift.

Atop that tray, standing tall and proud,
are Shabbos candlesticks: the parents and the children.
The parents, a wedding gift from the man of the house, bought in New York's Brooklyn, where the silver is grand.

The children, a smaller set, identical twins to the parents,
bought in Toronto,
where the silver is elegant sterling.
The smaller set, a gift from the man of the house,
upon the birth of a second child.

These four candlesticks and another lone candlestick warm to the sights and sounds of Shabbos, each one glowing happily.

Reflected in their flames is the holiness – the transformation of everyday to special day.

The Shabbos Queen sits back, admires the scene and smiles.

Her blessings are bountiful.

The last Passover

By JUDITH RUBINSTEIN

The author, a Hungarian-born survivor of Auschwitz, came to Canada after the war. She wrote this reminiscence about the last Passover seder of her youth, before Hitler and the Germans destroyed her world as she knew it.

At holiday time I get quite nostalgic. My mind goes back to my youth. Even after all this time, I still long for that warm feeling my family gave me. Every little detail of my lost childhood, the sharing of the holiday spirit with my parents and brothers, rushes back to me.

Life was not easy while I was growing up. The rising anti-Semitism gave us much pain. But even under that tension, we tried to create an atmosphere as pleasant as possible for the holidays.

It was a false security and we were at the mercy of the Hungarian government, which was under the influence of the Nazis. Even so, the preparations for Passover were carried out as usual. Every corner of our house was cleaned. Tablecloths were freshly washed, starched and ironed. Candlesticks were polished until they gleamed.

We children brought down the special Passover dishes from the attic and set the table the way we always did in years before. We were allowed to do our shopping during a certain time of day only, and we went, with fear in our hearts and the degrading yellow stars on our sleeves. Our spirits were crushed; we had no joy to welcome the forthcoming holiday.

My father conducted the seder, the ceremonial Passover meal, with all the dignity and hope he could muster. He explained the Exodus and the burdens our ancestors had to bear under the hard-hearted rulers of Egypt.

While we were reading and listening to the story of how Moses led the former slaves to freedom, we felt a faint hope that maybe we, too, would be taken out of bondage soon and this nightmare would end. Our tears flowed as we felt our own misery.

My brave and practical Mother still put away our Passover dishes and made order in the house, pretending that all this nonsense was just temporary. Little did we know that the command was already out to destroy our people.

After midnight, my younger brothers were tucked into bed, but sleep eluded me. Father, in the other room, was still praying, begging God for a miracle. The flickering candlelight made him an eerie figure wearing his white kittel (burial shroud) as was customary in our family. I was crying bitterly, feeling helpless and sorry for all of us.

Unfortunately, our fears were justified. Right after the holiday, our precious family life was disrupted. We were taken from our home by the police, never to be reunited again.

As we marched down the middle of the road toward the railway station, our good Christian neighbours watched without protest. Some were looking down, embarrassed maybe, but no helping hand or sympathy came our way.

Each of us was allowed to take a bundle on our back, nothing more, as we marched towards the Nazis' Final Solution. Among the town's newly emerged Nazi sympathizers was a half-orphan, a young boy whose mother, Aunt Julie as we called her, had done our family's big monthly wash. My mother had taken pity on the boy, fed him regularly and given him clothes, as they were very poor. When the Nazi terror began, Aunt Julie's son became a big shot in the Nazi party. Wearing a gun and uniform, he became full of hatred towards the Jews.

Passover holiday will never be the same for me. Time has taken some of the pain away, but I will always long for the wonderful memory of our seder of long ago.

The bubblegum tattoo

By MARINA MASHAAL

In tribute to Mr. Melding, teacher, survivor, z"l.

She still remembers the first time she saw those markings. A heavy breath of aging death overshadowed it and loomed over it like a stink that would not go away.

Mr. Melding, it was assumed, was nearly 80 years old. To a Grade 4 class, that was ancient. To Jayme, he was older than a tree. He looked two part oak and two parts weeping willow. Mr. Melding's body was as short as it was broad, and in his billowing grey trousers that mopped the classroom floors over shuffling shoes, and in his long, draping flannel jacket with soft grey stripes to match, he looked like a piece of oversized lost luggage.

His breath had as heavy a weight as the invisible burden of his body dragging in step with his worn soles, and yet the kindness in the weathered face of this lost man exceeded it.

Jayme remembered the forlornness in his eyes. At times, her 80-year-old teacher looked like a deer suddenly caught off-guard, frozen by the glare of searchlights. The odd time she successfully dipped into the reflection in his eyes, Jayme felt a lost, water-picture of deep hurts. When it came to being in the classroom with her teacher, something in Jayme felt a need to be protective.

Jayme's teacher could command no discipline, and the classroom noise that trailed him seemed to explode on his brain like high, piercing bombs. He'd raise his hand half way to the large flap of his ears in an effort to bully away the loud shouting. Sometimes you would hear him angrily raise his voice to defend himself. "Sheket, bevakashah," he'd beg in Hebrew. "Sheket! Please. I said, sheket."

The trunk of his body lurched forward as a couple of unruly kids noisily spilled out of their chairs. His tree-branch arms swung out and desperately tried to grab at them so that tree-arms, trunk body and crackling voice strained like a chorus in unison snapping back in synchronous rage at an unquenchable pack of angry dogs.

"Dai, bevakashah, dai," he pleaded in Hebrew. "I said dai."

Jayme wished her own quiet could echo his straining word. "Enough!"

Jayme hated that the class laughter would escalate as much as his begs did.

"Quiiii—et", he would call out, with a plea so frustratingly wearied you could only hear the word "why" spilling out.

She'd raise her hand and call him over – anything to help him weaken those voices and put a stop to the classroom noise. She didn't mind if he approached to help her. Jayme wanted her teacher to feel wanted.

Mr. Melding came toward her. For a moment, that walk of belonging seemed to make his eyes dance. His smiling spell beamed like a flash, then broke in an instant. Jayme felt as sad as Mr. Melding just then. The spillage of class jeers blotted out any chance for the twinkle in his brown eyes to actually spark.

Without looking up, Jayme could feel his breath fan out from the fat curl of his lower graying lip. A white spray told her that his clutched words collected spit as he talked. The sides of his mouth were always caked with a dried white foam at the cavern.

"Miriyam," he'd say, calling Jayme by her Hebrew name, "look here. You. I beg you to look here."

The gray of Mr. Melding's suit brushed against Jayme's arm, and as he moved his arm to help her find her place in her Chumash, the air from his open mouth breathed out sad ghosts that seemed to suck life from the pages and cloud over the prophetic words like an angel of death. There were no two ways about it. For Jayme to breathe and avoid a sharper stench, she had to keep her head down.

Eventually, she could see the pajama-like toughness of his grey, faded, striped jacket, if she dared to look, and the sleeve slid up his arm. The aging branch that was his arm was stained with a wrinkled blotch. The mottled skin encasing it bumped and then tattered into faint stains of blue with bubbles of a bruised-black purple that seemed to knit over and into the thick of his bulbous veins. The tincture looked like one of her Bazooka Joe cartoons washed-out by rain on a piece of bubblegum paper. Jayme didn't know what it was. In her mind, she nicknamed the mysterious, unknown stain the bubblegum tattoo.

She watched, mesmerized, as the six blue numbers – no seven, no six – folded into the veins of his arm. In a fraction of a moment, the numbers disappearing into the folds of his skin looked a sickly green. In another fraction of a spellbinding gaze, the numbers marbled together like blue spots biting into the white fat of butcher's meat. Jayme watched. His forearm shook with the slightest palsy and the blue of the bubblegum tattoo was palsied too.

The teacher's palm curled like a beating heart and then pumped open as his long fingers glided over the words on her Chumash page. Mr. Melding's motion momentarily broke her bubblegum gaze.

"We are here," he said. "Anachnu po." You could hear the stale accent of old Europe tailor in each of his English and Hebrew words. He was Romanian, it was rumoured, a Romanian Jew who spoke the old tongue called Yiddish, which meant only more mystery to Jayme, because her family was of Sephardi heritage and didn't even speak of Yiddish.

The mystery of the bubblegum tattoo was all the more heightened for Jayme by the class whispers and broken telephone rumours, as his tree body leaned over her at her desk.

"It's a sin to have marks like that on the body," dare-whispered one of her unruly classmates. "That's why they put them there. My mom, who lost all her 13 brothers and sisters, told me."

This meant that Jeffrey Gorodensky didn't have any aunts or uncles or cousins, and Jayme, whose circle of cousins and boisterous world of aunts and uncles she didn't have enough fingers to count was all she knew, was completely dumbfounded. The world in the classroom seemed to shift, and something of her teacher's silent prison unlocked something in the bubblegum tattoo well beyond what her Grade 4 brain could grasp. His bubblegum picture was more than just a scar on the body. Something had branded the skin with stains of unblotched memory that no mind could completely escape. Mr. Melding had a living scar to bear witness, to give testimony. Even if his memory couldn't speak out to Jayme, his arm could.

Jayme held the numbers captive in her mind: 2-4-0-1-0-6, 2-4-0-1-0-6. Could she break the code? The numbers merged into a chorus in Jayme's head and seemed to come alive. What did the numbers mean? Why were they even there? Jayme wondered.

"Jewish people aren't supposed to get tattoos," the rumouring classmate had said. She stared at the blue folds. As Mr. Melding motioned to the passages of her Hebrew text, she watched how the numbers seemed to fall into and out of his skin like empty pockets, the numbers stitched into his veins. Then they crumpled and faded back into his skin. She imagined the creases and crinkles of the bubblegum tattoo lost in bubblebath water. For a split second, the illegibility of the numbers lengthened like fingers and loomed large; for a split second the tattoo lines that shaped the numbers grew misshapen before all of it amputated in one fell swoop and sank back into a murk she didn't understand.

"My-dumb-neck, My-dumb-neck." Mr. Melding's dinosaur voice scooped into her daydreamer thoughts and broke Jayme's gaze. "My-dumb-neck," he kept babbling. "My-dumb-neck, My-dumb-neck," and Jayme didn't understand.

He pointed to the forearm. He asked her to look up at him as he pointed to himself and tapped at his heart. She concentrated and followed every step of Mr. Melding's efforts as his right hand washed over the numbers on his left arm. For Jayme, Mr. Melding made his arms become a living branch. "2-4-0-1-0-6."

The slow echo in his voice momentarily silenced the disruptive class jeers. Jayme watched his long finger stop under each number as he spoke. "2-4-0-1-0-6," he said with a quivering voice that shook at silence. "2-4-0-1-0-6," he said to Jayme. His palsied hand repeated the gesture.

To Jayme, his accented voice syncopated like that of a piano student learning how to sound out the names of musical notes. As he repeated the numbers, she heard: "Two for nothing. One not six" (Two four nothing. One nought six).

The old tree then pulled the cuffs of his jacket sleeve over the bluing forearm with a hard and sorry shake. "That's because of My-dumb-neck," he stated broadly. The feeling that had welled up inside him suddenly pumped out of him, and he looked and sounded more like a robot. "That's because of My-dumb-neck," he repeated.

Jayme looked up. The living tree of lost-luggage-turned-robot walked away. His trousers mopped the floor between the long row of desks, and she watched his steps that moved with a Chaplinesque sadness.

My-dumb-neck, My-dumb-neck. Inside her brain, the words rattled, skittled and skimped. Even now, Mr. Melding's voice bleated inside her like a faint and wandering sheep's. Back then, she had called the stain you weren't supposed to talk about or see, and certainly not show, the bubblegum tattoo. It had made sense to her 8¼-year-old brain way back when bubblegum chewing of any kind wasn't allowed on the school grounds.

It was years later, when she immersed herself in a Holocaust project as part of a Grade 10 tolerance class and read a survivor's testimony unmasking the silences behind a concentration camp called Majdanek that she remembered the long-forgotten words and put two and two together. Mr. Melding was not bleating. He was urging her with all the power of his raw and stinking breath to have her bear witness to memory he didn't want time to forget.

The day she finally broke Mr. Melding's code, Jayme felt a rush of pent-up release at the same time as she felt very adolescent, and worse, perfectly stupid. She felt anger that she hadn't understood. Mr. Melding was likely a dead tree now, and she felt all the worse that the memories added to his dying days were of classroom jeers that Jayme couldn't effectively help him to erase. Those jeers must have ached into and haunted his bones. He wanted the world to remember. He wanted Jayme to remember. He wanted us all to remember. Memory counted for something as much as it hurt. Silences, Mr. Melding in so many words said to her, didn't empower. It was important to say the ugly truth, to separate the ugliness of the truth stamped into your skin from the beauty of the tree veins that grew and learned how to root themselves with it.

What do you do when the memory scraping at your reality is harsh? What do you do when it is important to remember and it is just as important to not look back? Mr. Melding couldn't do it. Or so it seemed. Most of the world wasn't even talking about it then. In spite of how tired his bearing witness to her and her Talmud Torah classmates had appeared, Mr. Melding lost the ache of tiredness in the brief moments he had with Jayme. Like a pillar of strength, Mr. Melding found a way, and talked the silence out.

Bless the living scar and bless the life of our teachers who come to tell us our memories are real.

A Survivor Reflects

By SHERRY LEVY

Hatred killed innocent Jews, an unjust war was fought helpless amid inhumanity's carnage, I was caught a brave little boy, they stole my childhood
I learned to survive, practised being good accommodated early, the captors I dreaded freed my mind to escape memories of my family all dead
I challenged evil, regained control, depravity defied released my soul to keep my sanity, so away on wings I'd fly judgments, mortality I often eluded resisted peril, imminent death disputed refused to succumb to murderous hands then finally faced a new reality, uncertain I could withstand this ominous sentence, terminal illness, I tried to understand it heard my number called, the word cancer, my doctor was candid although thankfully, with luck, I'd evaded death before now fate left no options, truth could not be ignored but once again, so far, I've survived this ultimate test and continue to dedicate my time, committed to this purpose to honour innocent victims murdered in the Holocaust to ensure they are never forgotten, I tell their story so the world will always remember – I never rest.

Passover Greetings

Up, up towards the air

By MARLEE PINSKER

I couldn't go back to my regular shul after Stu left. I could just imagine the chorus of dismay from the little, old yentas who packed a punch.

"Stuart, oy, what a mensch! You should have held on to that one, Lily!"

"What! He left? What did you do wrong? Did you forget how to cook?"

"Lily, you want maybe I should have a little talk with him on long distance?"

Even those were better than the more private comments I could expect, when I would be drawn aside and addressed in a stage whisper audible equally in Toronto, the Netherlands and Miami, "Forgive me for asking, but you want I should teach you my secrets to satisfy a man, Lily – you know what I mean?"

A creature of habit, I turned to the synagogue down the street and sat in anonymity for almost a year. No one there knew me in this shul; it was as though this community existed on another planet. Even when I saw people I recognized from the supermarket or the law firm, they sighed and passed without comment. This my old shul would never have allowed. The older people here just nodded to me in a way that was abundantly proper and more than a little remote. They just didn't know me, and I guess I was a bit remote myself. In hindsight, I would say I was actually clinically depressed. They probably gave me an extra wide berth because they had enough troubles of their own.

It was quiet, sitting in my group of one. I could pay attention to the Torah reading without having to confer with Tzila about the problems of the kiddush. I could crowd into the aisle when the Torah passed each week and nod to the rabbi who always gave me a bright nod of total non-recognition. I could see him acknowledging to himself that once again he had failed to find out who I was. He was ancient, sweet and totally clueless, and I found that his bland sermons were an excellent invitation to meditate.

The High Holidays were spent in total anonymity, and on Sukkot my elderly neighbour Sarah came to join me in my sukkah on the first and last days of the holiday. My friend Cynthia, who isn't Jewish, came to visit me on chol hamoed Sukkot. I showed her how the sukkah was made and relaxed with her over lunch under its canopy. This was lovely, and served to make me feel both observant of the holiday and grateful for community. And I still hadn't had to go back to my old shul, the one I loved to hate.

I told Cynthia that old joke you can't tell a Jew, because every Jew everywhere has heard it already. How a Jew was rescued from a desert island and was seen to have built three synagogues. "This is the one I go to every week, and this is the one I visit for the sermons, and that one over there is the one, pheh! I wouldn't be caught dead in it!"

If my old shul loved Stu so much, why didn't he stay there and go to services instead of running off like Gauguin to a tropical island and painting young girls with no blouses? It was really their fault, my old shul and all its members, because Stu used to get angry at me for wanting to go every week. Every week, he would say, what Jew in his family ever had to go every week? Still, I thought of him there, and if I went without him, the people would guarantee he was abundantly present in the spirit, wanting to know how he was and how was his mother? And why didn't he come and tell his stories again, and when did he want to get together for tennis?

So I exiled myself, over at the Other Shul and spent Chanukah with them, and even Purim, walking past their children in bright costumes without recognizing a single child by a bright peal of familiar laughter or a well-known cuddle and hug.

On Shabbat Hagadol, right before Pesach, the rabbi gave a sermon on all the signs and wonders accomplished by Moses in the name of God. These were miracles, the rabbi said, even though there were naturalistic explanations for each item mentioned. Miracles, he said, and the people around me nodded and murmured to each other while I sat alone. Miracles.

The word alone took me far away from the lovely little chapel of my new shul and back to the plain folding chairs of my homey old shul. I remembered like an ancient rhythm the whole reality of sitting there surrounded by friends, listening to my own rabbi talk about this same topic. "A miracle can be a moment when all the usual things in your world conspire to take on a special significance," he was saying. "A miracle can be the most usual thing in your world, but when you look at it with new eyes…"

I remembered it so well, the sermon, and my friend Natalie beside me, who nudged me. Maybe it was two years ago, but the memory was so vivid I could see the sun streaming through the windows to land on the shoulders of my friends in golden embraces of light. Natalie's face had been lit up by a glow brighter than the sunlight and she whispered to me, "My Cory is a miracle," and my heart had stopped and lurched, because her Cory was so profoundly autistic he had once gobbled up a vial of pills while I was standing and watching him for only five minutes…Cory was a miracle? Oh yes, I had felt it from Natalie's expression. Cory was a miracle, capable of giving love when most unexpected and making the sweetest ceramics.

I was practically shaking when I exited from the new synagogue, but in all this time I had not advanced myself to shake a hand or say a word after "Good Shabbes," so no one called me back or said hello. I was a closed, anonymous stranger to them, and they were very nice people, but in their congregation there was no Natalie and no Cory. There was no inquisitive elder, presuming on our past association, and there was no history for me at all. Even the time I spent there was erased as it happened, since I had no connection to anyone and was socially invisible.

I walked home in a daze, but I was still hesitant. Could I return? What would I say to explain my absence? On my mantel, there was the Rosh Hashanah card from Natalie that I hadn't answered. Neatly stacked on the kitchen shelves was every newsletter my old shul had sent me over the months since Stu had left. A call from the rabbi still lived on my answering machine, endlessly recycled as a saved message that I refused to delete. Tzila had called, too, eager to talk about the ever present conundrums of the weekly kiddush. This I had deleted, quickly, and without a second thought. I had deleted Natalie's last message more thoughtfully, and also that of my friend Jo, head of the adult education committee.

I went back to my old shul on chol hamoed Pesach, on Shabbat. I was scared as I walked up the stairs towards the synagogue, and cringing lest someone grasp me in a herring-scented embrace with a hearty welcome of, "So where have you been?"

I was nearing the top of the stairs when Cory ran by. He stopped and turned back to watch me coming up towards him. Step by step I climbed, thinking of my last living goldfish swimming up, up towards the air. I would have run back down if it wasn't that he had seen me, and was unpredictable enough to call me back and demand an explanation. He didn't like to use too many words at a time, either, so he might just ask me the precise question I felt it so hard to answer, "Lily, why?"

He watched my ascent with his characteristic stare. There was, as usual, no expression of emotion on his handsome face. When I was near enough to touch him, he opened his mouth to speak, vocalizing each word loudly, as though he were making an announcement.

"Lily is here," he said. "Love."

Passover Greetings

Lehitraot – See you again

By HELGA STUMMER

It was not supposed to happen. The night was neither dark nor stormy. Roads were clear of ice, snow and slush. So how did Sarah hit what must have been the last vestige of a small patch of ice that had stubbornly refused to melt, resulting in a 45-degree turn, stopping within inches of a Toyota heading in the same direction – setting a whole series of events in motion?

"Wow, that was close," a not unfriendly, slightly accented voice greeted Sarah as she hesitatingly got out of her car, simultaneously lifting her eyes to heaven.

Someone has been watching over me – maybe God Himself, was her first thought.

"Ari," he introduced himself.

"Sarah," she responded quietly, taking his offered hand. Noticing that neither of them was hurt and that there had been no accusations, no recriminations, she relaxed somewhat.

"Near miss," he said cheerfully.

"Guess so," she replied, still in a daze and with a million thoughts going through her mind. "I remembered to take my foot off the brake. It was all over in seconds. What else…"

"You did fine. Nothing more you could have done. Could or should," he laughed. "I get those two mixed up."

A quick, surreptitious glance from one to the other – they liked what they saw. Sarah's youthful looks, charm and warmth appealed to Ari. In return, Sarah was impressed by Ari's athletic build, his self-confidence and his mature bearing.

Over coffee and bagels across the street, Sarah was finally able to relax totally, as she happily chatted about her university, her family and friends, and possibilities for the future.

Ari laughed as he recounted his experiences during this, his first winter in Canada. His reasons for spending the winter weeks here were to get to know this part of the world and to improve his English.

"Your first real winter? Where did you spend all the others? My guess is in a moderate climate – Israel?" She wondered.

"Tov m'od," he exclaimed. "I'm a sabra" he added confidently.

"Tov m'od must be 'very good.' I recall a bit of Ivrit from my Jewish school days. So, your winter experiences in Canada? Have you skated, skied, tobogganed, snowboarded?"

Ari hesitated. "Does skiing down Mount Hermon on borrowed, old skis count?"

"Why not? You must try to find time to make use of this winter here. You've skated at Metulla, I imagine? Amazingly, I have heard the ice is so well kept."

"I have not had a chance yet. The army keeps me busy. I am lucky to have three weeks leave."

"You know, I guessed right away that you are a sabra. There's something about the Israelis. Is it something in their deportment or self assurance?" she wondered out loud.

"By the way, did I mention this is my Zaydie's car?" he asked. "Friends drove him down to Florida. When he returns, he will need his car. He's a great Zaydie! Right now, I bet he's either playing chess or swimming – his hobbies."

Sarah laughed because her Zaydie's hobbies were exactly the same. "Bubbie says she can't get him out of the water. She calls him the meshugener. It's really an endearment. They've known each other for who knows how long. They celebrated their 50th anniversary last year. Can you imagine?

"Are you thinking what I'm thinking, Ari?"

"I think so – like the two of them have already met and become chaverim! What do you think they will be talking about in the shvitz?"

"The kinderlach, of course" Sarah replied.

On the way back to their cars, Ari had an idea. "We need a cook's helper at the camp I'm staying in," he blurted out. "He is despert!"

"Despert?" she queried. "Desperate, you mean?"

"That's it! Des-per-ate OK. He needs a helper and you, Sarah, are just the right person. You are bright, no doubt. You'll learn quickly, you also have three weeks vacation and you already know how to cook, right? You will become a cooking maven, and who knows…"

Sarah cut him short. She was laughing so hard she could barely get the words out. "I'm the original cooking klutz. The last time my mother left me to prepare a meal for my brother and sister it was a disaster! I overcooked the fish, undercooked the glazed carrots, and nobody wanted even to try my couscous. I ate it all myself – they'll never know how yummy that was."

"So," said Ari. "Let's go, and you'll make couscous!" He started the Toyota's engine.

She shouted out, "Just to look, not to cook," and ever so reluctantly, followed him in her car.

As they headed toward the camp, they passed large tracts covered with trees and undergrowth that would one day replace the gnarled, aging, bent trees. They crossed an extensive clearing, and arrived at a vast outdoor sports complex. Beyond it was a series of buildings, some old and stately, some covered by vines, each building bearing a plaque with an English, Greek or Latin phrase honouring a person, a turning point or an event in the building's history.

When they entered one of the buildings, Sarah heard music. Her heart soared, making her forget what had brought her here.

"Ari!" she burst out, "do you dance?"

"Sort of, sometimes," he replied unenthusiastically. Round and round they went, over and over. First in the outer circle, then even faster in the inner circle laughing and humming as they joined in the hora.

"I'm beginning to like your Camp Boker Tov. Isn't that the name you said, Ari?"

"Yes, we like to start the day on a happy note – 'Good morning, camp.'"

"The csárdás," someone announced.

"That DJ, he comes prepared," Sarah remarked. "I love the csárdás; it's my heritage. Bubbie taught me and Zaydie…"

But before Sarah could tell Ari about Zaydie, they announced a polka. The dance was in full swing, everyone up on the floor!

"Come on, Ari," she urged. "Let's dance again like before".

"Sorry, I'm no polka guy."

She started to do the polka right there, by herself, hoping her enthusiasm would rub off on him. Something held him back, and Sarah knew enough not to urge him any more.

Lehitraot – See you again

She had no good explanation as to why she was suddenly jerked back to reality or why she was actually considering becoming the cook's helper, but she found herself asking, "When do I meet this cook?"

"Machar," Ari replied, reverting to his mother tongue.

"Machar, that's his name?"

"Sorry, I was many miles away in Ima's kitchen. Machar means 'tomorrow.' That's when you'll meet Gideon."

The next day, after a restless night, she was introduced to Gideon, still of two minds about this whole cooking thing.

So, did Sarah turn from a self-professed cooking klutz into a cooking maven?

First things first. It takes more than three weeks for us mortals to turn from a klutz into a maven. Gideon's inherent good nature was put to the test a number of times, but he watched closely until a real calamity occurred. How could she have known that the lid of the large salt shaker was not on firmly, and how would Gideon have stopped the almost full shaker from emptying into the borscht? It happened, and this just as Sarah seemed to familiarize herself with all cooking utensils and their different uses. She had been pleased with herself.

Gideon took great pride in his cooking, and patience was not one of his virtues. Whereas he had previously only mumbled little words to himself in Yiddish, he now burst out loudly. All Sarah could be sure of was that these words were not compliments.

"Just what is a sachl?" Sarah wondered. "Does he mean my satchel?"

Sarah was ready to call it quits. She sought out Ari. He would know how to handle the situation.

"Well, what causes these outbursts?" Ari asked. "Is he a happy person, a morning person? Is he a perfectionist? It he demanding?"

"Yes, to the last two, but I don't know why he gets this way. He knows I'm improving every day. Sometimes he is so nice, then suddenly…"

"Aha-a chameleon. It's a word I looked up in the dictionary. I had read it somewhere."

"And that means, what?" Sarah wanted to know.

"It's a person who changes moods just like that animal changes colour."

"That's him all right" Sarah burst out.

"Let's talk it out. Gideon does not appear to be a miserable person. He may just take his profession a bit too seriously. He needs to relax."

Ari spoke to Gideon, after which he satisfied himself that he understood the problems. He had heard it all before. A clash of personalities here, a counsellor who needed a push there and a camper unwilling to follow rules. No different from Israelis. People need to learn about each other, appreciate each other's temperaments and aims. There followed a lesson on co-operation, collaboration. It didn't click, didn't seem to sink in. Maybe he should try humour.

Ari then talked to Sarah, and her spirits lifted bit by bit. A heartfelt thank you, a friendly hug and a kiss on the cheek for Ari – the first since they met.

Returning to Gideon, she said, "Gideon, let's be friends, real chaverim. Go and speak to Ari. He's really wise beyond his years. Living with soldiers, men and women, many of them having arrived from all over the world, has taught Ari to look beyond superficialities. He is funny, experienced, and knows people with all their warts and foibles. He will make you laugh and see things in their proper perspective."

Gideon looked straight at Sarah. He had never noticed how bright her eyes were, how her shoulders rose when a thought hit her; never noticed how quiet yet perceptive she could be. Up to that point, she was just Sara, a young women sent to help him in the kitchen.

Ari greeted Gideon with a smile. They talked and talked about everything – life, sports and movies, which Ari learned were a hobby of Gideon's who had a collection of movies in several languages. Comparing notes, they realized they had both been immersed in basketball. They talked and talked, forgetting the reason for their get-together until it was dinner time and Gideon ran back to the kitchen, arriving just as Sarah was putting the finishing touches on chopped fish balls.

It was as though Gideon was a changed person. The man-to-man talk had done wonders. Maybe it was just possible that he and Sarah could open up to each other too, learn to laugh instead of scowl, learn to praise instead of finding fault. Yes, he would try!

"Sarah," he said gently, "when would you like to take some time off to go on a hike or just hang out with your new friends here?"

Sarah did not reply immediately. She just smiled. Quite obviously Ari had, in his quiet way, worked his calming magic on Gideon.

"What a mensch, Ari is," Sarah mused. "How can I persuade him to spend his next leave here?"

A little peck on the cheek and she had fallen in love?

"Don't be silly." she told herself. "There will be others, and I'll see him again, somewhere."

After Ari returned to Israel, he sent several e-mails to Sarah – he was well, had been promoted, had led a brigade. He promised to be as vigilant as possible, not to worry. The last one to arrive was in the form of a wedding announcement, which caused Sarah to have conflicting emotions.

"Mazel tov," was her reply. Short and to the point, but not without a little heartache. She had known all too well that sooner or later, this would happen. She tried to be brave, not to let her heartache be known. It just wasn't meant to be.

That night, Sarah dreamed of 100 campers on skis, all looking like young Aris, waving as they left the university grounds, all calling out – "Lehitraot."

Passover Greetings

So Lucky

By BRENDA SPIGELMAN AJZENKOPF

So lucky, the nurses exclaimed at my birth
Conceived out of war, out of need
The daughter must be the reincarnate
For the multitude murdered seed.
So lucky, they whispered among the throng
To have risen from the ashes alive
My mother's soul searching for freedom
And finding the will to survive.
So lucky, the congregation announced
To have braved the impossible, to dare
My father's heart keeping the faith
Which prophesy foretold was "bashert."
So lucky, cried the tearful immigrants
The banished descendants of Eve
Our ancestral garden turned to dust
Shall bloom for us who believe.
So lucky, remarked the Canadian sentry
At the wretches dredged up from the sea
Our spirit seeped in our common sweat
We arrive in the land of the free.
So lucky, laughed our golden children
Secure in their knowledge of love
A new generation of family bound
By the "mazel" bestowed from above.

A Song to the Ascents

By ISRAEL SARNA

I raise my eyes to the desert mountains
From where will my help arrive?
To the Rock of Jacob, the Shield of Abraham
Will I look for deliverance, goodness, grace, compassion
Lauded, upraised, mighty, extolled, exalted, glorified, praised and blessed
Be the name of the Holy One
Not in any man do I put trust nor on any angel do I rely
But to His glorious and holy name do I declare praises
To His greatness and strength, splendour and triumph
Rock of the Eternities, Shield of David
May He remember the covenant of the spiritually mighty
May He help, shield and save all those who take refuge in Him
You who cling to the Almighty are all alive today

Life is such an accident

By ELAINE BATCHER

The hospital bed is cranked half-way as Rivie slopes against it, surveys the endless parade of visitors – family, friends, people she hasn't seen since the year gimmel, plus pastors of all types in case conversion crosses her mind, and the only people she hasn't seen too many of are nurses, what with recent cutbacks, but luckily her children have hired an aide who can intercede on her behalf with the demands of life here.

Sometimes she watches the tiny TV and sometimes she puts on earphones, but often she lies back and merely ponders, her face puffed by whatever gunk they're pumping into her to keep the tumours down, because surgery, she's been told is on hold, but maybe radiation? Don't I look like a chipmunk? she asks and after that reels off whatever's in her mind, opening doors to sleeping dogs and telling truths once avoided. Is it the drugs?

Tumours? No one knows but she's spieling up years of prudence into this long and lasting attempt to tell… before the window closes, before she's under the chemicals, knife, ground – whatever, and they're growing, those tumours, at least three she's been told, but no way to know without cutting her open and that's surely the reason for all the stiff, sore, stumbling over the past year plus deafness and blurred vision that hearing aids, glasses didn't fix despite all attempts – it all makes sense to her kids now – needing help where once so autonomous, one husband divorced, the other outlived, and it's not old age but brain tumours. Two-mers, what a word, two or three in her case, but are they what's causing her new penchant for prophecy? for like a biblical patriarch she spiels oaths – shalts and nots – lots and lots – and recollections!

During a back massage: He was wild for her but she went ahead with termination and never looked at him again.

When the phone rings: He stole $5,000 people knew but they didn't want to upset his wife, so no one blew the whistle.

Over a glass of orange juice: My neighbour the city girl, her boyfriend thought he could fool with her, got her P.G., then said the twins she was carrying weren't his, but she had four brothers, Catholics, who took him for a ride and changed his mind – you can be sure they weren't thrilled their baby sister took up with a Yid, but there was a quick conversion and a quicker wedding.

Upon waking from a catnap: You remember my friend Minnie and her husband Paul, their girl studied ballet, from infancy a dancer's body, she won a scholarship to Juilliard, worked with Balanchine and then she met Keith and he ruined her – these were smart parents – and what I want to know is why they let him.

After a diaper change: No love lost in that family, none of the brothers talk nor their wives, and the kids hate each other too, what can you do!

For this everyone waits outside while she's changed, powdered and freshened, then when the curtains part we all return and pretend to be in adult company even if the rest of us never prophesied. Don't talk crazy! her sister Cippy yells, still owning the right as eldest to yell but after 70 years it's wearing a bit thin, this family privilege, and anyway here in hospital it's Rivie's right to insist – You don't know what's coming, every day you get up and you walk around and you never know, and everyone has to agree. They're coming later, Rivie says of her girls and beloved granddaughter, and truly they all check in daily but she doesn't always remember what time it is and days melt into each other.

Rivie's helper also spiels, a woman on a mission for her son still in Russia, a doctor whose family is starving, she tells us, for life under communism was much better and now the country is run by How you call them, Mafia? We say we've heard that and cluck about the injustice of immigration rules, but it's not Canada she wants for him, he was here but didn't like it, he's renowned at home – it seems Canada didn't care – and we're left to guess that like any newcomer he'd have to start all over again. She reminds us of the six million, tells survivor stories, coolly aware that North Americans may feel guilt for what was suffered in Europe, hints that we must now use whatever influence we have to help her son emigrate to Germany, quite acceptable to German officials, but not until August of next year, you know how precise they are, and they've said no sooner.

But Rivie says Your son and his wife will suffer terribly if they move to Germany! And what visitor wants to get between them, especially since she's so helpful to Rivie, and it may only be later that we wonder why a child of survivors wants to live in Berlin, later still that we decide to let her son take care of himself since the foolish man was offered life in Canada but turned it down.

The grandfather I share with Rivie did the same – came here but hated it and went back, spinning tales of wonders he'd seen, milk in glass bottles delivered to houses, bread baked daily and sold everywhere for pennies, and so many motors on city streets that at least once a week there'd be a crash, and everyone laughed at his stories and called him Chaim Liar.

He married twice, fathered 11 babes and died in his bed, and it was his children who fled Europe, cheating Hitler, except for the family of his firstborn, who tarried too long and were caught. The clan has flourished here and that's why Rivie has so many visitors, all of them shocked to see this happen to one of Chaim's younger grandchildren, since the brain was never a family weakness – stomach, yes, heart, yes, but brain never – we've lived on our brains, this family. They've told me they're going to put me on some kind of program, Rivie says, jolly and cheery and as hopeful as we've seen her in years – unburdened it seems, with the awful prospects everyone else intuits – surely a blessing! But she must know something's afoot – there's this unrelenting push to prophecy.

You'll meet a man next month, she tells her younger girl, amazingly single at 30, and long past the age of Rivie's second marriage, but I'm telling you to let that one go and wait for the next. Then shifting her gaze to the older girl, Have you done your Pesach shopping? and waiting for no answer she states, You'll be happier when this is all over. You'll want to get your kitchens in order.

Passover Greetings

Mother's secret

By MAURICE KRYSTAL

My mother was born in 1911 in southeastern Poland, in a small town no longer on any map, called Potak Slota, near the Ukranian border. She told me her parents were farmers who grew wheat and had apple orchards. But the war came along and interrupted the serenity of my mother's idyllic childhood. She and a brother were the only members of her large Jewish family to survive the Holocaust. It left a scar that she had to deal with for the rest of her life.

According to her story, her survival was due to a series of unusual circumstances. At age 16, she wanted to see the world. She left her family and travelled alone to an uncle in Vienna. Six months later, she got restless again, got back on a train and continued further west to Antwerp, Belgium. While in Vienna, she had been in touch with a distant cousin who lived in Fort William in Canada, and she hoped to cross the Atlantic. She made her way to Belgium and expected to earn some money and book passage to the New World.

I wanted to know about the family I never had

Through sheer determination and audacity (that's how she described it), she learned to become a diamond cutter. The money was good, she learned Flemish quickly and made many friends. She lived life to the fullest in cosmopolitan Antwerp. Those were the happiest days of her life, buying the latest fashions, going to clubs, dancing and attending operas. It was quite an experience for a restless and adventurous farm girl from Poland. At the age of 22, she had enough money saved to bring Pnina, her 20-year-old sister, to Antwerp. Those years with her sister, away from the oppression back home, were so liberating that Pnina did not want to return home. She stayed in Belgium and met a man she loved.

At the same time, my mother met my father-to-be, who was a diamond polisher and a British citizen. They married in 1936 and settled in London. In March of 1939, she returned by train to visit her family in Poland. After a few weeks stay, she returned to London. War broke out six months later. My mother worked feverishly to get her sister and her new husband out of Belgium and into England. The border was closed to all but British citizens. She survived the bombs dropped on London, and in early 1946, went to Antwerp, trying to find out what had happened to her sister.

Some people who had survived the death camps confirmed that she had perished. The drop of the Iron Curtain in Eastern Europe made it more difficult to find out all the facts about her parents and family in Poland. But, through the Jewish Agency, it was finally confirmed that all but one brother had died in Auschwitz.

In 1949, angry and frustrated, with two young sons and her husband, my mother finally realized her long-delayed dream of coming to Canada.

Growing up, I had heard her story many times. I believed my very existence was only possible because my mother had been willing to take major risks in her life. She always talked about being a tomboy and wanting adventure. Her childhood stories were usually about getting hurt climbing trees, riding horses, or fighting with her siblings. She was my feminist hero before the term became fashionable.

But some aspects of her narrative left me puzzled, even when I was quite young. From what I read, and I did read a lot about this period, I imagined that leaving a religious Jewish home all alone in 1927 must have been more rare than chickens' teeth. The idea that a Polish village family had enough money for her to take a train across Europe was also highly suspect. Her independence, pluckiness and ability to adjust to such major historical upheavals at such a young age were extraordinary.

Meeting Dad when he came on a trip to Belgium was a stroke of good fortune. She survived for a purpose, and that purpose was one she did not let me forget. It was to raise a family to prove Hitler did not win!

In the house were some photographs of her family. Her favourite was taken in 1938, and in it were my mother, her parents, four of her siblings, two brothers and two sisters, (Pnina was in Antwerp), some uncles and aunts, and their children. There were about 20 people, all dressed in dark, sombre clothes, all standing by a garden next to a farmhouse. But my mother stood out, in clothes that must have been the height of fashion at the time. This picture was always kept on the mantle. She would stare at it often. On certain days of the year, she would stare at the picture for hours and cry. Those days, Dad took us out of the house so that she could have some privacy.

I wanted to know about the family I never had, and would often ask her about her brothers, sisters and parents. Sometimes she would reminisce about how strict her father was and how being the eldest, she was a disappointment to him because he had wanted sons. Her mother protected her and gave her more freedom than any other girl in the village.

But I had an unquenchable thirst to know more, and sometimes she didn't have the patience to answer any more questions. I was most curious about where my grandparents ended up. To be told, "They are dead," did not tell me much. My dreams became nightmares as I tried to figure out all the various scenarios. One day I caught my mother in a bad mood. I must have been eight or nine years old.

"How did they die? Where did they end up?" I asked while I was doing homework and she was cooking.

Her face turned crimson and she rushed off into her bedroom and came back with a history book she was reading. She turned the pages angrily as she hissed through clenched teeth.

"So you have to know everything, do you?" She slammed the book down on the kitchen table in front of me. "That picture there." She jabbed the air with the book. "In that pile, you will find your grandparents!"

I read the inscription underneath and realized this was a scene taken in a gas chamber at Auschwitz where Jews perished. I had seen similar pictures before in newsreels, but it suddenly became more personal. I read something in this book that I didn't know before – that the bodies were always stacked in a pyramid shape when they opened up the supposed delousing shower chambers. This was because the last to die would climb on top of the others because the gas being used was heavier than air. The picture became another part of my dreams for years. I was Grandma or Grandpa struggling to stay alive a few more seconds. I would wake up sweating and choking and not be able to distinguish reality from illusion.

When I was in high school the nightmares began, reminding me of my own when I was a child. In the middle of the night, she would start banging the walls and screaming. My parents went together to see doctors, who prescribed a variety of pills. Her bedroom walls became the walls of the gas chambers; sometimes she wanted to get out, other times she wanted to get in to save her family. I learned quite quickly not to make a fuss, but to help Dad boil milk for her and dissolve the pills in her cup in the middle of the night, as she cried for her sister, Pnina.

For most of my 20s and 30s, she became more and more afraid of the outside world. She isolated herself in her home, rarely venturing out. She had to be medicated and carried by her two sons to attend our father's funeral and she almost fainted at the gravesite.

All through the years, I had to protect her from the outside world's "cruelty," remembering this was once a heroic young woman.

She was 91, and she adamantly refused to go to the hospital. "They will kill me there!" she cried. "They do medical experiments!"

I was forced to hire nurses to go to her house. The doctors, nurses and social workers all warned me that her health was deteriorating rapidly and soon there would be no choice. She started rejecting her food. Judy, the latest nurse, called one evening and said, "Your mother has something she wants to tell you. Can you come over right away? She is quite agitated."

Mom was in her bedroom, and it was obvious she had not eaten the supper on her night table. Judy had asked me to see if I could get any food down before she went to bed. I told her I would try.

I sat on my mother's bed; she had shrunk to less than 80 pounds on her five-foot frame.

"You wanted to see me?" I asked.

"Yes, I'm leaving soon. Mother is calling me and I have something important to tell you,"

When I first witnessed my mother speaking and crying out to her long dead mother, I thought it was bizarre. She was both crying and elated, believing that she would soon be reunited with a long lost parent.

"First, you eat something, and then we talk."

I lifted the spoon of mashed carrots. She tightened her lips like a small, obstinate child.

"If you want me to hear what you have to say, you have to open your mouth." Surprisingly she did. I got three spoons in before she pushed my hand away. Better than I hoped for.

"I have to tell you what happened before the war." Her voice was so soft and subdued that I had to bend down so that our faces almost touched.

"World War II?" I asked.

"Yes, I left home at 16, but I never told you the whole story." Her hand reached out to touch my arm, and then she held on with surprising strength. "I was touched by my father's brother."

I reached over for tissues as the tears streamed down her cheeks.

"Touched?" I asked. "Do you mean he touched you in a bad place?"

That was my mother's expression when I was growing up. As I looked at her small, convulsing body, I was amazed at how our positions had become so reversed that I was even using her phraseology.

"He… raped me!"

The silence was deafening. I could hear the clock by her bed ticking; it dominated the room. What to say, how to respond?

"Why?" I asked stupidly.

"It was the times. People were crazy. People did mad things when they drank. Father took a whip to his younger brother and he was driven away from the village. When I started showing, money was borrowed to send me to Austria to see my mother's brother who found me a doctor. I survived because I was damaged, because they drove me away. Mother cried, but father said it was my fault for acting like a boy. He was ready to whip me also, but my mother stepped in between us."

She couldn't stop the tears. I put my hand on her flushed face. She was hot and exhausted; the memory had drained her. I looked at her – her lips were trembling and wordlessly pleading for me to respond.

"Thanks for telling me, Mom. It must have been difficult to tell me all this. I'm glad you didn't take this story to your grave."

"I had to tell you," she whispered conspiratorially. "I promised my mother!"

I squeezed her warm hand and kissed her forehead goodnight the way she did for me when I was a child.

A week later, she was in the hospital, and three weeks later, she went to her mother.

A mosaic of memories carved in stone

By ROSE ROMBERG

The clarion call of the Shofar announces the threshold of the New Year, time to visit gravesites
Rebecca moves among her family head-stones.
Father, mother, husband, sisters, aunts, uncles nieces, nephews so many; departed so young.

Back to Papa's stone, remembering…

Her beloved Bubbie Sarah and Zaidie
Avram.
Her thoughts deep as the Atlantic that separates her from Papa's beloved parents.
Tears blur her eyes and flow unrestrained as she stands alone in deep meditation.

Her thoughts unfold as though in clear reality.
She is once again in her Bubbie's farmhouse.
Can she truly hear the rooster's crowing crescendo? Ko-oo krra kooo!

His vibrating silvery strains echo upon the distant hills.

The four-year-old Rebecca slips off her straw mattress in the dark, for there is no window in the loft.

Quietly, she moves to the opening where the ladder leans. She peeks down into the room where Bubbie and Zaidie are asleep.
It is the Sabbath!

Silently she climbs down.
Tiptoes along the sawdust earthen floor and with great effort heaves herself upon the table below the high window. She looks out.
The emerging sun has painted the sky in swirls and ribbons of orange and magenta under a curtain of morning mist. Her emotions are mixed with dread and wonder.

A child at an open window looking down out of loneliness sees sparkling jewels on dewy grass.

A cat stalks ready to pounce on prey.
She hears a bird's tweet from a tree brushing the hut.

Suddenly, a cacophony of sounds reach her delicate ears from the barn.
The horse neighs and stomps his hooves.
The cow's husky voice moos and the hen cackles as she comes in to lay her eggs.
All in their own language claiming breakfast.
Were they not to be fed because it is the Sabbath?
"Thou shalt not do any work on the Sabbath."
While she sits on Zaidie's knees he teaches her the "Ten Commandments."
Tears fill her eyes, remembering…

Little Rebecca has become attached to her animal friends during her stay the summers with her beloved Bubbie.
Bubbie took her everywhere.
To the thick woods to fill their baskets with blueberries and mushrooms.
To the neighbouring farms to exchange eggs for pickles and cabbage.

How she loved frolicking in the fields thick with purple and white clover, its fragrance still lingers.

Suddenly, she sees in the distance a figure hurriedly approaching. Her layered skirt flowing freely in the cool morning breeze.
Happily Rebecca remembers. Pana Pietroff is coming to feed the animals; and yes
she is carrying a basket.
For sure there is a jar of sauerkraut.
Even Bubbie doesn't make it as good.
How she loved that sauerkraut.
She eases herself off the table and runs out to meet her.
Memories, memories…

A siren's sudden shrill careening along Bathurst Street, breaks Rebecca's reverie.

She places burnished leafy-twigs on Papa's gravestone, as she reads from his Siddur's discoloured pages
Aged by time…
Yit-ga-dal-ve-yit-ga-dash-she-mei-ra-ba…

Slowly she takes her leave in sombre mood;
With thoughts of never-to-be-forgotten
Her precious youthful family,
Their names carved in stone.

Jordan "Passover"

By DONIA B. CLENMAN

As our annual custom has been since 1982, we booked a trip to Israel this winter, intending to return toward the end of March, in time to celebrate Pesach with our children and grandchildren. Little did I know of the special Passover I would be celebrating there.

Like most important events, it started innocuously with my interest in booking a trip to Jordan. I made arrangements for a three-day tour that, in addition to seeing Petra, would give me a glimpse of the country. I was fortunate in dealing with an Israeli company, which, to my delight, arranged for a small group of seven people to begin the adventure.

Little did I know that I was embarking on a journey into the past to meet
Moses Miriam Aaron
the first "seder."

'Mah Nishtanah Haleilah Hazeh Mikol Haleilot?'

Yesterday. The yesterday of yesterdays. Going to Mt. Nebo, in the footsteps of Moses. I, Donia of Opatow, survivor of our people, survivor of the Shoah, a slave in an evil Pharaoh's camp, again one of the "Mixed Multitude," walking toward freedom and at 73, retracing your footsteps, Moses.

For the first time seeing the terrain, the journey, the difficult lands leading toward the Promised Land. The geography unchanged, the mountains as hostile as they are rounded, the valley deep, the sand eternal, the sky luminous, the journey as tortuous and unending.

Retracing your steps, Moses, for the first time giving body, flesh, substance, geography to the jumbled names reverberating in my mind. You came from Sinai through Eilat/Aqaba toward Petra named Selah Adom – still "red rock" in modern Hebrew – crossed the canyon at the Amon Valley, toward Moab Mountains and the Rock/Fortress of Karak, continued toward Amman – Rabat Amon to Jaresh, Gilead, crossed Jabbock, and then the entry and history of the Promised Land began.

From Mt. Nebo, I saw what you, Moses, saw. Jerusalem, Hebron, the Dead Sea, Jordan, Gilead, the Promised Land. And today, on the site, a Christian Monastery stands, the "inheritors" who even invented your unknown grave "exactly" on the spot of the church, while the Bible clearly states that you were buried below and your grave is unknown while God took your soul with a kiss. The most extraordinary "unreward" for the most extraordinary prophet, forever preventing the future excesses of shoddy pilgrimages, turning you into another idol and not the son of an invisible, existential Yahveh who "Shall be what He shall be."

Today, on to Petra to complete my little journey. Rocks of a Red City, mountains gleaming with colours of rainbows, temples, mausoleums, theatres, built into endless rock. And my poor mind, roaming back centuries, trying to clothe words in the garments of reality, for the first time, thinks of the "Mixed Multitude" having had to travel through the Mountains of Edom, the dry, hot Nabatean/Edom country.

I try to juggle thousands of years of history and give body to the Mixed Multitude. Understand the blank between Sinai and Jordan, now the reality of the terrain imprinted on my mind. To understand their longings for freedom, their regrets and desire to return to a less hostile, harsh land; the heat, the sand, the wind, the leanness, the beautiful poverty of the region; the encounters with warlike, territorial Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Amalekites; the forging of a dream, a nation, a Leader struggling with reality, hardships, and yet creating laws of ethics, morality, compassion in a land with nothing of the above, only mere survival.

How green and beautiful must the Promised Land have looked with a real river, a real lake, a real sea, after the Amon Valley, Edom's Mountains, Moab's Canyons, and always walking walking walking. One understands well why washing feet was foremost in hospitality, those tired, blistered, bleeding feet traversing mountains, deserts, to follow an invisible God and the promise of an invisible, unknown land.

I, Donia of Opatow, Poland, Survivor, am one of the "Mixed Multitude" wandering in

The desert of Sinai, in the killing fields of the Shoah,
in Passchendaele and Flanders Field;
witness to Egypt's Pharaoh, crossing with Moses, Miriam, Aaron, Petra's "Selah Adom," beholding the Promised Land
Jerusalem, Jericho, Hebron
Jordan, the Dead Sea;
Aqaba and Eilat guarding Sinai's entrance,
the mountains of Gilead and
Jabbock, the entry to the Promised Land.
Dying with Moses, Miriam and Aaron, crossing with Joshua,
singing with David, Solomon,
Exiled, dispersed by Babylon, Assyria, Persia.
Returning, dispersed again by Rome, from Justinian to the Crusaders, the Inquisition in the furnaces of the Shoah.
Returning, the new Edomites, Amalekites, Philistines rising under Islam's vengeful Crescent
Imperial Jihad in our blood unstilled.

Passover Greetings

An interview with Miriam

By ALICE LEHRER

Aliza: What brings you here?
Miriam: You. You thought of me, so I came. One can hear, touch or speak to anyone in history – reading and thinking brings us alive.
Aliza: You mean this interview isn't an exclusive?
Miriam: Sorry. That's the nature of Torah. We belong to everyone. The more a person learns, the more our life is perpetuated. This interview, if it is published, will awaken me even more. And what brings you here?
Aliza: I'm wondering why Jewish heroes have been studied so much, and I'm thinking that my life might be enriched by knowing more about them.
Miriam: And has your life been enriched?
Aliza: So far yes, but I don't know you well enough to decide. Tell me about yourself, who you are.
Miriam: Most people know me as Moses' sister. Moses, who led the Jews out of Egypt. What most people don't know is that I led them out, too, but with singing and by dancing.
Aliza: And what made you do that?
Miriam: The anxiety and fear of leaving Egypt left most Jews concerned only with the immediate needs of moving and survival. With little room for extras, I took my tambourine knowing there was also cause to rejoice. Joy and celebration had to be part of this if we would survive.
Aliza: Did Moses have a problem with what you did?
Miriam: No. He made his own song. It is part of Jewish daily prayers. But dancing and singing was my idea, and that is one of the reasons I'm called a prophet.
Aliza: How?
Miriam: I saw the potential of our people. I had faith in God's power propelling us to become a nation. We had come down into Egypt generations before as a family of 70, became a multitude, then were enslaved and finally, freed with our beliefs and traditions intact. It was a miracle, a turning point in history. Part of a greater plan.
Aliza: Weren't you afraid of the desert, the unknown? At least in Egypt, life was predictable.
Miriam: Predictable slavery? We were restricted and oppressed more each day. Pharaoh was killing our newborn sons. We were a dying people.
Aliza: And what was so prophetic about dancing?
Miriam: I understood the meaning of one God. I understood that we would embrace Him as a free nation and no longer be subjected to the fickle will of the many Egyptian gods. I saw how God was behind these events, moving hundreds of thousands of people on a return to the Promised Land. This called for singing and dancing.
Aliza: So what actually happened?
Miriam: After miraculously crossing the sea intact, I took my tambourine from under my dress, hidden from those who would never have let me take it.

I begin shaking it and grab my mother's hand, and she takes another girl's hand who takes another's and we break away from the column of people and begin to sing and dance. Soon we are a great circle of women and everyone is singing and dancing while the men and boys watch. Many begin to clap their hands in rhythm with us and smiles come across faces.
Aliza: So you uplifted their spirits, too?
Miriam: I did. When I began singing, the joy and relief burst beyond words and song into dance. Our bodies became our instruments of the emotional moment.
Aliza: You make me smile. If I had been there, I would have danced, too. I'm thinking how many times in life we could be thankful and dance and we don't. Tell me more of who you are. You said this event was "one of the reasons" you were called a prophet. What were the others?
Miriam: Knowing as a midwife that I had to save Jewish babies. Knowing that my parents, who had decided never to bring more children into the world, into slavery, must try and conceive again. But don't forget, dancing out of Egypt was what also defined my prophecy.
Aliza: Can you tell us a bit about these other events?
Miriam: I was born in Egypt. Our forefather Jacob and his family migrated from Canaan down into Egypt because of famine in our homeland. They settled in the province of Goshen, but some moved to other cities where they eventually assimilated. When I was born, Egyptian society was faltering and we were its scapegoats. Hebrews thrived and multiplied, holding on to our identity and anti-Semitism was born.
Aliza: How was your identity different from Egyptian?
Miriam: We believed in and worshipped one God. We gave charity to the poor, even as slaves, Egyptians and Hebrews alike. We circumcised our male children. We dressed in a modest fashion, differently than Egyptians. And we kept our Hebrew language and our Hebrew names.
Aliza: So Pharaoh was forcing you to assimilate?
Miriam: He tried to undermine us, to break us. Shopkeepers were forced to close, professionals lost their positions, our men were forced to work at tedious and mindless manual labour, outrageous taxes were levied on us, and finally, we lost our right to be free. As we struggled, Pharaoh saw our resilience and ordered all midwives to kill Hebrew male newborns.

I was a midwife trained by my mother, Yocheved. We worked together, often in Pharaoh's household because we were considered the best. The Egyptians referred to us by our secular names, my mother, Shifra, and I, Puah.

Following Pharaoh's decree, I convinced my mother that we had to hide and save Hebrew newborns through a network of families in our community. The stress and fear was overwhelming, but we did it. We took measures to quiet the infants by constant nursing until I could find a family unsuspected of having a newborn. These children spent most of their lives hidden until we left Egypt. The families who took them in took on the new nursing mother, all heroes in my opinion. Which brings me to my own parents.

Aliza: Were you their only child?

Miriam: Yes. I was young and very precocious, and they wanted more children but voluntarily separated from each other when Pharaoh declared that every male Hebrew child be thrown into the Nile. My father feared my mother would conceive and couldn't bear the loss of her baby. Other couples followed their lead. I saw this could mean the end of our people. They couldn't see beyond their fears of the moment. This was a surrender to Pharaoh that would destroy us.

Aliza: So you thought they should stay together and have more children even in such a dangerous climate? How did you reunite them?

Miriam: They truly loved each other. I convinced them to see through my eyes. I let them see my vision.

Aliza: What is it like when parents don't see as clearly as their children?

Miriam: It is frustrating and disappointing since we look up to parents. Mine listened to me when I told them that they were sacrificing our people, foregoing our future by abstaining. They heard me when I reminded them how we were leaders who had saved baby boys from death. Soon they remarried and other couples followed their lead.

Aliza: You were quite the daughter.

Miriam: Soon after, my brother Aaron was born. The birthrate actually rose in spite of Pharoah.

Aliza: And when was Moses born?

Miriam: My brother Moses was born in 1393 BCE. He had a strong cry and those deep dark eyes that charmed us. My mother was nursing constantly, keeping him quiet for fear he might be discovered. Pharaoh became suspicious of her when she stopped working. One of his officers, whose baby I had saved from a difficult delivery, warned me that they were about to take Moses. My mother immediately placed him in a basket made of reeds and set the cradle free on the river, lulling him to sleep.

Aliza: Where were you?

Miriam: I kept my eyes on that basket from the top of a rise overlooking the river, followed it as it floated along, and not letting it out of my sight. He was my responsibility. I prayed intensely for his safety and didn't stop until I saw Pharaoh's daughter pick him up as the river took him to the palace. At that moment, he started crying and she heard him.

Aliza: Didn't she see he was circumcised, a Jewish baby?

Miriam: She did. But he was a beautiful baby and she was desperate to have a child. Her arranged marriage was a disaster, but a baby would satisfy her constant need to love and be loved. She named him Moses, meaning, "For I drew him from the water." I took my mother, well-known in the palace as Shifra, the master midwife, to nurse him. On my way home that day, I looked up to the heavens and felt the deepest love for God I had ever experienced. I would never have a greater partner in life.

Aliza: OK. So things worked out and you made things happen. Does this mean anyone with a vision is a prophet?

Miriam: No, but Judaism says that someone who is very connected to something higher, for the good of the world, for rectifying the world, is on the way. It doesn't reserve the title for saints. And in Judaism, it's not only God who chooses who will be a prophet. The person has to take the job, hear the inner voice and have vision. The Bible calls me a prophet, but the rabbis of the Talmud debated whether I really was one.

Aliza: And they concluded?

Miriam: No conclusion.

Aliza: Do you think you were a prophet or a hero?

Miriam: A hero seizes a moment and in an instant does what has to be done without hesitation.

Aliza: It's true that when interviewed, most heroes say that. But again you're called a prophet.

Miriam: Prophecy is about seeing synchronicity as God's hand and not as coincidence. For example, we do something good and everything falls easily into place. The prophet sees it as God at work with us. This very strong connection is the fibre of a prophet. We all have that potential.

Aliza: Do you have a message, because we have to conclude?

Miriam: Two things. First, children can teach more than books. If parents could hear their children's truths, bypassing their own adult egos, some clear and powerful messages would be heard.

And second, Passover is the holiday of freedom. We all can be freed and step away from the mundane with a greater vision for ourselves and our community. We can make significant things happen, great or small.

At the beginning of our conversation, I told you that I came because you sought me out. Will you have me back?

Aliza: Yes, and often I hope. You have much to share and I have so much more to learn than two thousand words will ever allow. Thank you and shalom shalom.

Beatification on the Kinneret

By MYRA SHUSTER

You skipped effortlessly up the Tiberias Bus Station stairs, soldier's jaw braced, shouldering our weighted duffle bags – perilous, like weaponry.
Massive as the life we gave up.

Four shekels for plastic sandals slipped into pack pockets,
To wade through the Kinneret's waves, walk its rocky bottom.

Smooth we lay, sun-drenched, delicious,
on the Kinneret's scorched grasses,
runaway high-strivers, joy-mongers, blocking out an unrelenting sun with Durrell and Marx paperbacks.

Monolithic domes caught our sight, perverse cement protrusions from the water;
(Jesus's signposts: "I walked here"?) Obsolete as stale breadsticks, yet beckoning. "Come on," you cried, and we scrambled up, tucking fear away, leaving no blood or skin behind.

"Smashed skulls and bleeding flesh, no help for miles," I think now.
but your camera caught the daft curve in my hip,
the extravagant, self-championing stance, opalescent light on sepia water, and a beatific smile.

Elijah's Light

By IRIS KULBATSKI

You and I, we stand
On both sides of the threshold
Between Heaven and Earth
Elijah's flaming chariot
A prayer for our freedom

In our estrangement
We lose ourselves
Like slaves of the finite
Only to awaken
From moments of slumber
As visionaries
In our mind's eye

Our faith ebbs
With the waning moon
But in her fullness
We are elevated
On waves of redemption

You and I, we stand
United at the threshold
Of Moshiach's Kingdom

A tale of horror – finding a brisket at Pesach

By BRURIA LINDENBERG COOPERMAN

As winter begins to recede, Pesach moves in to occupy my thoughts. First, there's the question of who is coming and on which night. Someone once told me that the reason we have two nights of Pesach is to accommodate the various sides of the family. It keeps everybody happy. Well, as happy as we Jews can be. But Pesach also brings back the memory of my first seder as a new bride.

Having come to marriage late in life, I was finding the intricacies of running a Jewish home a bit tricky. One thing I discovered early on was the pressures women felt as each holiday approached. Many began preparing weeks before. Our cousin, Ruth, comes back from Palm Springs a month early so she can do her cooking and baking. But the key to being organized was something my husband, who had been a single father of three, had taught me. Like a mantra, he repeated that I had to absolutely, no matter what, order the kosher meat in advance.

There were, as well, those lessons I had intuitively absorbed from many years of watching my own mother. Rule #1: Nouvelle, shmoovell. Make enough food to feed no less than the thousands of Jews who escaped out of Egypt. Rule #2: Have a minimum of three starch-laden dishes. The only greenery required was on the seder plate. And Rule #3: A turkey, a veal, a prime rib. Order whatever you like. But no matter what you have, you still need to have a brisket. Just in case. I can still picture my mother in the kitchen, the night before. While peeling onions or baking her famous 36-egg sponge cake, I could see her calculating in her head how much food she would need. By the 100th count, she would turn to my father who was shlepping boxes of dishes and equipment from the basement, declaring in that not-to-be-questioned tone of voice: "Favick, just in case, you better go to Saul and get a brisket. Just in case!"

Saul, my father's best friend and the kosher butcher in Hamilton, was always there for us. However, this year, I was on my own. No problem. I had enough time to put in an order with our kosher butcher. The call began well.

"One large turkey… No large turkey? Okay, I'll take the medium. A medium-sized prime rib… No medium? Okay, I'll take the large. And give me a brisket."

Clouds began to gather overhead.

"No brisket? What do you mean no briskets? How could you run out of briskets? It's Passover. Whoever heard of Passover without a brisket?"

I couldn't believe it. Ottawa. Our nation's capital. Jews have been here since the middle of the 19th century. That's 150 years of briskets at Passover. You would think they would have gotten the hang of ordering enough briskets at Passover. And anyway, we're less than two hours from Montreal. Brisket central. It's not like we're living in the Yukon. (I know in my heart of hearts that Jews there had enough briskets for Passover.)

My husband, who had been keeping his distance during the skirmish, tried to interject a note of calm. "There'll be enough food…What are you worried about?"

Husbands! Besides not knowing how to load a dishwasher properly, they just don't get it. My identity as a newly minted Jewish mother was at stake here. I had 25 years of catching up and I was failing – dismally! My parents would be there! The kids were coming. There had to be a brisket.

Perhaps he was right. Wasn't there always more than enough food in our house? Whoever heard of a Jewish house running out of food. Every year, my mother would end the evening the same way: "Next year in Yerushalayim. We have so much food, we could have had 20 more!" I tried to convince myself it would be all right.

The next day found me at the Jewish Community Centre for a United Jewish Appeal meeting. As business wrapped up, talk naturally turned to – what else? – Pesach preparations. The committee chair mentioned she had already picked up her second order in as many weeks. My stomach tightened. I asked her, trying hard to keep it light, if perhaps she had been hoarding briskets.

"But I only bought two!" she replied plaintively.

"Dianne," I wailed, "Ottawa was only allotted four!"

We laughed, albeit nervously. We wished each other a happy holiday. Both of us left with thoughts unspoken.

Ten minutes later, in the change room, I ran into the usual regulars. After the customary pleasantries, talk turned to – yes, you guessed it – Passover. Never one to let a story go – at least to anyone willing to listen – I recounted for her, and anyone else within shouting range, my brisket dilemma. One woman, Reta, shared her own story of heartbreak.

As she had done every year for more than 20 years since moving to Ottawa, she called her usually accommodating butcher in Montreal. To her surprise, he begged her to wait until after the holidays. He could get her anything then, but not before Passover. He was in tears. "The butchers are very temperamental this time of year," he added. Feeling sorry for the man, she said it was okay. She would stick to turkey. But, she informed me in a whisper, if I still wanted a brisket, she knew where I could buy one. Last time she checked, they had some left.

I rushed home and relayed the news. My husband had learned one thing during our still fairly new marriage. It was useless to argue. I taped Post-its all over the house – down the banister, through the dining room and leading to the phone – reminding him to call early the following morning. I simply could not handle the possible rejection.

The next morning, at 7:00 a.m., with one day left, he learned that yes, a brisket was available. And yes, we could pick up the brisket that morning! But we had to come that morning… later they couldn't guarantee. Afraid this madness would continue until the High Holidays, he insisted I leave immediately. Still sleepy and in my sweats, I ran over.

I entered the shop and gave my name. The butcher disappeared through the swing doors into the back room. I waited with trepidation. I saw a familiar face. Both of us pretended we were just there casually. Seconds later, I had the brisket. No words passed. It was wrapped and bagged with no identifying marks. I paid and left.

I ran over to Loblaws to pick up my original meat order and shop for what I had missed the first two trips! I strolled, I shmoozed, catching up with people who were there for the same reason. It was a great time to catch up. I was euphoric in the knowledge I had a brisket in my trunk. I even had time for a class at the JCC – a necessity, knowing the eating that would follow in the next two days.

I spotted my husband in the exercise room.

"Did you get the brisket?" he called out.

With this, every Jewish male in the room joined in.

"You found a brisket? Today? My wife's been searching everywhere… Where did you find a brisket? Have you ever heard of such a mishigas? … How could you have a Passover with no briskets? It's a crying shame… Weeks before we tried but we couldn't get a brisket!"

Reta reappeared, happy to add to the escalating levels of pre-Pesach anxiety. There had been a brisket spotting. Minutes earlier in the change room, she had repeated my brisket woes to another member who had recently been through similar brisket tzuris. However, knowing the right people and exerting the necessary pressure, she was able to secure two briskets. She kindly volunteered to give me one. There she was. On her way home, no doubt, to cook her brisket. I went over to thank her. She regaled me with how she had procured hers.

I rushed to my exercise class, remembering again how much food would soon be ingested. While I was struggling with the equipment, there came a familiar voice from the far corner. "Bruria, I heard you had trouble getting a brisket." All hell broke loose. Everyone had a brisket tale to tell. Vu den?

"By the way," someone asked at the end of class. "How are you making the brisket?"

I froze. I had never cooked a brisket in my life!

A couple of notes:

My father informed me that in Hamilton, they ran out of kosher turkeys.

My American cousin told me that a relative on her husband's side could no longer even show his face at their kosher butcher because he had acted on behalf of the butcher's wife in their divorce.

Saul gave me a great recipe for the brisket.

From waste to clean energy

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Special to CJN

TEL AVIV — The laws of conservation of energy and mass say that energy and mass cannot be created or destroyed – they can only change form.

With the help of Russian scientists, Israeli firm Environmental Energy Resources (EER), has taken the laws of science and turned them into a useful invention for mankind – a reactor that converts radioactive, hazardous and municipal waste into inert byproducts such as glass and clean energy.

A chunk of black, lava-like rock is the result of the process invented by EER to transform radioactive waste into an inert, safe substance.

The problem of radioactive waste is a global one, and it's getting increasingly worse. All countries in the industrialized world are waking up to the need for safer hazardous waste disposal methods.

"In the beginning, nobody believed that we could do it," says Itschak Shrem, chair of investment company Shrem, Fudim and Keiner representing EER at a press briefing announcing the innovation last month in Tel Aviv.

Shrem, himself an invoker of small miracles through the founding of one of Israel's most lucrative venture capital funds, Polaris (now Pitango), points to a chunk of black, lava-like rock sitting on the table in front of everyone's coffee cups.

The journalists cautiously eye Shrem as he assures them that the shiny dark material, emitted from EER's pilot waste treatment reactor near Karmiel in the north, is safe to touch.

Judge Sam Filer

1935–2007

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judge Sam Filer will be remembered for his sense of justice, his love of family and community, and his determination.

Sam Filer

Filer, who retired from the Superior Court of Justice (formerly the District Court of Ontario) four years ago, died in a house fire on March 28.

Diagnosed 20 years ago with amyotropic lateral sclerosis (ALS), a deteriorating neuromuscular condition, Filer, 71, a native of Saskatoon, Sask., continued to serve on the bench until 2003.

Among his community activities, he was co-founder of the Canadian Committee of Lawyers and Jurists for Soviet Jewry, a national leader in the movement to free Soviet Jewry, chair of both the national civil liberties section of the Canadian Bar Association and its Ontario branch, chair of Canadian Congress, Ontario region, and a member of its national executive.

In a eulogy at the funeral service, Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, spiritual leader of Beth Torah Synagogue, told the standing room only crowd that although Filer "lived with a tangle of [medical] equipment and every moment was a challenge, he was able to speak, feel and laugh."

When Filer was diagnosed with ALS in 1987, Rabbi Sapirman said, he was given months to live, "but he ignored the probabilities and set out to live. He struggled [constantly] against death."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Jewish Museum Opens

VANCOUVER — A museum about the history of Jews in B.C. opened last week in Vancouver's Jewish community centre. The Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia takes up most of the JCC's top floor. The archives had been housed in a smaller space in the centre. The move comes a year before the 150th anniversary of the first arrival of a Jew to the province, the Vancouver Sun reported.

Deportation Sought

OTTAWA — Canada is not a haven for retired terrorists, a government lawyer said last week at a deportation hearing for a high-level ex-member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. It's not in Canada's national interest to "provide haven for retired terrorists or retired members of a terrorist organization," Justice Department lawyer Jamie Todd said in Federal Court about why Ottawa wants to deport Issam al-Yamani, one-time secretary to the head of the PFLP. Yamani, 51, has lived in Canada since 1985 and has fought a long legal battle to stay. He said he isn't "a sleeper cell or a retired terrorist," but admitted to being a PFLP member. He said it was a political association protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Ottawa designated the PFLP a terror group in 2003.

Ex-minister Honoured

TORONTO — Former defence minister Barney Danson was among six Canadian veterans of World War II who were given the honour of Chevalier in the French Legion of honour last week by France's ambassador to Canada. Daniel Jouanneau presented the award to Danson, a D-Day survivor who served in the government of prime minister Pierre Trudeau, in a ceremony at Toronto's Moss Park Armoury.

WORLD

Heschel's Wife Dies

SEATTLE — Sylvia Heschel, wife of the late theologian Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, died March 29 in New York City at 94. Born Sylvia Straus in Philadelphia and raised in Cleveland, she was a classically trained pianist who taught and performed in New York. The couple met during World War II in Cincinnati and married in 1946. She travelled widely with her husband and read over his speeches before he gave them, their daughter said.

N.A. Jewish Congress Holds First Meeting

MEXICO CITY — Members of the North American Jewish Congress (NAJC) reaffirmed links among their national groups and their shared commitment to the World Jewish Congress (WJC) agenda at an inaugural conference last week.

Representatives of the NAJC, composed of World Jewish Congress affiliates from Canadian Jewish Congress, Mexico, and the U.S. section of the WJC, met March 26 and 27 in Mexico City. They agreed to hold annual plenary meetings.

The Canadian delegation was chaired by Arlene Perly-Rae, vice-president of CJC and wife of Liberal leadership candidate and former Ontario premier Bob Rae.

"The dream has become a reality," NAJC chair Evelyn Sommer said, referring to the fact it was the first continental conference of its type. Rabbi Marc Schneier, chairman of the WJC's U.S. section, announced initiatives to support small Jewish communities in Central and Latin America.

Radler Cash Returned

HAIFA — Haifa University said last week that it returned a $75,000 (US) gift it received in 2002 from David Radler, the former deputy of accused corporate swindler Conrad Black, because of Radler's conviction on fraud charges. The money was returned to the Jerusalem Post, the newspaper that Radler, a Canadian citizen, once published, Haifa U said. Israeli media have reported that some of the cash was misappropriated from the Post's charity funds. Black is on trial in Chicago on charges he stole $84 million from the Hollinger newspaper empire he once led. Radler was convicted in connection with these charges and agreed to testify against Black in exchange for a 29-month sentence and a $250,000 fine.

Building Renovated

SEATTLE — The Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle returned to its old building last week after a shooting spree forced it out. The building has been remodelled since July 28, when a gunman killed federation worker Pam Waechter and wounded five others. The renovation includes better security, more bright, open spaces and a large picture of Waechter. The shooting site was turned into conference rooms.

Hate Crimes Spike

BERLIN — A record number of right-wing extremist crimes were reported to German police in 2006. Some 18,000 cases were reported, a 14 per cent increase over 2005, Berlin's Tagesspiegel newspaper reported. This was a marked increase from 2004 as well, when 12,553 cases were reported. Left-wing extremist crimes rose by 9 per cent to about 5,300 incidents, up from 4,898 in the previous year.

Local rabbis decry JTS move to admit gays

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Canadian rabbis expressed sadness after last week's announcement by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) – the Conservative movement's flagship institution in New York – that it will accept openly gay and lesbian students to its rabbinical and cantorial schools.

"I feel that this is an abandonment of traditional Judaism, and as such I can have no part of it," said Rabbi Wayne Allen, spiritual leader of Toronto's Beth Tikvah Synagogue and president of the Rabbinical Assembly's Ontario region, the movement's rabbinic organization.

Rabbi Wayne Allen

The move "calls into question what it is that the Conservative movement really stands for and how it defines itself and in what significant way is the movement ideologically different from our Reform colleagues," said Rabbi Steven Saltzman, spiritual leader of Adath Israel Congregation.

"It seems we have abandoned an important niche which used to act as the bridge between Orthodox and Reform. With Reform moving to the right and Orthodoxy moving to the right, our moving to the left seems to leave a huge gap, a chasm."

Their views are in line with most of the Canadian rabbis and cantors who took part in a JTS survey released earlier this year. Eighty-two per cent of them were opposed to rabbinic ordination of gays and lesbians.

In contrast, in the United States, a majority of the American rabbis and cantors who took part in the survey – 69 per cent – were in favour of the idea.

The recent JTS announcement came soon after a similar announcement by the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles. The West Coast school, which also ordains Conservative rabbis, recently admitted two openly gay students for the upcoming fall term.

However, the Masorti (Conservative) movement's Schechter Rabbinical Seminary in Jerusalem does not plan to change its admissions policy, its female dean, Rabbi Einat Ramon, announced last week.

Rabbi Howard Morrison

"Today in particular, when the traditional family is in trouble, it is especially important that we ordain modern rabbis who are devoted to this institution and identify with this worldview," Rabbi Ramon said.

The Schechter Institute will continue to accept JTS rabbinical students who go to Israel to spend a year of their studies there, a JTS spokesperson said. The Israeli school will "honour the customs" of the individual institutions they come from, she added.

In Buenos Aires, the movement's Seminario Rabínico Latinoamericano is also on record as being opposed to the rabbinic ordination of openly gay individuals.

While some people in the movement might see that as evidence of a "healthy, pluralistic, vital Conservative movement, I'm not prepared to draw that conclusion," said Rabbi Allen. "I applaud [Schechter] for making the right decision."

The changes follow a vote last December on the status of gays and lesbians by the movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards. Three responsa were accepted as valid: one that opened the door to gay rabbis and commitment ceremonies while upholding the biblical prohibition on male intercourse was

(Reprinted on the 10th yahrzeit)

They were 10 cousins. The oldest was almost 13; the youngest, almost four; eight boys, two girls. Somehow, they all seemed to fit at one end of a makeshift table that filled the entire length of the kitchen.

To a youngster seven years old, the kitchen seemed, like all kitchens, large enough to accommodate the 20 people who crowded around the table.

The Kelvinator fridge stood at one corner of the room, at the joining of the wall opposite the table perhaps 10 feet away, and the wall between the kitchen and the summer kitchen.

In fact he never did understand why that smaller room attached to the kitchen was called a summer kitchen. No one ate there at any time, let alone in the summer. It was poorly lit, damp and cold, and used mainly as a gigantic storehouse in which cans of food and other household supplies were stacked in jumbled asymmetry on home-made shelves lined with wax paper.

One walked through the summer kitchen and down the four or five wooden steps to get into the backyard, a small postcard patch of concrete and grass, the escape route to the laneway behind the house, the paradise of all playgrounds for the 10 cousins and their many friends.

At the other end of the table and around its middle sat their parents and grandparents. Grandfather sat at the head of the table. Although he was not a stern man, he had a stern bearing, probably as a result of his slow gait, his ramrod straight-backed posture and the way he spoke. Even though he was essentially deaf in one ear, he generally spoke quietly.

To a youngster of seven years old, grandfather was the embodiment of authority.

No one challenged his will; no one countermanded his instructions; no one questioned his advice; certainly not any of the grandchildren.

Sitting beside grandfather, on his right, was his son, the seven-year-old's uncle. To grandfather's left sat one of the three sons-in-law, the seven-year-old's father.

The other aunts and uncles found their places around the table. Grandmother, two of her three daughters, her son and daughter-in-law sat on the side of the table closest to the fridge, the stove, the sink, the counter and the cupboards. The seven-year-old's mother sat beside her husband.

That specific night, the cousins did not charge through the summer kitchen to get to their fantastical laneway. They spent the entire evening inside.

It was Pesach. The extended family had gathered at the bubbie's and zaide's house for the seder.

More than four decades later, when the seven-year-old was himself a parent, and he missed his own father, and he wanted to "see" again some of the images of his father as a young man, he recalled the smells and the sounds and the sights of the seders at his grandparents' home – a narrow, two-storey, semi-detached house in the "greener" immigrant neighbourhood of downtown Toronto.

How did we all fit into that kitchen? he wondered bemusedly. How did we not bump into each other whenever we tried to move? How did we have room even to bring the spoonfuls of chicken soup to our mouths without splashing the person next to us?

Though he carefully and lovingly peeled back more of the layers of his memory, he could not remember any scenes of bumping or splashing.

But the echo chambers of his mind did bring back to him the "noise" of the kitchen-dining room.

It was always more than a din and never less than a commotion. Had there been a noise-meter in the room, it would have surely been stuck between ruckus and hubbub. How could it have been otherwise? At one end of the table were the 10 young cousins; at the other end of the table were the 10 adults: grandparents and parents.

Because grandfather was essentially deaf in one ear, the adults spoke rather loudly; and because the adults spoke rather loudly, the cousins, simply to hear each other better, spoke even more loudly than their parents.

Adding colour to the volume of the sound was the cacophony of four different languages. The cousins spoke to each other in English; the adults spoke to each other in Yiddish. The adults spoke to their children in "Yiddinglish"; the children answered them in "Engliddish".

But that was only during the meal part of the seder. During the narrative of the Exodus, there was only one language: the heavily Polish-accented pronunciation of the Hebrew of the Haggadah, and there was only one sound: the familiar, comforting, sweetly melancholy tenor voice of the seven-year-old's father leading the family in the recitation of the story.

The boy never asked why his father led the recitation-singing. It seemed only natural and right. His father, after all, was a marvellous singer. He had the finest voice of anyone in the family. He loved to sing. But more important, it was obvious even to the seven-year-old, that his father needed to sing.

Many years passed before the seven-year-old was able to see the images of his young father in their truer dimension. He finally "saw" that his father, and other sole "survivors" like him, were also remembering as they sang at the seder.

His father was also searching for images of a younger past. But his memories, barely more than a decade old when his son was seven, could not comfort. They still cut him deeply, the dull edge of recollection's blade piercing his psyche and stabbing at his heart even as his sweet voice became part of the din of the seder in a new life in a new land.

Rabbinic groups endorse Yom Hashoah program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Organizers of this year's community Yom Hashoah commemoration have come up with a program that both the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR) and the Vaad Harabonim are supporting.

Last year, after about a decade of participating in the annual event, the TBR, consisting mostly of Conservative and Reform rabbis, withdrew its support and did not take part in the commemoration after organizers decided the full Renanim Youth Choir couldn't be on the program because the group had both boys and girls, including teenagers.

Organizers had invited the choir, minus its female singers, in deference to the Vaad Harabonim – the umbrella group for some 70 Orthodox rabbis – to respect the traditional prohibition against men hearing women sing (kol isha).

Morris Zbar, senior vice-president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, helped facilitate plans for the event.

By contrast, this year's event, which is scheduled for Sunday, April 15, at 11 a.m. at Earl Bales Park, will feature the children's choir of Netivot HaTorah Day School, a modern Orthodox institution that runs from nursery to Grade 8. The choir includes both boys and girls below the age of bar and bat mitzvah.

"We worked very hard... to come up with a program that was reflective of the solemnity of the day and that was acceptable to all segments of the community," said Morris Zbar, a senior vice-president of the federation. "I think the starting point was that everybody felt very strongly that if in any way we could do a community commemoration, it was important to do it."

Both the TBR and Vaad, along with about a dozen other organizations, had been longtime co-sponsors of the annual event, which is facilitated by the federation.

But this year, the structure is different, with the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Centre of Toronto serving as the two sponsoring organizations, while other groups are "participating or supporting" organizations, said Lou Greenbaum of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. He co-chairs the organizing committee with Joyce Rifkind of the Holocaust Centre.

After a series of meetings that began last September, a draft program was presented to representatives of both rabbinic organizations.

Both Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, and Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of the Vaad Harabonim, will participate in the program, which features keynote speaker Sibylle Niemoeller Von Sell, 83, a German-born baroness and resistance member whose family was involved in hiding and transporting Jews during the war.

About 12,000 Holocaust survivors live in Toronto, one of the largest proportions per capita in the world, Zbar said. "It's important that we continue to do a community commemoration. We need to make sure the next generations are aware of this."

The event began in the mid-1990s after Jehudi Kinar, then Israel's consul general in Toronto, approached the federation about organizing a community-wide event. Organizers believe it is the largest of its kind in the Diaspora: last year, almost 2,000 people attended.

Because this year's event is being held on a Sunday – the actual date of Holocaust Remembrance Day this year – Greenbaum is hopeful that even more people will be able to attend.

"It's important this year in light of the rage of anti-Semitism spreading throughout the world and the platform that the world gives to madmen like the president of Iran [who has repeatedly threatened to destroy Israel]. It's all the more important that the community come out to show their solidarity and give strength to the fact that we will not let what happened in the Shoah happen again."

Rabbi Flanzraich said he is "very happy with the way things have turned out" this year. He said that nobody from his group wanted to pull out last year, but "we felt in light of the circumstances it was a position we had to take."

When this year's draft program was brought to the TBR board, they accepted it unanimously, Rabbi Flanzraich said. Having a choir made up of both boys and girls coincides with "what we feel is a reasonable communal standard."

He said the TBR, which has about 40 members, is "proud to participate in the event, and we're very warmed by the consideration of the organizing committee. I think they did a phenomenal job given the constraints that were presented before them."

Rabbi Tradburks said he thinks it's important to have a community commemoration. He believes the program is "good. I'm satisfied with it. I think it's the right way.

"Everyone wanted to defuse this and to focus on having a rabbinic presence at this event."

Rabbi Tradburks discussed the program with colleagues but there was no Vaad vote.

"I'm very pleased that there's shalom bayit," said Greenbaum. "As a volunteer, I'm happy we can put [the issue] behind us and move forward."

New Orleans has profound effect on Jewish youth

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Gemilut chesed was in abundance from March 11 to 14.

That's when 28 student members of the B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO) and United Synagogue Youth (USY) and their group leaders helped rebuild homes destroyed by hurricane Katrina in 2005 in New Orleans.

The CJN reported on the trip before their departure on March 1.

They left unsure of what they'd find; they returned transformed.

Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder, 24, USY's regional director of youth activities, called the trip one of "the most meaningful experiences of my life."

She spent half a year planning the excursion for the Ontario teens from Ottawa, Hamilton, London and Toronto, and knows it was worth every moment.

"These students... understand that they must now educate their families, friends and communities at large about how much work is still to be done in New Orleans," Greenbaum-Shinder said.

Three days of intense manual labour, working in abandoned houses among mementos of families who they will never meet and absorbing the devastation of New Orleans has left an indelible impression upon all who were there.

Last week, five of the participants eagerly shared their experiences with The CJN in a group interview at USY's offices in Toronto.

Julie Zucker, 18, said she felt fortunate to have met one of the families and see how grateful they were to her for coming down to help and now realizes that her peers need to "make time in their lives to help others. We can do this."

Samantha Friedman, 17, recalled her group's chance meeting with a local named Darrell Clark, a homeless man down on his luck, who dispensed his own brand of wisdom and praise on the USYers.

"He wasn't even a person whose home we were working on," Friedman said. "He walked right up to us, he was drunk, but I'll never forget him."

At this, all the USYers present nodded their heads in unison and the story thread was seamlessly taken up by another.

"He told us we gave him hope to keep him sane and that he was so grateful people still cared," Rachel Szereszewski, 15, said. "And he said one line that was so simple, 'It don't cost nuthin' to be nice.'"

The phrase has since become the USYers' unofficial motto.

André Ivory and Lior Cyngiser, 27 and 28 respectively, two of the group leaders, were also deeply affected by the trip.

"I think a lot of the kids underestimated their abilities morally and physically [before the trip began]," Cyngiser said. "But at the end of the day they could say, 'I made a difference in someone's life.'"

Ivory said he's since spent a lot of time thinking about how it's no longer enough for him to "sit back and watch the news [dispassionately]. I started practising what I talk about. You have to affect change."

Students and group leaders alike all said this trip was a wake-up call for them and forced them to look at the world through a different lens.

Upon her return, Friedman was determined to continue with community service and enlisted with Habitat for Humanity to help build homes along Toronto's lakeshore.

"The first thing I did when I got home was appreciate everything I have," Szereszewski said. "I just kept telling people I love them."

"I've come back appreciating my life," Cyngiser added. "[New Orleans] was like an archeological dig... it's still deserted."

Terror victims urged to share their stories

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The only way to heal from a tragedy is to tell your story, says Sherri Mandell, whose 13-year-old son Koby was murdered by Palestinians in the West Bank in 2001.

"When you're in pain you have to reveal yourself. [That is what will] lead you to redemption. If your pain gets stuck, it can kill you," she said.

Mandell spoke March 26 in the second of a three-part series sponsored by Aish Toronto, called Triumph of the Jewish Spirit, in which speakers share how they transformed personal adversity into triumph.

Sherri Mandell

Among the ways she and her husband, Rabbi Seth Mandell, dealt with their tragedy was by creating the Koby Mandell Foundation, which runs programs, including a camp, for those who have lost family members to terrorism.

Traumatic loss feels like "fear, panic and madness," she said.

"My son was stoned to death, along with his friend Yosef Ish Ran, in a cave [near our home], and my grief was like total darkness, [as if] I was in a cave," Mandell added.

"If you don't have light, you can't get out of the cave, and that is how grief is. If there is no light, you cannot get out."

She and her husband had a lot of family support, and Mandell discovered that "giving was the only way to protect our souls. Hardly anything else mattered," she said.

"All of a sudden, life had to have a lot of meaning. I had to add Koby's life to mine, and make it more than it would have been."

People often isolate themselves after a tragedy, she said, "but they don't realize that other people have pain as well. The souls of all Jewish people are joined, and people who suffered loss are united."

It's particularly hard for children to express their grief, she noted, because their parents are often "so defeated. The kids at camp, though, have an incredible time, because we created an environment where they can talk about their feelings."

The camp offers creative therapy, Mandell said, "but the kids have become their own therapists, and they create their own programs. When they are in a safe place they can share what is happening to them."

She said that one nine-year old girl wanted to tell the story of how her mother was shot and killed by terrorists, and although her father and grandmother went to the hospital, she did not get to go. "Another stood up and said that that had happened to her as well."

The kids there were able to receive that story, Mandell said, and "there are many, many other terrible stories at camp that keep on coming. We don't want to make the situation normal, but we do want the story told."

Anyone who lives through a tragedy "has to be believe that one day they'll see the good, and that it is possible to take the pain and transform it," Mandell said.

"We want them to take the pain and [use it] to become greater than they would have been."

Time to reach out to moderate Palestinians, PC hopeful says

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

It's time for Canada to adopt "really aggressive engagement" and "straight-talking, direct diplomacy" in the Middle East, but also to reach out to moderate Palestinians, says the federal Conservative Party's candidate in Thornhill.

This country "can offer encouragement in many forms" in the strife-torn region, including engaging Israel's enemies, broadcaster Peter Kent, who was acclaimed as the Tory hopeful in Thornhill last month, told a small audience recently at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

"Now is not the time for Canada to back away" from its responsibilities to Israel, Kent said in a loosely structured breakfast talk sponsored by the congregation's brotherhood.

He said he's "not suggesting appeasement, but we've got to talk to Syria and Iran."

At the same time, Canada must "isolate" militant Palestinian factions, and "I think we need to speak up on Lebanon, which has been completely hijacked by Hezbollah."

As well, Canada "can't give up on the Palestinian population. We have to somehow – and I certainly have no answer – find some way of sending messages to those in the Palestinian population who are amenable to contacts, a negotiated peace and peaceful coexistence."

He acknowledged that the task is "daunting," given a poll he cited that suggested 75 per cent of Palestinians endorse suicide attacks against Israel.

(That's in contrast to a recent opinion poll by a Ramallah-based firm that showed 68 per cent of Palestinians favour peace with Israel.)

After Quebec's election

Canadians who care about Canada have reason to be fairly satisfied with the results of last week's provincial election in Quebec. The federalist premier, Jean Charest, won, even if only by a slim margin, and the separatist Parti Québécois, led by Andre Boisclair, was dealt a stunning blow. In its worst performance in 37 years, the PQ picked up 36 seats, finishing in third position behind Mario Dumont's Action Démocratique du Québec, which now takes its place as the official opposition party in the legislature.

The news out of Quebec is promising because Quebecers seem to have repudiated the sovereigntist dreams of Boisclair's party, which has needlessly subjected Canada to two referendums on separation since 1980 and still harbours visions of breaking up this wonderful country.

Andre Boisclair

Boisclair, a realist, accepted his crushing defeat with equanimity. "In the short term, sovereignty is impossible," he said in the immediate aftermath of the election. "It is clear that we have to change our platform." Only in the weeks and months to come will we know whether the PQ is still dogmatically wedded to separatism.

Jean Charest

The question that should concern us at this moment is where Dumont stands with respect to sovereignty. Dumont, a Quebec nationalist like Boisclair, appears opposed to more referendums. But as he warned just a day after the election, he is hardly an unequivocal partisan of federalism. Dumont, in fact, calls himself an "autonomist" who seeks a partnership with Canada in which Quebec's vital interests are never ignored or minimized.

Mario Dumont

"He incarnates a nationalism that isn't sovereigntist," says University of Sherbrooke political scientist Jean-Herman Guay. "It's a nationalism that wants to see Quebec preserve its powers but not necessarily break away from Canada. It's a more prudent kind of nationalism."

Quebec, like any other province, has a right to bargain for a better deal within Canada. And certainly, the desire of French Quebecers to preserve their linguistic and cultural traditions is understood by the rest of Canadians. Canada, after all, is a mosaic of ethnic and religious groups, all united in their fealty to an indivisible nation.

Although Dumont identifies himself neither as a federalist nor as a sovereigntist, we hope that he never forgets that Quebec is an integral part of Canada, and that separatism is simply not an option, neither today nor tomorrow.

The PLO was being blamed for a spate of terrorist activity in Europe, including one incident in which a diplomat at the Israeli embassy in Paris was shot to death in his apartment building. In addition, three masked gunmen strafed an Israeli embassy building in Paris, several Jewish-owned shops were bombed in Rome, and a bomb was found outside El Al's offices in Rome. There were no casualties in the latter incidents.

CJC not moribund

As a longtime reader of The CJN, had I not known the paper better I would have thought your headline writers were up to mischief.

I refer to a headline given to the article by Harold Waller, "Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past,'" (Perspectives, March 15). Thankfully, I remain one of those rare breeds that read such articles in full. If I hadn't, I would have been left with an entirely wrong understanding. The article, in a nutshell, addressed the new advocacy approach undertaken by the Canadian Jewish Congress to better represent the community. And while it is clear in the article that the large budgets and days when CJC was separate and apart from federations are over, no one should conclude that CJC is moribund. The headline sadly leaves such an impression.

CJC continues to represent me and all Canadian Jews with gusto and determination. Its lay leaders and professionals have spoken out forcefully and with great dignity on issues of importance to Canadian Jewry. Clearly, The CJN made an error in judgment with this headline. It owes the CJC an apology.

Easy to be an armchair critic

Letter writer Wayne Levin seems not to have grasped that the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is a charitable organization that does incredible work overseeing the needs of Toronto's vast Jewish community ("Jewish organizations not representative," CJN, March 29). It is not an advocacy agency that falls under the rubric of Canadian Jewish Congress. And contrary to a number of articles in The CJN over the past few weeks by Harold M. Waller that wrong-headedly target CJC for being less than it once was, CJC honours our community with its steady focus on the issues that concern us. Whether it is the Ernst Zundels of this world or the new terror of Internet hate, it is always CJC that seems to be leading our charge.

It's easy to be an armchair critic and make noise, as does Waller about CJC's so-called "glory days" ("Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past,'" Perspectives, March 15), or, as in Levin's case, harshly criticize Jewish organizations that work for amcha. Our community owes a debt of gratitude to the selfless efforts of our Jewish communal professionals and volunteers. In my view, the glory days of the CJC and UJA Federation are just beginning.

They were left behind

The current campaign that has scores of billboards in Toronto with the slogan, "We do not leave our sons behind," is most upsetting, frustrating and untrue. If we did not leave them behind, where are they? What is the point of these ads? Is this some sarcastic comment by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto? The fact is they were left behind. Yes, Israel is trying to get them back, but it decided to end the conflict without their return being negotiated.

I know that we as a community are all heartbroken by the fact that these brave souls had to be sacrificed for the greater peace, but the fact remains that to this point in time, they have been sacrificed, they are still held by the enemy and they have been left behind. We are all aware that Israel is doing all it can for their release. Yes, with God's help they will come home alive, but they were left behind.

I cannot understand the purpose of these ads. If they were meant to unite the community, then why not speak to the fact we will not rest until they are brought home. Do not delude us with this twisting of the facts.

Passover greetings from the prime minister

It is with great pleasure that I extend my personal greetings to the Jewish community as you observe Pesach.

Pesach is a celebration of freedom and renewal, marking the birth of the Jewish nation and the Exodus of the people of Israel from Egypt over 3,000 years ago. As you come together to mark this key event in history, the emancipation of the Jewish people from bondage, the Haggadah tells of the courage and determination of the Jewish people to overcome oppression through courage, determination and the power of faith. These teachings have resonance for all Canadians, whatever their faith or background, as we strive to establish peace and understanding at home and around the world.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, I would like to extend my sincere appreciation to the Jewish people of Canada for the many contributions they have made to our country throughout the years. May you enjoy a happy and peaceful Pesach. Chag Samayach!

Stephen Harper
Prime Minister of Canada

Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel: theologian and crossover artist

By RABBI BARUCH FRYDMAN-KOHL

Dreamgirls tells the story of the Supremes and of their crossover from black to mainstream music. Similarly, Bob Dylan fused bluegrass and folk and Yo Yo Ma brought together European classical and Chinese music. James Rudin has observed that Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, who was born 100 years ago (on Jan. 11, 1907), was also a "crossover phenomenon."

Born into the chassidic world of pre-World War I Warsaw, Avraham Yehoshua Heschel was named for a famous ancestor, the great Opter Rav. Because of marriage patterns within chassidic dynasties – which resembled the arrangements of European royal courts – Rabbi Heschel was related to nearly all the great chassidic teachers of eastern Europe.

After a traditional rabbinic education that included rabbinic ordination while still in his teens, Rabbi Heschel "crossed over" to study secular subjects in a Vilna gymnasium (academic high school). He was also among a number of significant eastern European intellectuals of Orthodox background who went to Berlin to pursue academic studies. He enrolled in the progressive German rabbinical school, Hochschule for the Academic Study of Judaism, while also maintaining a bridge to the more traditional community by sustaining friendships at the frum Hildesheimer seminary.

While at the University of Berlin, Rabbi Heschel maintained a traditional life, writing later of being overwhelmed by a sunset and the awareness of the time to recite Minchah, the afternoon prayer. In Berlin, he studied subjects that were seemingly distant from his chassidic background – philosophy, art history and ancient Semitics – earning his doctorate after the Nazis had already come to power. His thesis was a study of the prophetic consciousness. It fused biblical studies with the insights of philosophical phenomenology.

In the 1930s, Rabbi Heschel began to publish in both academic and popular circles. In addition to his thesis, he published a book of Yiddish poetry (The Sacred Name: Mentsch/Human). He composed scholarly studies in medieval Jewish philosophy, and popular books on Maimonides and Abravanel. He also taught in the Lehrhaus, an institute for adult Jewish education founded by Martin Buber and Franz Rosenzweig.

In his writing, he sought to show that the intellectual achievements of these great thinkers were linked to their inner, personal struggles. His popular writing during that period tried to stimulate inner spiritual development in German Jewry and to provide support and encouragement to a community facing dislocation and despair.

Because of the growth and danger of Nazism, Rabbi Heschel sought a secure way out of Germany, but at the end of 1938, he was suddenly deported as a Polish national. For a short time thereafter, he taught in Warsaw. Rabbi Heschel would likely have died in the Holocaust were it not for Julian Morgenstern of Hebrew Union College (HUC). Morgenstern begged the U.S. State Department for immigration papers for European Jewish scholars. Among the five visas he managed to secure was one for Rabbi Heschel.

Rabbi Heschel came to America via England, crossing over in March 1940. He came to HUC, the Reform seminary in Cincinnati, as an instructor in Hebrew. In this radically different environment, Heschel maintained kashrut in a student dormitory; wrote significant scholarly essays; and unsuccessfully sought to save family members from Hitler's hatred. During this period, he added English to his existing repertoire of Yiddish, Hebrew, Polish and German. The poetic quality of each of his languages is extraordinary.

But Rabbi Heschel was uncomfortable at HUC, which minimized Jewish law and tradition. In 1945, he made another crossover, this time to the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York City, where Rabbi Louis Finkelstein wanted him to serve as a counter-balance to the school's most influential professor, Rabbi Mordecai Kaplan.

Although now in a more traditional environment, Rabbi Heschel's interests in Jewish ethics and mysticism were often denigrated by the seminary's powerful talmudists. Nonetheless, his ability to synthesize traditional Jewish knowledge with the modern world gained him international acclaim. I came to JTS to study with Rabbi Heschel because he had something important to say about Judaism and to the world.

What was so significant about this Warsaw-born rabbi?

Rabbi Heschel creatively crossed the boundaries that usually separate intellectual achievement and spiritual leadership. He wanted to understand how teachers of the past faced the universal and Jewish challenges that vexed his own soul.

In the 1930s, Rabbi Heschel wrote of the "inner wrestling" of Maimonides, and in the 1940s, he described Saadia Gaon's search for self-understanding. "We should not regard them as mirrors, reflecting other people's problems, but rather as windows, allowing us to view the author's soul," he wrote. In his last work – in Yiddish with an English version titled Passion for Truth – he wrote of his own struggle to balance the inclusive compassion of the founder of chassidism, Yisrael Baal Shem Tov, with the elitist demand for integrity of Menachem Mendel of Kotsk, one of the later chassidic masters.

Rabbi Heschel had scholarly imagination and the rare capacity to link his immense erudition to life. In the early 1960s, he completed an English-language revision of his thesis on the prophets. In a TV interview shortly before his death, he observed, "This book changed my life. Early in my life, my great love was for learning, studying. And the place where I preferred to live was my study and books and writing and thinking. I've learned from the prophets that I have to be involved in the affairs of man, in the affairs of suffering man."

He translated the passion of the prophets into decades of activism for social justice. At a conference convened by the National Conference of Christians and Jews, Rabbi Heschel, using language reminiscent of rabbinic midrash, said that "it was far easier for the children of Israel to cross the Red Sea" than for blacks "to cross certain university campuses." For him, the themes of the Exodus were not simply to be told at the Passover meal. They were to be brought into the real life of the nation.

In June 1963, he told U.S. president John F. Kennedy that the quest for racial justice called for "moral grandeur and spiritual audacity." Called by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., on erev Shabbat, Rabbi Heschel flew to Alabama on Saturday night to join the march from Selma to Montgomery. Discussing how he experienced that event, he said, "I felt my legs were praying."

Rabbi Heschel also crossed the divide that separated Jews and Christians. During the Second Vatican Council (1962-1965), Rabbi Heschel would secretly leave the seminary to fly to Rome for meetings in the Vatican. He met Pope Paul VI and helped pave the way for the historic declaration that forever changed Catholic-Jewish relations. It was Rabbi Heschel who persuaded the pope to remove a proposed paragraph that referred to converting Jews to Christianity.

Rabbi Heschel was also an early supporter of the movement to free Soviet Jewry, and as a founder of Clergy and Laity Concerned, he was a significant opponent of the Vietnam War. Just prior to his death, he angered many when he said that it offered the United States the choice between "losing face or losing our souls."

At the seminary, Rabbi Heschel extended the borders of what had, until then, served as the primary models for Jewish theological study. He didn't simply present historical accounts of what important Jewish thinkers of the past had written about Judaism, nor did he adopt the method of presenting an interpretation of Judaism based on existing models of philosophical or social thought. Instead, he explored basic experiences of people, drew deeply from Jewish sources, and presented an alternative way of thinking about reality and religion.

In the 1950s, he wrote Man is Not Alone, Man's Quest for God and God in Search of Man. He wanted to identify the categories of thought by which religion in general and Judaism, in its specificity, might understand itself "in terms of its own spirit." Rabbi Heschel argued that religious thought is a unique way of thinking and should not be reduced to sociology, psychology or philosophy.

Religion should not seek to make someone comfortable with oneself or one's society. Authentic religion "begins as a breaking off, a going away. It continues in acts of non-conformity to idolatry." Unfortunately, as Rabbi Heschel pointed out, religious life is in decline in contemporary society. He argued that it "declined not because it was refuted, but because it became irrelevant, dull, oppressive, insipid. When faith is completely replaced by creed, worship by discipline, love by habit; when the crisis of today is ignored because of the splendour of the past; when faith becomes an heirloom rather than a living fountain; when religion speaks only in the name of authority rather than with the voice of compassion, its message becomes meaningless."

Seeking a way out of this "religious behaviourism," Rabbi Heschel developed what he called "depth theology," which describes a search for the wonder and radical self-amazement that preceded theological speculation and the development of dogma. Depth theology is concerned with the pre-reflective ineffable moment of inwardness in which the human and the divine encounter each other. It warns against intellectual arrogance and challenges us to correlate theological pronouncements with the core of our human experience, to "nurse the song in the recesses of the soul." In response to the primary experience of wonder, religious ideas point toward something beyond themselves, to the realm of the ineffable.

Rabbi Heschel sees paradox as a way of comprehending religious existence. He writes of the polarity between depth theology and theology, faith and creed, doubt and belief, event and idea, prayers of expression and of empathy, regularity and spontaneity, thought and deed. "Paradox is an essential way of understanding the world, history and nature. Strife, tension, contradiction characterize all of reality… There is a polarity in everything except God. For all tension ends in God. He is beyond all dichotomies."

In his great Hebrew language work on rabbinic theology (recently translated as Heavenly Torah: As Refracted Through the Generations), Rabbi Heschel argues against a unitary model of Judaism. He explores the tension in Jewish thought between the poetic, mystical approach of Rabbi Akiva and the rational, contextual method of Rabbi Yishmael. He contends that this polarity is responsible for the vibrancy of Judaism, lies at the root of various human efforts to comprehend reality, and reflects the dynamic difference between the infinite God and the finite human being.

Rejecting the modern idea that religion is for human benefit, Rabbi Heschel contended that a biblical view is theocentric: all life stems from and leads toward God. He identifies three paths to God: the Bible, with its midrashic record of the event of revelation; the natural world, whose wondrous manifestations lead to radical amazement; and sacred deeds, when "by doing the finite we attain the infinite." In the first two, God calls out to the human; in the latter, humans respond to the call.

For Rabbi Heschel, Judaism begins with "the awareness of God's interest in man, the awareness of a covenant, of a responsibility that lies on Him as well as on us. Our task is to concur… to carry out… [this] vision." The response of faith is a lifelong challenge to find "meaning beyond mystery." That quest dignifies human existence.

How is that faithful struggle expressed? Drawing upon late-15th-century philosophers, Rabbi Heschel wrote that sacred action, mitzvah, helps us to do more than we can understand. "What cannot be grasped in reflection, we comprehend in deeds." Reflecting a chassidic insight, Heschel contended that each mitzvah we do is "a prayer in the form of a deed." Our acts "must be carried out as variations on the theme of prayer." Prayer bridges the gap between God and the human. It offers us the opportunity "to dream in league with God." Prayer may begin as an exercise in self-understanding, but it should lead to transcending the self and to discovering the self in relation to God.

That new perspective enables us to discern what is truly significant in life and to identify with those deeper and truer aspirations. Prayer moves us from asking of God to discerning the demands of the divine upon us. When we see ourselves as representatives and witnesses of God, we realize our true vocation and understand what it means to be "in the divine image."

The biblical Abraham was called ivri, one who "crossed over" from the polytheism of Haran to the land of Israel and to a monotheistic faith. Rabbi Heschel was a contemporary crossover artist who came from prewar Europe to speak to a post-Holocaust world. He taught and embodied an authentic vision of Torah that bridged the intellectual, social and theological gaps that plague contemporary human society. He was an exemplary individual whose life mastery of philosophy, Kabbalah, chassidic thought and Jewish mysticism was linked to an esteem for the biblical prophets, a love for the State of Israel, and a reverence for all people. His moral grandeur and spiritual audacity enabled him to become the person Jacob Neusner calls "the most profound and weighty theologian of Judaism ever to work in North America."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl holds the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Chair in rabbinics at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Neutralize anti-Zionism on Campus

In my last column (CJN, March 15), I reported on a recent series of anti-Zionist programs at McMaster University. In and of themselves, such events are disturbing. But if we reflect as well on reported incidents, on this same campus, of anti-Israel content in the teaching material of some professors, we have the makings of an even less friendly environment for Jewish students.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

The question then arises as to what should be done about all of this and by whom. As with any university, McMaster has procedures that can be invoked when students feel threatened by any aspect of their campus experience. Appeals through the university's human rights and equity services and the Ombudsman's Office have met with mixed results in cases where curriculum or teaching practices are the issue.

By contrast, when it comes to public lectures, either by local academics or outside speakers, the process becomes less accommodating. "Freedom of speech" seems to always trump reason as the rather destitute reaction to any complaints about such imposters.

So it's inevitably left to the Jewish students and those who support them to deal with these situations. The problem in Hamilton, shared presumably by other smaller centres, is that the Jewish Student Association (JSA), though active and effective in promoting many other aspects of Jewish life on campus, lacks a critical mass of political activists to ably counter pedlars of anti-Zionism and those who turn out to applaud them.

Add to this Jewish faculty members and a majority of the mainstream community who are either unaware of what's going on or tend not to want to engage in anything confrontational – least of all on campus – and what you end up with is a perception of indifference, even weakness, that merely emboldens our adversaries.

This should not imply that there has been no response to the Israel-bashers – there has. However, the general strategy has been deliberately low key and invariably reactive.

What's clearly needed is a different approach, an approach that demonstrates strength and conviction, and more vigorously communicates pro-Israel positions and perspectives. Programs that seek to demonize Israel need to be pre-empted and neutralized.

To make this happen at McMaster will require co-ordination and goodwill. The JSA needs to be more proactive, determine precisely what it wants to do, and create a structure for meeting its objectives. Faculty need to understand that it's time for them to stand side by side with their students, and the Jewish community at large needs to play a much greater role in facilitating and funding campus initiatives that promote a true and positive image of Jews and Israel. Reticence is not an option.

Olmert needs a clear plan

A year after last year's elections, it's safe to say that Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's policy is off track. The most blatant expression of this is Israel's diplomatic holding action against the Palestinian national unity government. Once again, foreign statesmen who meet with senior Hamas members are being boycotted, and once again we are pulling out a magnifying glass to identify these statesmen. That is the sum total of Olmert and his government's diplomatic creativity.

Aluf Benn in Jerusalem

Olmert complains that the public is turning its back on him while he is working hard to run the country. He should be reminded that leadership is not measured by the length of one's work day, but by one's ability to indicate a direction and a path, to present goals and to fulfil them.

With all due respect to Olmert's diligence and knowledge of details, an effort that lacks a goal has no value. And to borrow a soccer metaphor, the best team in the world is not worth anything if it doesn't kick toward the goal.

Olmert was elected for one purpose: to guarantee a "stable and solid" Jewish majority in the State of Israel, achieved through withdrawal from most of the West Bank. "A division of the country to guarantee a Jewish majority is the lifeline of Zionism," he declared when his government was sworn in. "I know how difficult it is, but with all my heart I am convinced this act is essential."

Now we should ask what exactly Olmert and his government have done to reach this goal. In what way has his policy toward the Palestinians contributed to saving Zionism from a demographic decline that will turn the Jews into a minority in their own country?

Olmert boasts of his success in assembling an international front against Hamas. He justifies the claim with unproductive talks with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and the rejection of the army's proposals to invade Gaza. The government says "absolutely not" to negotiations for a final status agreement, and under the cover of a diplomatic smokescreen, it continues to build the separation fence and expand settlement blocs. When we add to that list the excavations at the Mugrabi Gate, the taking over of a new house in Hebron and the failure to evacuate illegal outposts, the disappointment increases.

It's hard to translate Olmert's decisions and deeds into a clear message that the public can understand and identify with. Everything looks like a collection of tactics that fail to form a strategy.

The Israeli public, which gave Olmert and his party limited credit even in the elections, sees the confusion at the top and is reacting with disapproval, as evidenced by the polls. Olmert is unpopular not as a result of poor public relations, as he claims, but rather because of his lack of a compass.

Israelis want to understand where he is leading them, if at all. What does he want to achieve? Has he given up the division of the country in favour of a renewed partnership with right-wing nationalists? Is Israel on the way to another war in the territories? Have the demographics changed? Has the threat to Zionism been removed?

The prime minister's office now wants more credit. Let him get through Winograd and then you'll see, they say. They say Olmert genuinely wanted to promote a diplomatic move, but Abbas betrayed him by entering into a unity agreement with Hamas.

They are asking for time to formulate an alternative plan. They suggest that Olmert's cautious policy toward the Palestinians is helping consolidate an international front against Iran. They remind us that former prime minister Ariel Sharon also spent some time in office before finding a direction and a path.

Olmert's problem is that given the failure in Lebanon and the widespread scandals and corruption among the country's leadership, it's hard for him to convince anyone he still has some cards up his sleeve. His heroic battle to save his place may be a good script for a soap opera, but it's not a national policy. The time has come for him to say where we are going and not to give the public excuses for what was. The time has come for him to say how we can promote the worthy goal of saving Zionism, which he posited when he came to power. If he has given up on it, he should say so and resign.

But if the demographic danger is still threatening Israel, Olmert must show how he will stop it in the time his government has left. If he continues to hesitate, he will go down in history as a footnote who spent time on the job between a failed war and serial investigations.

These wicked sons would still be slaves

In Jewish homes around the world, the story of Passover is re-enacted every year, and every person is supposed to act as if he or she is leaving Egypt and embarking on the dramatic march from slavery to freedom.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The narrative begins with the descent into suffering and bondage, and ends (usually many hours later) with the triumphal pledge to rebuild Jerusalem "next year." In the good years, and in the more comfortable and secure communities, the effort to identity with the feelings of slaves who are suddenly freed to run their own lives can be very challenging. And in times of persecution and suffering, the hope of freedom is more difficult to sustain.

Despite the threats that we continue to face – from terror, hate-filled boycotts and UN resolutions, and Iran – we have the privilege of living as a free people for the first time in 2,000 years. As Jews, we are free to determine our fate, to elect our leaders (for better or worse), to defend ourselves, to make mistakes and, hopefully, to learn from them for next year.

This freedom is not based on individual independence – 4,000 years ago, the Children of Israel did not leave Egypt one at a time – but rather as a collective national and religious group. In the Jewish tradition, and in contrast to western liberal culture, freedom is based on the community as a whole, as are slavery and the racial and religious hatred embodied in anti-Semitism. We are free as individuals because we are part of a free nation, with the accompanying rights and obligations.

And by the same token, the greatest dangers that we face are not military, but from the threat of delegitimizing and undermining the right of the Jewish people to sovereign equality among the nations of the world. This is the real goal of the flood of denunciations and condemnations issued by the United Nations, false human rights groups, and other organizations with an anti-Israel and anti-Jewish agenda.

And at the same time, not all Jews are capable of enjoying this freedom, as was the case 4,000 years ago. After the Exodus, some individuals whined about the material conditions in the desert – they were always thirsty, and the food was not as tasty as what the Egyptians gave them as slaves. These complainers pressed Moses to turn around and take them back to the security of Egypt and slavery. They couldn't handle the pressures of freedom and responsibility.

Had they lived today, they would have been part of the small numbers of Jews and Israelis who oppose the existence of an independent and free Jewish State in the Land of Israel. They would have joined demonstrations and signed petitions condemning Israel for acting in self-defence, and demonized the response to Palestinian and Hezbollah terror attacks. Today, this tiny minority of anti-Israel Jews and Israelis make a good living by heading human rights NGOs and by appearing on platforms and university campuses around the world condemning Israel for alleged human rights violations.

In their eagerness to escape from freedom and the collective responsibilities that this entails, they join campaigns to erase or rewrite Jewish history, promoting assimilation and denying the central value of freedom. This group benefits from being exploited in order to legitimize the other non-Jewish voices calling for the destruction of the Israeli "apartheid state."

The British and Australian individuals who recently referred to themselves as "independent Jewish voices," such as the playwright Harold Pinter, have no Jewish identity other than denouncing Israel. Like the wicked son, they have separated themselves from the community, and had they been in Egypt at the time of the Exodus, they would have stayed behind, enjoying a short-lived notoriety, and without knowing the exhilaration of freedom.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Guangzhou

Francis Chow could not have put it better. "China," he said in no uncertain terms, "is one big construction site." And he should know. An engineer who once lived in Toronto before moving back to Hong Kong, he has worked on numerous projects in China, whose red-hot economy is the envy of the world, and possesses an insider's knowledge of this fast-developing country.

Sheldon Kirshner in China

I met him in a train bound from Hong Kong to Guangzhou, a distance of about 180 kilometres. The capital city of Guangdong province, one of the richest in China, Guangzhou was formerly known as Canton. It is the commercial gateway to China, was the seat of three Chinese dynasties, is the ancestral home of many overseas Chinese, is the bastion of Cantonese cuisine, and was the first city in Communist China to open itself to capitalism following the introduction of seminal, dogma-busting economic reforms in the late 1970s.

Chow, an amiable person, began talking to me after noticing my Canadian passport. Before I knew it, we were immersed in a lively conversation touching on Canada and China, a nation on the march. As we delved deeper into these respective topics, Chow casually mentioned that Jewish businessmen and entrepreneurs have been in the vanguard of the western push to invest in China, whose economy has expanded by about 10 per cent per year since the advent of Deng Xiaoping's daring and unorthodox market reforms.

Later that day, I met David Buxbaum in the boardroom of his office on the 39th floor of the appropriately named Profit Plaza in downtown Guangzhou. A 73-year-old New York-born lawyer who holds an MA and PhD in Chinese law, Buxbaum has resided in mainland China since 1972. One of the first western Jews to settle in Guangzhou on what turned out to be a more or less permanent basis, Buxbaum has helped foreign companies and individuals set up shop in Guangzhou and Guangdong, whose booming economy depends on manufacturing and exports (garments and textiles, electronic products and toys, among other things) and has close trading ties with Hong Kong.

The fact that Guangdong, facing the South China Sea, contributes approximately 12 per cent of China's total economic output has not been lost on Israel. Two months ago, during a state visit to China, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced that Israel intends to open a consulate in Guangzhou, which has a population of at least seven million and which, in the 17th century, was the first Chinese city to allow western merchants to establish a foothold. Long before that, intrepid Jewish traders from Central Asia, Persia and India entered China via the Silk Route, and some of them established a permanent community in Kaifeng, which lasted until the late 19th century.

Buxbaum – an observant Jew who wears a small black yarmulke, sports a Confucious-style wispy beard and arrived in China during the tumultuous Cultural Revolution – said that Jews have been an important factor in opening up China to a market economy. "China is generally aware of this, and is reasonably well disposed to Jews," said Buxbaum, who works for Anderson & Anderson, one of about five foreign law firms operating in Guangzhou, which, along with the prosperous cities of Shenzhen, Zhuhai and Dongguan, lies in the Pearl River Delta region, the powerhouse of China's economy.

Indeed, Buxbaum settled in Guangzhou precisely because he believed that it would be one of the primary engines of China's new economy. "It's a dynamic place. Its exports far exceed those of Shanghai. And the people here are more entrepreneurial than anywhere else in China."

Buxbaum, who fielded calls as I interviewed him, did not gravitate to China out of any sympathy to Communism. "I've been a right-winger all my life," he declared without the slightest twinge of equivocation. "I've never been sympathetic to left-wing politics, and neither am I today." As he said this, he chuckled heartily.

When Buxbaum arrived in Guangzhou – which was home to a colony of Arab traders before the arrival of the Portuguese in the 16th century and the British in the 17th century – it was still something of a backwater. With the formation of the People's Republic of China in 1949, Guangzhou slid into obscurity and near irrelevance, playing nowhere near the role it had played for hundreds of years.

By the mid-18th century, Guangzhou was one of the greatest ports in Asia, renowned for its exports of tea, silk, porcelain, lacquer screens, ivory fans and other luxury goods. By imperial decree, China's external trade was restricted to Guangzhou. Foreigners lived in sumptuous homes in Shamian, a small island on the Pearl River. Under the Treaty of Nanking, which was signed in 1842 in the wake of the first Opium War, Guangzhou became one of only five Chinese cities open to western traders.

David Buxbaum

Throughout the 19th century, common labourers from Guangdong immigrated to Canada and the United States as railway workers. Often arriving on coolie ships, and comprising the nucleus of Chinese communities in North America, they introduced the delights of Cantonese food to generations of Canadians and Americans.

Sun Yat-sen, the first president of the Republic of China after the fall of the Qing dynasty in 1911, was born in a village south of Guangzhou. As the Republic of China gave way to the People's Republic, Guangzhou's importance declined.

When Buxbaum set foot in Guangzhou, shortly after then-U.S. president Richard Nixon and national security advisor Henry Kissinger suddenly showed up in China in a geo-politically trailblazing trip, the city was caught up in the Cultural Revolution.

"China was a national prison, a country in chains," said Buxbaum, who speaks Mandarin and Cantonese fluently. But he had faith in China's ability to recover from Western colonialism and self-inflicted blows. "I always thought China would be an important country, and I assumed it would be important again."

During his first few years there, China remained impoverished, held back by the dead hand of a centrally planned economy and by the misplaced preconceptions of leaders such as Mao Zedong. "It was hard," said Buxbaum, who represented several American and Canadian companies at the annual Canton Fair, dispensed advice on the banking system and served as an interpreter.

Thanks to the liberal reforms promoted by Deng Xiaoping, China's leader after Mao's passing, China modernized itself. Market forces were unleashed in special economic zones such as Guangzhou and Shenzhen, which is only an hour's journey by train from Hong Kong.

According to Buxbaum, almost 1,000 Jews, the majority involved in the increasingly lucrative China trade, currently live in Guangzhou, a bustling city whose skyline has been ineluctably transformed by a phalanx of skyscrapers. Due to this influx of Jewish businessmen, Chabad Lubavitch is quite active in Guangzhou.

The modern face of Guangzhou

Looking ahead, Buxbaum expressed confidence that China, in tandem with India, will be a very powerful player on the world economic stage in the years to come.

Yet China's continued performance as an Asian "tiger" hinges on its political stability and its ability to eradicate widespread corruption, he suggested. Buxbaum added that China's economy would doubtless stand to benefit by a flowering of democracy. "China is ready for democracy on a step-by-step basis," he noted. China's great leap forward is clearly dependent on these interrelated factors.

Former Ontario judge dies in house fire

Speaking of Filer's wife, Toni Silberman, who cared for him at home throughout his illness, Rabbi Sapirman said that "love kept Sam alive – love of the purest kind, for love's sake. He was a father, a mentor, a leader and a lover of Israel – love carried him.

"You must carry his legacy forward. He will give you strength and guide you in the most difficult days."

Silberman said her husband would have loved the crowd, because he enjoyed being surrounded by family and friends.

"Who could question the love he had for his family. He sat with rapt attention and pride while [our daughter] Jaime shared her life with him, during her bat mitzvah, and during the weddings of his children. Love and joy [always] emanated from his eyes.

"His eyes were the window to his world, and they provided us with the window to his soul."

She never knew anyone who loved so unconditionally and was loved so universally, she said.

"The strength of Sam's survival instincts were independent of me. I was compelled to take whatever measures were necessary to ensure he had more of life to cling to," Silberman said.

"We have lost so much, but we have gained so much."

Also speaking at the funeral, Patrick LeSage, former chief justice of the Superior Court of Justice, said that Filer was the epitome of human spirit and human courage.

"He was as astute, aware, caring and wise after he [fell ill] as before. I can attest that he remained bright, alert, witty and up to date in national and international events."

During his period of ill health, LeSage said, Filer presided in Brampton, and had a reputation among the staff, other lawyers and litigants for being fair, diligent, thoughtful and compassionate.

"Sam was a model and a beacon for us all," he said.

Bernie Farber, chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, said in a phone interview that Filer was considered by CJC to be one of the most ethical, frank straightshooters that ever occupied one of its chairs.

"He understood community values and was able to translate the importance of Jewish values to the general community," Farber said.

Moshe Ronen, a past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, was a student activist when Filer was Ontario region chair.

"To people like me, Sam was a friend and a supporter. He was one of the few who supported [us]. He reached out and built bridges with the activists on campus, and went to bat for us when we wanted to take a different kind of approach."

> 'Sam was a model and a beacon for us all'

Donald Carr, a lawyer and president of The Canadian Jewish News, was the last recipient of the Sam Filer Distinguished Service Award, given to a deserving Congress leader or other person from Jewish community leadership.

He said that when Filer was active, "he was a stalwart in Ontario and nationally. I have no doubt he would have become [national] president at a time when CJC was truly representative of the Jewish community.

"He was devoted, selfless, bright as could be and took matters to heart."

He said that a good part of the time he was a judge, Filer was taken to the office daily, and he dealt with ex parte applications to court, that is, for proceedings where one of the parties is neither present nor represented.

"As his condition worsened, he 'spoke' through a computer, and he would blink his eyes to indicate yes or no."

Carr's wife, Judy Feld Carr, who was friends with Filer and Silberman personally and through their community work, said of him, "Israel was his love, and when he became ill, he worried about not going back."

Filer came to their daughter's wedding on a stretcher, she said, "because he didn't want to miss anything.

"He had a greed for living, and Toni supplemented it. She was his pillar of strength. I can only say I stand in awe of them."

In a speech Silberman read for her husband in 1995 during the kick-off of Toronto's National Action Awareness Week, he said, "My personal credo is, there are those who would sit and curse the darkness rather than light a candle. I thank all those who helped me light the candle and keep it lit."

In addition to Silberman and daughter Jaime, Filer was father and father-in-law to Michael and Esther, Rob and Marnie Fegan, and Rob and April. His grandchildren are Ian, Jack, Andrew, Rylan, Parker, Violet, Alexandra and Joshua.

Genocide starts with bullying, Coloroso says

Parenting expert says they both share the dehumanization of victims and a routinization of cruelty

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ask parenting expert Barbara Coloroso if writing a book about genocide is a giant leap for her, and she'll immediately say "no."

Speaking about her new book, Extraordinary Evil: A Brief History of Genocide, Coloroso, author of such books as Kids are Worth It, Parenting Through Crisis, and The Bully, the Bullied and the Bystander, said it's "actually a short walk from bullying to hate crimes to genocide."

A former Franciscan nun, and mother of three, Coloroso, 58, will speak about her new book on April 17 at Beth Tzedec Congregation at an evening sponsored by the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's parent association.

Other sponsors include Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies, Hillel of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, and federation's Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage.

In a phone interview from her home in Colorado, Coloroso said that she began examining the Holocaust, as well as the Armenian and Rwandan genocides, after seeing Elie Wiesel's book Night while walking through an airport.

"I had never studied the subject, and he brought it to the fore for me. I began to realize how much I didn't know."

She found a parallel between behaviours exhibited in bullying and those exhibited in genocide.

"They both share the dehumanization of the victims and a routinization of cruelty. The premise I take on bullying is that it is not about conflict or anger, it is about contempt for another human being," Coloroso said.

"Once you make another person a cockroach or a rat, you can do anything to them without shame or compassion. Bullying is a hostile act that is intended to harm. When one group determines that another group is 'it,' they can do or say anything."

Conflict, she noted, is often used to mask genocide.

"The United States and Canada got involved in World War II to stop the war, not to stop the genocide. They didn't see the genocide through the fog of war," she said.

"If there is a war going, genocide can be diverted. Hitler needed war to complete his genocide."

Coloroso, who has visited Rwanda three times to work with orphans and to lecture at the university there, said that "[genocide] is a very short walk from anyone saying 'You're less than me.' When a student calls another student a name, that is step one.

Barbara Coloroso

"Boys and girls do verbal bullying very well, and other kids laugh."

What they're showing, she said, is that the person who is bullied is not worthy of being treated with dignity and regard. "He's a loner and a loser."

Every bully incident has a bully and a bystander, Coloroso said, "and there are no innocent bystanders. You could not have not the Holocaust without Hitler, but you also would not have it without the bystanders. The bully needs support, and cheering on. Bystanders get pleasure from seeing the pain of others."

The challenge is to raise kids with a sense of "I am unique, you are unique, and together we can create 'we,'" she said.

"Deep caring is as much caught as it is taught, so kids have to see you behave with deep caring. Let them see what you do when you hear a racist joke, let them see how you treat hired help, and let them see you act with compassion and loving kindness."

Coloroso said she is "tragically optimistic" in that "I recognize what is going on, and I'm not wearing rose-coloured glasses.

"However, we can make a difference. We can get a group of people to step in and do the right thing. Deep caring always out-trumps dogma. [The challenge] is not to cut people out of the circle of concern."

Series to address Jewish and Muslim women's issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Debra Landsberg of Temple Emanu-El and Farzana Hassan, a Pakistani-born writer and commentator on Islam and gender issues, will co-teach a three-part series on Women in Judaism/Women in Islam beginning April 11.

The series is part of the temple's weekly study sessions for members, but it will be open to non-members in part because of the subject matter, Rabbi Landsberg said.

There is no charge to attend, but RSVPs to the temple office are requested.

Barbara Landau, co-chair of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims (CAJM) and a past board member of Temple Emanu-El, was instrumental in organizing the series after she read Hassan's book, Islam, Women and the Challenges of Today. She realized that many of the legal issues Hassan addressed in her writing were also issues for Jewish women.

Landau, a lawyer, psychologist and family mediator, lauded the courage of both Hassan and the rabbi. "They're doing this from a very respectful place and a very strong commitment to their religious backgrounds," she said.

Hassan and Rabbi Landsberg first met through their involvement in the CAJM. This is the first time they will be teaching together.

Among the issues Rabbi Landsberg was hoping to address with Hassan as part of the series were the image of women in sacred literature, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the public role of women in mosques and synagogues.

She noted that the roles of women according to traditional Judaism are "different from how we understand them in a Reform congregation."

Hassan, who describes herself as a progressive Muslim woman and is a former president of Muslims Against Terrorism, was one of the subjects of a recent death threat as president of the Muslim Canadian Congress. She said she hopes that "people will come [to the series] with an open mind, whether they're from the Muslim community or of the Jewish faith.

"I hope to have people ask questions. These are very serious issues," she said, referring to how to make worship and spiritual leadership more gender-friendly, and to the relevance in modern times of polygamy and unequal shares of inheritance, as they are addressed under Islamic law. She also mentioned the issue of women leading mixed-gender prayers.

She noted that there is no formalized progressive Muslim framework. Imams are not formally ordained but rather receive the title on the basis of their "knowledge, wisdom and piety," she said.

Members of the CAJM have been invited to attend the series.

"Our goal is not to compare or contrast per se – our goal is to come together and learn," said Rabbi Landsberg. "This subject invites people – men and women – to come and learn beyond their normal parameters."

Hassan said she thinks it's "a wonderful idea to bring both faith traditions together in an atmosphere of friendship and honest inquiry.

"We need to talk more about these things."

Kent to run in Thornhill

Kent, deputy editor of Global TV News, has spent four decades in broadcast journalism and has reported on conflicts in Afghanistan, Africa and the Mideast. He ran for the Tories in last year's federal election in the Toronto riding of St. Paul's, where Liberal MP Carolyn Bennett defeated him by more than 20,000 votes.

In Thornhill, which is roughly half Jewish, he'll face Liberal MP Susan Kadis, who withdrew her support for Liberal MP Michael Ignatieff after the leadership candidate accused Israel of committing war crimes in the Lebanon war last summer.

In previous interviews, Kent accused Kadis of having "hung on [to Ignatieff's campaign] probably longer than she should have."

He said virtually every aspect of that media – and especially those targeting youth, such as rock videos, children's TV shows, sports and schoolbooks – glorify violence and death by martyrdom.

Some sports stadiums in the Palestinian territories are named after suicide bombers, he noted.

Kent showed a Sesame Street-style television puppet show in which characters call for graphic violence. And in one program, teenagers said they prefer being a shahad (martyr) to peace and full rights.

Not even crossword puzzles are immune. Kent displayed one in which the clue was "the Jewish centre for commemorating the Holocaust and the lies." The answer was Yad Vashem.

Palestinian school texts still do not mention Israel, he added.

"I have never seen – and I can't emphasize it enough – psychological warfare practised on a civilian population as it has been and is still being perpetrated by the Palestinian Authority."

He said the situation has become even worse since Hamas gained power in elections last year.

"You can only wonder how [children] might be deprogrammed," he said, adding, "this is the sort of thing much of the world is not aware of."

Weizmann professor to speak on stem cell panel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Renowned scientists from Israel and Canada will be sharing their insights on stem cell research during an upcoming event at the Windsor Arms Hotel in Toronto.

The evening, titled Stem Cell Research: Issues, Opportunities and Promise, will feature presentations by three prominent researchers, followed by a dessert reception.

It's being sponsored by Weizmann Women and Science and Sick Kids Foundation.

Dr. John Dick, a senior scientist at the University Health Network, will discuss his high-profile research involving cancer stem cells.

"These cells are quite different," said Dick, who specializes in cellular and molecular biology.

"Experiments dealing with acute myeloid leukemia have shown that [cancer stem] cells... are more potent at keeping cancer growing... and can lie dormant for long periods of time."

That means cancerous stem cells can in fact survive initial exposure to chemotherapy, so the way to fight them is with targeted treatment.

Dick likened this to treating the root of a weed, rather than just cutting off its leaves.

"These rare cells seem to be the root of the tumour, so if we can find ways of targeting their properties, we'll be able to cut out the root of the tumour, rather than cut the leaf," he explained.

In addition to his work on leukemia, Dick has found in his research that colon cancer may also arise from cancer stem cells.

A long-time colleague of Dick's who will also be speaking at the event is Dr. Tsvee Lapidot, a professor in the immunology department at Israel's Weizmann Institute of Science.

Lapidot will discuss his important work dealing with how blood stem cells migrate to and from bone marrow and how this knowledge could pave the way toward advancements in treating leukemia and successes in bone marrow transplants.

"We developed a functional model for both normal and cancerous human stem cells and we looked at their similarities and differences," he said.

"We made substantial progress... but we're still not at the stage where we can selectively inhibit malignant cells."

Lapidot lived in Toronto in the early 1990s while he worked as a postdoctoral fellow at the Hospital for Sick Children.

He worked with Dick at the time, and the two have maintained a strong relationship.

"For me, Toronto is very special," Lapidot said.

"Returning will be like a homecoming and I'm looking forward to seeing John."

Also speaking at the presentation will be Dr. Janet Rossant, chief of research at Sick Kids.

The forum will be moderated by Dr. David Malkin, a distinguished pediatrics professor.

The event takes place April 12 and seating is limited.

Participants' parents have noticed a change in their children

And the parents of participants have noticed a change in their children as well.

Szereszewski's mother, Sheri, said she was proud of her daughter.

"I know that, going forward, none of the participants will ever look at the world in the same way," she said. "They'll be advocates for change and improvement. As a parent, I couldn't imagine a better thing."

The USYers said they are now sometimes frustrated by friends who tend to "blank out" when they recall their experiences from New Orleans, but they understand that the only way to truly "get it" is to do it.

With that in mind, the students hope to impress this newfound maturity and wisdom on their peers as regards the importance of tikkun olam and tzedakah.

"Indifference gets you nowhere. [Stop] standing on the sidelines and be proactive," Cyngiser said

Friedman echoed that sentiment.

"No matter what it costs you, if you care about it, then do it," she said.

In closing out the interview, Ivory recalled the new USY mantra.

"Darrell summed it up for me, it don't cost nuthin' to be nice," Ivory said. "That's what it's all about. It's so simple, it's ridiculous, yet we forget about it."

The students are now working on a presentation combining their photos, videos and diaries from the trip, to be shown at a USY fundraiser with part of the proceeds being funnelled back to New Orleans relief efforts.

USY plans to host another trip to New Orleans next year.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

We must anticipate the redemption

By RABBI ZUSHE SILBERSTEIN

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Nisan is a month of redemption.

What would you do if you knew the Mashiach was coming today?

When a person is on his deathbed and thinks of his final reckoning, he would not wish he had spent more time in the office. Rather he'd want to have done something meaningful with his life. The same would be true if one realized the Mashiach was coming today.

Our sages tell us that immediately after the arrival of the Mashiach, everyone will have to continue with the activities they had previously performed. Those whose activities were positive will find this greatly rewarding, for they will continue their activities under the guidance of the Mashiach. However, those whose activities were undesirable will be obliged to carry out these deeds before the Mashiach's eyes, and they will be deeply embarrassed.

In his Thirteen Attributes of Faith, Maimonides speaks of awaiting the Mashiach's coming, anxiously and eagerly, every day. We are not to believe that he will come sometime in the distant future, but that his coming is a possibility at any moment. If he were to knock at our door, would we be ready and happy to let him in, or would we ask him to wait until we straightened some things out?

A person may protest: "What are you asking of me? After all, I am only human and I have to make a living. In Mashiach's time, Godliness will be overtly apparent, 'good things will flow in abundance, and all delights will be freely available as dust.' Until then, however, the present-day norms should be maintained."

The question is, however: what are those norms? Of course, a person has to make a living, but how does he make his living? How ethical is his conduct? And how much time is devoted to spiritual pursuits? And beyond apportioning time, how much soul is involved? There are times when a person can devote only a small portion of his or her day to spiritual concerns, but those moments that he can devote are the centre of his life, what he looks forward to and where his energy is most fully expressed.

Moreover, in truth, there is no contradiction between being fully involved in one's contemporary experience in a responsible manner and anticipating the redemption. Maimonides writes that – in the initial stage of the redemption – there will be no difference between the present age and the era of the Mashiach except that the subjugation to the gentile nations will end. Our lives will continue more or less as they are now.

What will the difference be? What we devote our lives and our energies to. Maimonides continues: "The occupation of the entire world will be solely to know God." We will do other things, but we will be occupied with knowing God.

A similar idea is intimated by the Hebrew term for redemption, geulah. It contains the same letters as the term for exile, golah, with one exception: the letter alef in the first syllable. The alef stands for God, Alufo shel olam ("Lord of the world"). Implied is that the difference between exile and redemption is not the physical setting, but the awareness of God. Everything else will remain the same, but when the Mashiach comes, our lives will be permeated with the awareness of God.

Although our awareness of God at present cannot be permeated with the same intensity as it will be in the era of the Mashiach, yet it's like a person who has a treasure in a chest and is awaiting the time for it to be opened. In his mind, he is already a rich man and he conducts himself in that manner.

Rabbi Zushe Silberstein is the spiritual leader of Chabad Chabanel in Montreal.

Good people, bad explanations

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

To live a Torah life is a source of great joy and purpose, and it's a dubious educational strategy to inspire a person's Jewish identity through reminders, although accurate, of our legacy of pain. Having said that, it is nonetheless true that the topic of theodicy – explaining the ways of God in the face of human suffering and misfortune – is something that comes up repeatedly in Jewish conversation, whether it be in classrooms, pulpits, study halls, or, yes, shivah houses.

From a religious perspective, once one removes God from the picture, it's not too difficult to understand why bad things happen. Even the modern French existentialist Albert Camus recognized this in his book The Rebel, where he writes that "the only thing that gives meaning to human protest is the idea of a personal God who has created and is therefore responsible for everything. Only a personal God can be asked by the rebel for a personal accounting." I am in no way saying that atheists would not be troubled by suffering. But their anguish does not extend to the cosmic level.

Maimonides argues in The Guide of the Perplexed that all things are made of matter and matter breaks down. Indeed, for Maimonides, our mistake is narcissism – imagining that we are somehow important in the universe when in fact we are but a very tiny component of the whole. Tectonic plates shift. People act sadistically. Cells mutate. Oceans overflow. Cancer, tsunamis, death camps – bad things happen in nature and among humans.

But somehow this account doesn't resonate and, for many, the pressure to "explain," to make sense of why bad things happen, continues.

But if there is pressure, I believe it should be resisted. There is a disturbing trend in certain circles to try to link suffering to sin and confidently opine about the exact nature of such transgressions – from improper mezuzot to mixing inappropriately with the opposite sex. But there is a big difference between saying that everything has a reason, even suffering, and purporting to know that reason. One can end up adding insult to an already immense amount of injury.

I once heard an illustrious, world-renowned rabbi addressing the question of how God could have allowed the Holocaust to happen. The rabbi pointed out that all that God does is for the good, and, therefore, the Holocaust must have been a form of punishment for the sins of the Jewish people. This idea – known as retribution theory – does have quite a number of possible Jewish source texts.

As if to signal the intolerableness of this view, an elderly gentleman, who it turned out was a Holocaust survivor, interjected and protested, with an anger propelled by feelings of betrayal, that it was a moral obscenity to suggest that the deaths of six million were somehow justifiable and in fact caused by their alleged sins. It was, needless to say, a very tense scene.

And in the aftermath of that moment, I began to think not about "why do bad things happen to good people," but rather why bad explanations happen to good people, and whether by definition any good explanations are possible in this domain of life.

May HaShem avenge their blood.

Book attacks God, religion

The God Delusion by Richard Dawkins (Bantam Press).

Books
Bernard Baskin

God, the Bible and religion are under attack. This assault comes from a recent group of well-publicized and widely discussed books. Arguably, the most impressive and influential of them is The God Delusion by Richard Dawkins, the well-known British evolutionary biologist. It has been on the New York Times bestseller list for the past six months.

These irreverent books argue that the overwhelming evidence from evolution demolishes the idea of a God-created universe. To believe otherwise is both erroneous and pernicious. Even the unparalleled complexity of the human eye, or the intricate design of a dragonfly's wing, can be explained by the process of innumerable slow evolutionary steps.

In addition, the author argues that all the classical proofs for the existence of God have long since been demolished.

For Dawkins, the Bible is primitive, bloodthirsty, sadistic and misogynist – an obsolete work that encourages superstition and absurd religious belief. Religion, he asserts, in every age, has been the root cause of war, bigotry, persecution, hatred of the outsider and the opponent of scientific progress.

Finally, insists Dawkins, religious persons are no more proper or ethical in their behaviour than their agnostic or atheistic neighbours.

This is an angry book, elegant and often persuasive but, at the same time, shrill, arrogant and extreme. The author's knowledge of theology is scant and his appreciation of the Bible as an enduring work that has inspired multitudes of men and women through the ages, non-existent.

For Dawkins, religious belief is akin to mental illness.

It should be pointed out that this protracted tirade is directed largely at biblical fundamentalists and those opposed to basic, widely accepted scientific ideas.

Religion, properly understood, deals essentially with the very thing that is not the concern of science – namely the ends or the purpose of life. Its interests are with desires, feelings and will. It does not answer the question "What is it?" but "Why am I?"

Recently, Eric Cornell, who won the Nobel Prize for physics in 2001, said this in an address to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences: "Most scientists will concede that, as powerful as science is, it can teach us nothing about values, ethics, morals or, for that matter, God."

It is clear that neither science nor religion, in themselves, are adequate to sustain and enhance life. Science, unfettered and misdirected, can expunge all of civilization. Religion, without proper knowledge of the unravelling of facts and new truths, becomes outmoded and irrelevant.

Should a religious person read this book?

Perhaps the answer can be found in the talmudic tractate "The Sayings of the Fathers," in which the person of faith is instructed: "Know how to respond to the Apikoros [a person who leaves the rabbinic tradition]."

Today, once again, I turn the tables and let readers recommend their favourite Israeli and Jewish websites.

"Have you done a kindness today?" That's the question that greets you when arrive at A Kindness A Day website. "Just like the pages of the Talmud are learned in a unified, daily manner worldwide, so, too, should good deeds and acts of kindness be daily events," says Daniel Rothner, founder of Areyvut, an organization that reaches out to day schools of all affiliations. Updated weekly, the site recommends a good deed tied to a verse from the Tanach or Talmud. Some suggestions:

• Assist someone who is unemployed with writing a resumé or finding a job. "One who learns and does not teach is like a myrtle in the desert." (Talmud Rosh Hashanah 23a)

• Congratulate someone on something important he or she accomplished. "A word fitly spoken is like apples in settings of silver." (Proverbs 25:11)

• Study the laws of returning a lost object to its rightful owner and set up a lost and found in your synagogue. "He shall return… the lost item that he found." (Leviticus 5:23-24) [www.kindnessaday.com]

Last Remembrance Day, I took the opportunity to salute Jewish veterans who fought on behalf of Canada, the United States and other countries around the world. The No. 3 troop comprised German-speaking Jewish refugees mainly from Germany and Austria. • whether smoking is a violation of Halachah;

• whether Jews should attend bullfights (or even watch them on television);

• and how Halachah allowed women whose husbands were killed in the World Trade Center to remarry. [www.koltorah.org/ravj/ravj.htm]

Coast to Coast

Move called 'a complete break' from Halachah co-authored by Rabbi Elliot Dorff of the Ziegler School; another, which was among two more traditional views, was co-authored by Rabbi Joel Roth of JTS. Both are longtime leading educators in their respective schools. Both their papers earned 13 votes, a majority of the law committee.

Rabbi Saltzman commented that "the JTS that ordained me in the 1970s was a totally different institution than it is today. It was very much committed to tradition and the conserving of the Jewish tradition, and changes were made very slowly and with a great deal of consideration."

He added: "I think that one of the things we are going to have to do in Canada is that we are going to have to determine from an ideological point of view whether we are going to throw our lot in with the ideological decisions made in the United States for an American constituency, or whether we are going to define Conservative Judaism in a uniquely Canadian fashion in such a way that it reflects the traditional values of Canadian Jews."

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, spiritual leader of Beth Tzedec Congregation, said that talk of a possible sovereign association within the Canadian Conservative movement, which Rabbi Saltzman proposed more than a year ago, is "still going on, but the issue is much broader than theological and halachic differences. They also centre around a sense of Canadian nationalism:... and it's a financial issue tied to programmatic development through United Synagogue [the movement's congregational arm]."

The discussion is not an attempt to sever Canadian congregations from the Conservative movement, Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said. "There remains the possibility of what I'll call loyal dissent."

Writing on a on a Conservative rabbinic listserv, Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue suggested that halachic pluralism in North America would have been best served if JTS had maintained its current policy while Ziegler adopted the more lenient view.

By doing so, he said, both schools would have shown "kavod" (respect) to their respective leaders.

Rabbi Allen said he does not anticipate radical changes like a split within the movement, but he said there is "a disheartening of spirit of those who were committed to tradition and remain committed to tradition.

"What we see is not an exodus from the Conservative movement but a gradual disconnection, a pulling away by those who were the stalwarts of the Conservative movement, leaving behind a shell that's a place for those less than committed to the totality of Jewish observance."

Rabbi Martin Berman of Shaar Shalom Synagogue described JTS' decision to ordain openly gay students as "a complete break from halachic tradition."

In contrast, he said, he "could live with" the idea of women being ordained as rabbis, although he found it "problematic," he said on the listserv. Regarding women's ordination, he wrote that he "did not feel that there was actually anything inherently wrong with women having the title, the question was what they did with it."

While he would not hesitate to count a gay male in his minyan (although he would not count a woman), Rabbi Berman said he cannot honour JTS' decision.

He told The CJN he "can no longer in any way support the seminary" where he was ordained in 1977. That means he will not recommend it to prospective rabbinical students, nor will he involve himself in any fundraising for it.

He still considers himself a "traditional Conservative Jew," he said.

Despite the strongly divergent points of view in the movement, said Rabbi Frydman-Kohl, "there is a very strong and deep relationship, and just as in a family where there can be some significant differences, there is nonetheless a sense of family holding together, so we are a family that's in dialogue trying to hold ourselves together."

Rabbi David Eligberg, of Beit Rayim Synagogue, which is egalitarian, was reluctant to comment publicly on the issue. "One of my great fears with this issue is that I think it's going to divert a tremendous amount of attention from other substantive issues the movement needs to focus on."

In an open letter dated Mar. 26 (available online at www.jtsa.edu), JTS chancellor-elect Arnold Eisen, who is not a rabbi, wrote that "the decision to ordain gay and lesbian clergy at JTS is in keeping with the longstanding commitment of the Jewish tradition to pluralism."

He said in a statement that pluralism "means that we recognize more than one way to be a good Conservative Jew, more than one way of walking authentically in the path of our tradition and of carrying that tradition forward."

But some in the movement don't support a pluralistic vision that might exclude gays and lesbians.

JTS graduate Rabbi Ayelet Cohen, a native of Montreal and associate rabbi of New York's Congregation Beth Simchat Torah, a synagogue for gays and lesbians, said that welcoming people of all sexual orientations should be "a value and not an option."

Yet not everyone who supports gay rabbis agrees with Rabbi Cohen.

Rabbi Amy Eilberg, the first woman ordained as a Conservative rabbi in 1985, said she sympathizes with those who would exclude congregations that cling to traditional positions, but she added that her experience in interfaith and Middle East peace efforts have convinced her that it's necessary to maintain relationships across ideological differences.

Opposition MPs meet Palestinian minister

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A small group of opposition MPs met with the Palestinian Authority's information minister in Ottawa last week after Foreign Affairs Minister Peter McKay turned down a meeting with him.

On Wednesday, Bloc Québécois MP Francine Lalonde, the party's foreign affairs spokesperson, met Mustafa Barghouti, an independent member of the Palestinian government, along with members of Alternative, a Quebec NGO that arranged the visit. Then on Thursday, Barghouti met with MPs from the Liberal and New Democratic parties.

Barghouti's visit to Canada was planned prior to creation of the Palestinian unity government that includes Hamas and Fatah ministers, as well as some independents. The unity government deal was brokered in Saudi Arabia and was intended to end internecine Palestinian fighting that saw hundreds killed in the span of just a few weeks.

In the House of Commons last week, Lalonde urged McKay to meet Barghouti.

"Many countries, the European Union and even the American consulate in Jerusalem have met with non-Hamas ministers of the Palestinian government," she said in Question Period. "By refusing this meeting, is the Minister of Foreign Affairs [McKay] perhaps not missing an excellent opportunity to contribute to the resolution of the dispute?"

McKay responded by noting that he speaks "quite regularly" with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, a member of Fatah. "I advised the president that we continue to support his efforts to bring peace, in particular to the territories, but until such time as we see progress in the area of the Quartet principles, which call for the recognition of Israel, which call for the cessation of violence and which call for the [internationally sponsored 'road map' peace plan] to be adhered to, we are not going to deal directly with a terrorist organization, namely, Hamas."

Lalonde followed up by saying Barghouti is not a member of Hamas and that U.S. Secretary of State Condoleeza Rice has met non-Hamas members of the Palestinian government.

"Why is it that Canada's Minister of Foreign Affairs cannot meet with them? Is his approach not too dogmatic? If we hope to contribute to the resolution of a dispute between two parties, we must be able to communicate with both parties."

McKay closed the testy exchange by saying, "we hope we will see the unity government express in a more forthright way its respect of and adherence to the 'road map', to the principles the Quartet [Russia, the European Union, the United States and the United Nations] has clearly laid out. I know the members opposite do not want to hear the answer, but I will tell them again. We will deal directly with President Abbas. We will continue to support the Palestinian people through aid. We will continue to support the peace process."

Barghouti, meanwhile, told the Globe and Mail, "we think the Canadian position is either too slow or too much influenced by the Israelis… My message is for the Canadian government to look at our platform with your own Canadian eyes and not with Israeli glasses on. I think it's the [Canadian] government that should feel isolated in its position."

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the organized Jewish community's lobby group, called the MPs' meeting with Barghouti "entirely inappropriate."

CIC chair Moshe Ronen said Barghouti "is a representative of the new 'unity' government," which has not "unambiguously and unequivocally" satisfied the Quartet's demands.

The CICs chief executive officer, Shimon Fogel, applauded McKay's refusal to meet Barghouti.

Although Barghouti is not be a member of Hamas, he is a member of a government that's dominated by the terrorist organization, which has not given up its goal of eliminating Israel, Fogel said.

"In this case, part of the government – the majority – rejects the State of Israel and calls for use of any form of resistance, a code word for terrorism. If you are part of that government, it sticks to you. You can't say one part is kosher and one part is treif [unkosher]."

Lalonde said she met with Barghouti to "get the latest information about what is going on in Palestine and the relations between Israel and Palestine. I and the Bloc Québécois want to be of some help for the renewal of negotiations and settlement along the lines we have made known [for many years]."

She said Barghouti referred to the Quartet's demands and said "Abbas has repeatedly more than complied with the three conditions. I have read analysts saying that Abbas and two other groups, [by joining] in a united government… have tacitly accepted the three conditions."

Barghouti also told her that "since the election, Mr. Haniyeh [the prime minister of the Hamas government] has been very moderate in his positions and he is a man or responsibility."

Asked by The CJN about the continuous rocket attacks on Israel, Lalonde suggested that Palestinian governments – including the one headed by Yasser Arafat – are not responsible. She said that Barghouti told her the coalition government, which represents 96 per cent of Palestinians, "is made to prevent that or bring it to an end quickly."

In Israel, meanwhile, Rice concluded a round of diplomacy with an agreement between Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Abbas to meet every two weeks.

She also stated: "The Quartet's position is clear. A path of co-operation with the new Palestinian government exists, but it is blocked by Hamas' continued unwillingness to commit itself, by word and deed, to the Quartet principles – renouncing violence, recognizing Israel's right to exist and adhering to previous agreements and obligations."

Child support payment increase

Family Matters
by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Question: I understand that the law has changed and that the amounts payable for child support have recently gone up. Is this true? Does spousal support also go up? I'm confused.

Answer: Yes, the basic amounts payable for child support across Canada all went up effective May 1, 2006. These are known as the "table amounts." The amounts payable for extras — the proportional sharing of special or extraordinary expenses under section 7 of the Child Support Guidelines — are unaffected. Among others, these include costs for orthodontics, child care, and summer camps, post-secondary costs and, where Ordered or agreed-upon, extra-curricular activities. But the basic table amounts tied directly to the payer's gross yearly income (usually the amount found at line 150 of his tax return) have all increased.

For instance, basic "table" child support payable prior to May 1, 2006 for payers (usually Dads) earning $70,000 annually for two children in Ontario used to be $927 monthly. Any amounts payable on and after May 1 for the same payer have increased to $1,043 monthly. For further information and the amounts for all payers for differing numbers of children in each Province, go to canada.justice.gc.ca/en/ps/sup

Payer's Annual Income	Monthly Payment
	BEFORE MAY 1/06	AFTER MAY 1/06
20,000	285	308
25,000	285	308
40,000	570	601
50,000	700	763
60,000	823	902
70,000	927	1,043
80,000	1,031	1,159
90,000	1,136	1,281
100,000	1,240	1,404
120,000	1,448	1,644
140,000	1,658	1,876
180,000	2,073	2,340
200,000	2,201	2,572

However, the child support table shown herein offers a sample of just how dramatic the increases are for a payer with two children in Ontario; the higher the income, the greater the increase.

Given that the old rates were set back on May 1, 1997, the need to increase the basic amounts payable, due to inflation, is understandable. Here are a few points to remember:

- For any amounts payable prior to May 1, 2006, the old table applies. However, if child support was Ordered or agreed upon prior to May 1, 1997, then such child support is neither taxable to the recipient nor deductible by the payer. The Court will make future payments from pre-May 1, 1997 arrangements non-taxable and change the amounts if the recipient makes a Court application.
- If Dad refuses to increase his payments, go to Court and you will likely receive back your legal costs from him. But don't expect the Ontario government's Family Responsibility Office (FRO) to enforce any increase without a new agreement or Court order filed with them. There is also no change for spousal support.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Beard Winter, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy Passover.

Quebec election brings peace of mind for Jews

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — With two-thirds of Quebecers voting for parties committed to not holding a sovereignty referendum, the Jewish community has the kind of peace of mind that it hasn't known in more than a generation.

Jean Charest's Liberal minority government may be short-lived and there is some ambivalence about Action Démocratique du Québec (ADQ) leader Mario Dumont, who will be the new opposition leader, but getting separatism off the front burner comes as an unexpected relief.

It's the first time the Parti Québécois has been the province's third party since 1976.

Gerry Weiner, a former federal cabinet minister under Brian Mulroney, thinks the election results are a best-case scenario. Weiner calls Charest a friend and is one of the few Jews who has worked for the ADQ, although he was not involved in this campaign.

"I think it's the best of all possible options," he said. "Charest will have to address the serious issues Mario has put on the table, like health care and downsizing the public service, and he is well-equipped to do so. We've been focussed on separatism for too long. A minority government is an opportunity for people to work together. It can work well."

In 2002, Weiner arranged for Dumont to meet 18 prominent Jewish community members at a private lunch at the Montefiore Club, where Weiner says Dumont was well-received.

But it's clear the ADQ attracted very few Jewish voters, even though Dumont, who has been in the National Assembly since 1994, has toned down the nationalist rhetoric. But he has consistently refused to identify himself as either a federalist or a sovereigntist, preferring the term "autonomist?"

In the most Jewish riding, D'Arcy McGee, incumbent Liberal Lawrence Bergman coasted to a fourth mandate with 84 per cent of the vote. It remains to be seen if Bergman will keep his job as revenue minister. Parti vert candidate Robert Leibner finished second – 17,000 votes behind – and the ADQ's Marcelle Guay was third. None of the ADQ's 41 seats (up from five) is on the Island of Montreal or in Laval.

Weiner thinks Jews and other non-francophones have nothing to fear from Dumont.

"My impression is that he's a straight shooter. He's not a closet separatist. When he speaks of an autonomous Quebec, he means a strong Quebec in a united Canada. I have absolutely no problem with that."

Weiner said he stayed out of this campaign because he is making a bid to get back into federal politics with the Conservative Party.

When Dumont spoke to the Jewish Business Network in November 2004, he said his plan to create "the autonomous state of Quebec" meant that an ADQ government would try to wrest as much power as possible from Ottawa, but would not seek to "break our link with our Canadian partner."

The ADQ has made little effort to reach out to the Jewish community since then.

In the past few months, Dumont's stance that limits must be placed on reasonable accommodation of religious minorities, a view that seems to have played well in the province's regions, has raised concern.

By contrast, Charest was reticent on the issue until finally creating the Bouchard-Taylor study commission in February, an approach that did not speak to the heart in the way Dumont was able to do.

Dumont has suggested that Quebecers' traditional identity is being eroded by what he sees as increasing acquiescence to beliefs that are at odds with Quebec "values." He has called for a Quebec constitution that would entrench what it means to be a Quebecer.

The amiable 36-year-old is not, however, seen as a demagogue. He threatened to sue when Mont Royal Liberal candidate Pierre Arcand compared him to far-right French politician Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Lubavitch Rabbi Ronnie Fine, who is acquainted with Dumont, said, "I do not get the sense that he is anti-accommodation. On the contrary, from my dealings, I found him a decent person."

The media gave Quebecers one more instance of reasonable accommodation supposedly gone too far just two days before the election. A group of Orthodox Jews, many from outside the province, were portrayed as having taken over all 129 rooms at the Chateau Cartier hotel in Gatineau for Passover, inconveniencing members of its fitness centre because the hotel agreed to allow the Jewish group exclusive use of the facilities in order to avoid men and women mixing.

In the last week of the campaign, Dumont quickly apologized for ADQ candidate Gilles Gagnon's comment on his business's website that Jews create wars for profit, reassuring B'nai Brith Canada that Gagnon did not reflect his party's views and that he, Dumont, regards the Jewish community as an "integral part of Quebec society."

(Gagnon, who ran in Abitibi-Est in the northwest part of the province, finished in third place.)

Dumont, who hails from Cacouna, a village near Rivière-du-Loup is a graduate of Concordia University, where he earned a BA in 1993. He has said that he chose to go to Concordia to improve his English and to experience the school's cultural diversity.

Besides Bergman, another Jewish Liberal, Russell Copeman, was re-elected to a fourth term in Notre-Dame-de-Grace by a wide margin.

The Parti Québécois's sole Jewish candidate, Richard Marceau was defeated in the Quebec City riding of Charlesbourg, which went from Liberal to ADQ. Since losing his seat as a Bloc Québécois MP in the last federal election, Marceau has been a consultant to the Canada-Israel Committee and the Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Anthology of Yiddish women writers launched

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An overflow crowd attended the March 11 launch of an anthology of stories by Yiddish women writers whose works have been translated into English for publication.

"The room we were in at the Gwen Secter Creative Living Centre is limited to 130 people according to the fire code," said Rhea Tregebov, the editor of Arguing with the Storm: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers. "We had more people in the lobby outside."

The 215-page anthology grew out of a book club dedicated to Yiddish women writers that has been meeting monthly at the Gwen Secter, a north Winnipeg Jewish seniors centre, since September, 2000.

"We started as a traditional book club," said Tregebov's mother, Jeanette Block, one of the club's organizers. "We found that that was too hard. Not all of our members could read Yiddish well. So we switched to an old-fashioned reading circle."

At one point, the group began reading Found Treasures and learned that there was an English translation. "That helped us out a lot," Block said. "At that point we realized that some of the stories we were reading had never been translated."

Members of the group took it upon themselves to translate some of the stories to make it easier for all the book club members to understand.

Tregebov became involved through her mother. A Toronto-based freelance writer at the time, Tregebov once taught creative writing there, at Ryerson University.

"My mother would call me and tell me all about the stories the group was reading," Tregebov said. "I became as excited about them as she was, and we both agreed that it was time to put out a new anthology of Jewish women writers." (The last one was released in 1993.)

"The stories capture the breadth of Yiddishkeit as well as the broadmindedness of Winnipeg's Yiddish culture," Tregebov said. "My mother coached me on which stories to include in the anthology."

Although a couple of children's stories as well as a play were suggested for inclusion, Tregebov decided to restrict the writings to adult prose. "I thought that format would make it easier finding a publisher," she said.

The book's Canadian publisher is Sumac Press (www.sumachpress.com). The Feminist Press in New York will be publishing the American edition in the fall.

Most of the translations were done by members of the group: Esther Leven, who translated five of the stories; Ros Usiskin; Arnice Pollock; Luba Cates; and Chana Thau. Also included was a short story by Chava Rosenfarb, which was translated by her daughter, Goldie Morgentaler; a Holocaust story written by Paula Frankel-Zaltzman, which had already been translated into English by Miriam Beckerman; and a story by Bryna Bercovitch, which was translated by Sacvan Bercovitch and and Sylvia Ary.

The other writers whose works appear in the anthology are Sarah Hamer-Jacklyn, Anne Viderman, Malka Lee, Frume Halpern, Rochel Broches and Rikuda Potash.

Most of the work on Arguing with the Storm was completed by the summer of 2005. By that time, Tregebov was working full time as an assistant professor of creative writing at the University of British Columbia and had time in the summers to devote to the project. Tregebov compiled the biographies of the writers, which accompany their works, and sourced the photographs. She credits Janet Gould, a librarian at the Kaufman-Silverberg Resource Centre in Winnipeg, and Eddie Stone of the Jewish Public Library in Montreal for helping her find the photos and compile the biographies.

Arguing with the Storm was launched in Toronto on March 23 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and will be launched at the Peretz Centre in Vancouver on April 12.

EXTRAORDINARY EVIL

A Brief History of Genocide...and Why it Matters

In her remarkable and timely new book, bestselling author Barbara Coloroso turns her attention to genocide: what it means; where it begins; where it must end. Taking the premise that sibling conflict is to armed conflict is to war as bullying is to hate crime is to genocide... Coloroso explains that it's a short walk to genocide. Based on the author's thirty years of research and extensive travel, Extraordinary Evil is an urgently needed work in an age when acts of genocide seem to occur more frequently and are in the public's consciousness more than ever before.

נקודת המפנה באה משני כוונים:

הפדרציה היהודית סוף סוף הכירה באבסורד הזה, ושמינתה את גליה סרנר לנהל דסק שעוסק בישראלים. למי שהספיק להכיר את גליה ברור לעלל שזו היתה בחירה מצויינת, והדברים מתחילים לרקד.

מוצא חן מאוד בעיני שנקודת הזינוק היתה איתורם של מתנדבים, ולפני מספר שבועות הגיעו מעל למאתיים וחמישים ישראלים שביקשו להתנדב.

שני עיתונים אוחזים בטלית

ואז באה ההפתעה הגדולה. עיתון "מעריב" שלכל הדיעות נמצא במאבק קיומי של "להיות או לא להיות" בישראל החליט להוציא בטורונטו את "זמן קנדה". צריך לזכור שעד לפני מספר שנים היה "מעריב" נמכר לצד "ידיעות אחרונות" בעשרות דוכנים בטורונטו. אחר כך הוא נעלם, מעין תמונת ראי לשקיעתו בישראל.

"זמן קנדה" משלב קטעים נרחבים של מיטב עיתונאי "מעריב"-מדן מרגלית, אודטה, ועד ליונתן גפן, לצד כתיבה מקומית, כשבולטת בין העיתונאים המקומיים ד"ר דינה רוגינסקי, שעיסוקה האקדמאי הוא הגירה ומאפיינה, וכתיבתה מעניינת ומעמיקה.

לכאורה-קרה דבר טוב-בסגנון קטאת סופרים תרנה חכמה. אבל ללב מתנגנו חשש שמא הדבר יחלישו את שני העיתונים עקב תחרות אגרסיבית על שוק מודעות מוגבל. יתכן כמובן שיתברר ששוק המודעות והצרכנות הישראלי הינם בעלי פוטנציאל הרבה יותר גדול, שלא היה ידוע עד כה, ואז נצא כולנו נשכרים.

אבל שישאר בינינו.

URJ biennial draws reps

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

RICHMOND, B.C. — Richmond was the host city for this year's Union for Reform Judaism Pacific (URJ) Northwest region biennial, which drew a crowd of more than 200 Jewish communal leaders for three days of workshops, meetings, seminars and worship services last month.

"What distinguishes this year's biennial is that it represented a blending of the Canadian and Pacific Northwest regions of the UJA [United Jewish Appeal]," said Sarah Richman, who co-chaired the event.

"In years past, the biennial has been held in Toronto, and while the Pacific Northwest is part of the Canadian region, many of its congregations are quite isolated and don't face the same challenges as URJ congregations in larger centres.

"This biennial enabled congregations in Edmonton, Calgary and Winnipeg to come to Vancouver at a reasonable rate and align with other small Jewish congregations facing the same challenges that they face," she said.

The biennial hosted 50-odd workshops on various subjects, including enhancing the synagogue as a caring community; understanding the three elements of synagogue membership; the revolution in longevity; and Jewish art.

Richman helped plan the biennial in conjunction with Rabbi David Fine, director of the URJ Pacific region, Rabbi Sharon Sobel, director of the Canadian region, and a planning committee.

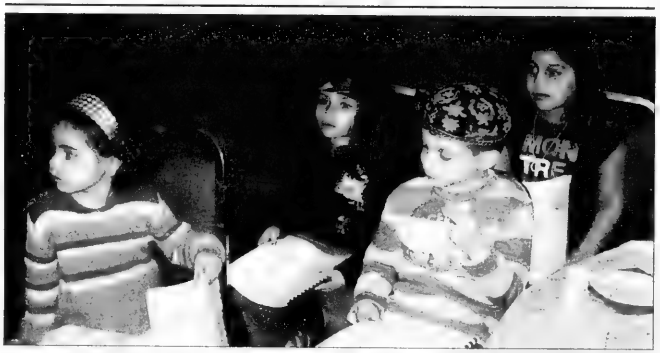
Among the 28 congregation representatives at the biennial was Len Udow, cantorial soloist at Temple Sholom in Winnipeg. "The conference began with the regional mandate from the URJ, but I was delighted and rewarded also by meeting people from smaller Canadian congregations and to bring back to my congregation a sense of hope to resolve some of our ongoing problems and move together into a brighter future," he said.

For Joel Fagan, president of the Kollot Mayim Reform Temple in Victoria, B.C., the high point of the biennial was the keynote address by URJ president Rabbi Eric Yoffie. "He gave a very courageous and interesting sermon concerning certain trends in adolescent sexual behaviour and how the URJ views these," Fagan said.

"The URJ is creating a formal curriculum of study, and encouraging families, religious schools and congregations to try and work toward emphasizing traditional Jewish values in a contemporary framework, in terms of how to guide and support young people in making responsible decisions. I thought it was very interesting, edifying and, in its own way, challenging."

For Udow, the biennial was more intimate than events he has attended in the past, which was definitely an advantage. "Smaller is really better in that you are induced to participate and meet with others on a more social as well as intellectual level. From these connections will come resources and support," he said.

Richman agrees: "That's the real benefit of these biennials – not just learning, but the networking."



YOUTH SEDER: Habonim Dror Camp Gesher joined with Hashomer Hazair on March 25 for a communal youth Passover seder at the Lodzer Centre Holocaust Congregation. Each of the more than 100 participants had a chance to read from a Haggadah that had been edited with young people in mind, as well as take part in dancing and eat fruit dipped in a chocolate fountain. Pictured, from left, are Nili and Mika Sela, daughters of Jewish Agency shlichah Lian Sela, and Corin and Eliran Arbel.

Don't sweat it

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

It was a full house on a Sunday night at 6 Degrees Nightclub where the third annual Fashion For Passion show took to the runway in front of a crowd of friends, fashionistas and activists alike.

This year's cleverly titled Hillel event, No Shvitz, combined fashion and music to take a stand against sweatshop labour. As well as showing off the latest and hottest fashions from Israel and beyond, No Shvitz featured such eclectic performances as a sexy belly dance and an astoundingly talented troupe of breakdancers.

While Fashion for Passion is a national event taking place in various cities across Canada, including Vancouver, Halifax and London, the anti-sweatshop concept was unique to the Toronto event of March 22.

"This year we thought it was really important to bring awareness to support fair trade," says Jeff Bernstein, a model in the show.

"Child labour is a serious issue. Anything we could do to help bring awareness about the issue is important."

And if helping raise awareness about sweatshops was not enough, every Fashion For Passion show will also donate a portion of the show's proceeds to the Save A Child's Heart charity, which provides pediatric heart surgery and follow-up care for children from Third World and developing countries.

While promoting fair trade, Fashion for Passion also provided an opportunity for students to get involved with Jewish life on campus in a creative and innovative way.

"Students who wouldn't typically get involved weren't just a part of creating this event – they owned it," says Orly Cohen, one of the show's organizers. "It was just amazing."

Fashion For Passion, which first took place in 2005, has blossomed into a yearly event that brings the best of Israeli fashion to a Canadian market in an unconventional and unique way.

"We bring the Israeli fashion to the event as a way to highlight Israel beyond the conflict," says Alexis Pavlich of National Jewish Campus Life (NJCL).

Sunday's event featured the work of recent graduates of the Shenkar College of Engineering and Design in Ramat Gan, who manufactured their lines without the help of sweatshop labour.

Among the five collections shown, streetwear seemed to be a major trend. In contrast, the sweet line of cocktail dresses shown by Hagit stood out as the most promising collection of the show.

With the beautiful live singing of Dana Doige, the dresses took to the runway with every bit of Audrey Hepburn flair.

In an interesting spin this year, the Israeli collections were offset by the addition of No Sweat clothing to the show. The American-owned company boasts a line of 100 per cent union-made apparel that is both affordable and trendy... not to mention ethically sound.

"No Sweat is a perfect example of what social entrepreneurship can do for raising awareness and helping to create social justice," says Melissa Lantsman, president of the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students (CFJS).

The mix-and-match line of No Sweat cotton basics was playfully shown by a lively bunch of male and female models. In among the outfits shown, the company's logo was prominently displayed as a symbol of strength and perseverance. The logo's cartoon-like woman represents the effort to stop the use of sweatshops.

"Everything about this show incorporated the idea of tzedekah," says Allison Mason, the show's choreographer and stylist. "Even the models were chosen based on how much they cared about the issue."

For the No Shvitz show, Adam Naiman, No Sweat's CEO, donated a line of T-shirts called the "One Tee," which are manufactured in Bethlehem. The factory's employees are a mix of Israelis and Palestinians. What's more, the factory has support from both the Israeli and Palestinian Authority governments.

As a perfect statement to end the night with, the show closed with a group including musician Dave Borins and Cohen singing Od Yavo Shalom Aleynu (Peace Will Come to All of Us).

A testament to the many actions that can be taken against the immoral use of sweatshops across the globe, No Shvitz proved to be a night of celebration and solidarity for humankind.

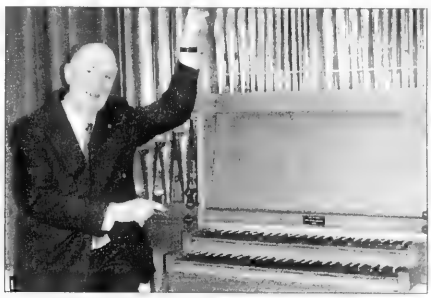
Arts building dedicated at York

By SVETLANA BARKAN
Special to The CJN

The new Accolade East Building at York University was recently renamed the Sterling Beckwith Studio – for Sterling Beckwith who founded York University's music department in 1969.

York University president Lorna Marsden, faculty of fine arts dean Philip Silver and chair of music, Barry Elmes, attended the March 19 dedication ceremony.



Sterling Beckwith, the founder of York University's music department, is the dedicatee of the school's new arts building.

Born and raised in New York City, Beckwith has had a long and varied career as a singer, conductor, vocal coach, researcher, concert organizer and an educator. An honours graduate in Russian history and literature, he took his doctorate in musicology with a minor in Russian literature and culture. In 2003, he was one of the organizers of Soviet and Kosher: A Century of Jewish Culture in Russia, a three-day symposium at the University of Toronto that included the Canadian prèmiere of Grigory Frid's mono-opera The Diary of Anne Frank.

"We're at an interesting time at York University, when many of the people who founded the university's departments, especially in fine arts, have reached retirement age. We need to recognize the contribution of our founding fathers and commemorate their vision and foresight," Silver said.

"It also makes our students realize that they are a part of a tradition. Sterling's legacy in the department of music will last a long time, and I'm pleased to say that even 38 years later, we are still holding true to it."

Soprano Vania Chan and organist Matthew Allard were the recipients of the 2006 Sterling Beckwith Award, as well as the performers at the event. The award, which Beckwith created in 2001, is open to second- and third-year music majors who demonstrate exceptional promise and ability in performance, superior musicianship and a breadth of cultural and academic interests.

In commenting appreciatively on the tributes he received, Beckwith referred to the tracker-action Baroque organ, which was his first purchase for York's then-fledgling music program. He expressed his gratitude to the organ's builder, Karl Wilhelm, for his devoted work in restoring the instrument to playing condition after years of neglect, so it could be housed and used in the new studio that now bears his name.

After thanking all those who helped create the new Accolade East Building, the latest addition to York's impressive facilities for the various programs offered by its faculty of fine arts, Beckwith said, "One must hope that this institution will continue to exploit to the fullest the many advantages of its cosmopolitan location and will remain committed to welcoming the broadest, deepest, and most challenging kinds of teaching and learning in all the arts – with music, as always, leading the way."

Pesach has new meaning once you've wandered for a while

By SUSAN KRASHINSKY

As my plane ascended into the sky over Bangkok, it occurred to me that Pesach was approaching. After two months in Southeast Asia, I had begun to lose track of the time. This happens often when I travel; dates and times become blurred, marked only by the need to catch another train, bus or plane.

But now, with only a stopover in Seoul standing between me and my flight home to Canada, I had time to sit and think about the year-and-a-bit that had just passed.

I had decided to move to Osaka for a year. Like many people just out of college, the pull to see the world was intense for me, and teaching English abroad was a good way to do it. But this wasn't just an extended vacation. While I am very fond of travel, living in a country provides a unique opportunity to be exposed to the nuances of its social, political and cultural life, on a deeper level than simple tourism offers. The sense of ignorance, of being taken out of one's own element and forced to live by different rules, is one of the most important things a person can gain from seeing a new country and meeting its people. I wanted to be a stranger.

I got my wish.

People planning to live in a different country often focus so much on what will be alien to them that that they don't imagine how foreign they themselves will be once they arrive. Suddenly, I was the visible minority with little to no knowledge of the local language or culture.

It taught me humility, as I had to rely on those around me for help doing even the most basic tasks at first.

Even when I became more self-sufficient, hanging around with my Japanese friends and students provided regular reminders that I was different. In a land full of people who have rarely met Jews, delicately explaining why I would not eat the shrimp was challenging to say the least.

The stewardess interrupted my reminiscing to bring me my food. I was the first on the plane to be served. I had ordered the kosher meal, and my dinner featured grilled salmon, fresh fruit, and three separate desserts. The man beside me was visibly envious.

"How you get your meal?" he asked.

Imagine trying to explain the rules of kashrut to a Korean who speaks fair English but has little or no concept of Judaism, and you have some idea of how the next 20 minutes passed.

"I know where Israel is," he said excitedly, "but only from the Bible."

"Ah," I replied, smiling politely.

"Jewish people," he began, a reverent hush creeping into his voice, "do not worship Jesus Christ?"

I could have replied that, yes, that was us in a nutshell. But I felt obligated not to. It had been the same in Japan. I wanted to communicate something more complex. I wanted to tell this man that we were more than just Christians minus the Trinity. To my students, I wanted to explain that having a kosher-style way of life wasn't about some God hating me if I ate the shrimp; it was about elevating the most banal, daily activity into something divine. It was about cultivating awareness. I wanted to concede that I was sure the shrimp was delicious and that I admired the artistry of the sushi chef who had prepared it for us.

But there was the rub – how to appreciate the culture, and at the same time refuse to participate in it?

Though stumbling through big concepts in little English was frustrating, I did it every time. I was a stranger in a strange land; so how could I in good conscience treat others as strangers? Not to attempt to connect with those who showed curiosity in my heritage would have been to separate myself from them, to make myself more of an outsider, and therefore to violate the most important lesson of Pesach.

Travelling by plane saves time and allows you to see things you wouldn't otherwise, but a big drawback is that it takes away the physical knowledge of the distance you have passed, leaving you with a "what country am I in now?" feeling.

My stopover in Seoul allowed for an express tour that was as dizzying as if I had been surrounded by expanses of desert sand. Korea felt like a haze, a jet lag-induced dream. Before I knew it, I was back on a plane and heading for Canada.

If the culture shock and the disorientation were something to reckon with between countries in Asia, I wondered what it would be like to return to my own country. I wasn't being told to leave my home and go to a land I had never seen before – I had done that already. I was going home, and yet, home felt distant and confusing. Would I still belong there? Would it feel different, or totally natural, like floating to the surface after diving into deep water?

I found myself excited, not just for my family, my friends, but oddly, for my country. Still, I worried that my own culture would be the biggest shock of all. Nobody would ever call wandering for 40 years a luxury, but all this planet-hopping was disorienting. I wondered if it would give me enough time to realize that I was finally back where I belonged.

But that's the funny thing about belonging. Once you've been a stranger, it feels as though you'll always be apart. Still, the memory fades. Familiar faces weave their way back into your daily landscape. Basic tasks like buying milk are no longer an unusual adventure. Eventually, you have to pick up the Haggadah and remind yourself that you too, once, were foreign. That strangers are just you in a different skin.

I wasn't even back, and already my more-than-a-year was beginning to feel like one of my many flights, passing in a flash yet ponderous, the distance jagged and real but also just a concept, something I remember: a story I tell, at home, over food, trying to beat the jet lag.

Passover Food Ideas

Use carrots as a side dish

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

During the scramble to come up with side dishes for both the seder and chol hamoed, the one vegetable that never gets left in the fridge is the carrot. Inexpensive, always available, low in calories, high in roughage and just as delicious raw as it is cooked, the carrot is the perfect vegetable to counterbalance the heavy foods we tend to serve all week long.

MASHED POTATOES WITH CARROTS AND CARAMELIZED ONIONS

1 large onion, chopped
2 tsp. butter
2 large potatoes
2 large carrots
1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 cup ricotta or low fat cottage cheese

Saute the onion in the butter in a small skillet over medium-high heat, stirring frequently, until the onions are golden brown, about 8-10 minutes. Peel the potatoes and carrots. Cut the potatoes into eight pieces each, and the carrots into six pieces. Cook in boiling water until tender, about 8-10 minutes. Drain well. Mash the potato and carrot together until the carrot is in small chunks. Beat in the sauteed onion, ricotta or cottage cheese and salt. Cover and keep warm. (This dish can be reheated in a microwave oven or in a double boiler over low heat.)

CARROT AVOCADO SALAD

1 lb. medium carrots
1/2 cup chopped fresh cilantro
1/4 cup finely chopped onion
3 tbsp. olive oil
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1 small garlic clove, finely chopped
1/4 tsp.salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1 firm-ripe avocado

Halve carrots lengthwise, then cut diagonally into 2-in. pieces. Cook carrots in a 4- to 6-quart pot of boiling salted water until just tender, 5 to 6 minutes. Drain in a colander and transfer to a bowl of ice and cold water to stop cooking. Let stand 5 minutes, then drain again and pat dry. While the carrots are cooling, in a bowl combine the cilantro, onion, oil, lemon juice, garlic, salt and pepper. Whisk until combined. Quarter avocado lengthwise, then peel and pit. Cut into 1/2-in. pieces and add to dressing along with carrots. Toss to combine. Makes 4 side dish servings. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

ZESTY CARROT SALAD

1 1/2 lb. carrots, peeled and cut diagonally into 1/4-in.-thick ovals
3 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
2 to 3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. olive oil
1 clove garlic, crushed
1/4 tsp. ground cumin
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
1/8 tsp. salt
dash ground cayenne pepper
1/2 cup raisins or chopped apples

In a 4-quart saucepan, bring 2 quarts water to a boil. Add carrots and cook until crisp-tender, about 2 minutes. Drain well and let cool slightly. In a large bowl, whisk together the juice, sugar, oil, garlic, cumin, cinnamon, ginger, salt and pepper. Toss with carrots and raisins or apples. Refrigerate until thoroughly chilled, about 3 hours. Serves 6.

SPICED CARROT SALAD

8-oz. package baby carrots
1/4 cup apple juice
1/4 tsp. dried red pepper seeds
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground clove
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
1/2 tsp. ground allspice

In saucepan combine the carrots, apple juice or cider, pepper seeds, sugar, ginger, cinnamon, clove, nutmeg (preferably freshly ground) and allspice, and coat carrots thoroughly. Bring mixture to low boil over medium heat, stirring often. As mixture thickens, begin to stir constantly, taking care not to allow liquid to scorch. Carrots should be crispy tender, and sauce mixture should be a thick coating.

Olmert invited Arabs to join peace summit

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Sunday invited Arab leaders to a regional peace conference, saying that he would look there for an exchange of views about solving the Mideast conflict.

Speaking at a joint news conference with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who is the current head of the European Union, he said, "I would even take advantage of this important opportunity to be with the EU president to invite all Arab heads of state, including the king of Saudi Arabia, to a meeting.

"I think the readiness to accept Israel as a fact and to debate the terms of a future solution is a step that I cannot help but appreciate," Olmert added.

The United States and Egypt have proposed that Israel agree to quickly start talks with a committee of Arab states on how to move the peace process forward, diplomats involved in the matter said on Sunday.

While generally welcoming a peace initiative endorsed by Arab leaders at a summit last week in Saudi Arabia, Israel has called several key components problematic and has been noncommittal about how to proceed.

At the summit, Arab leaders revived a five-year-old peace plan that offers Israel normal ties with all Arab countries in return for withdrawal from land seized in the 1967 Six Day War, creation of a Palestinian state and a "just solution" for Palestinians displaced in 1948 with Israel's creation.

But Israel opposes giving Palestinian refugees the right of return to their former homes in Israel, and it wants to hold onto some of the major settlement blocs in the West Bank.

In weekend talks with Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and other officials, Washington and Cairo proposed that Israel agree to take part "as soon as possible" in a meeting with a working group approved by the Arab summit that could begin negotiating a possible agreement.

"Arab League countries would talk formally and publicly as a collective with Israel," one diplomat said, calling the effort unprecedented in its potential scope. Talks in the past have generally been on a bilateral basis, the diplomat said.

Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas on Sunday called on Israel to take constructive steps in response to a new Arab peace initiative.

"I call on the Israeli government to take constructive steps to answer the peace initiative put forward by Arab countries," Abbas said at a separate news conference with Merkel.

Arab leaders agreed to set up a committee to follow up on the peace proposal in talks with the Quartet (European Union, United States, Russia and the United Nations) of Middle East mediators and other "international parties."

Livni on Sunday said that Israel seeks to promote dialogue with moderate Arab states in order to "seek peace and normalization" in the Middle East.

She said she spoke over the weekend with Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit but offered no details.

Senior American diplomats also spoke over the weekend with Livni's aides and urged Israel to take up the Arab offer to quickly start talking with the working group.

Initially, Israel may hold joint talks with at least Egypt and Jordan, and possibly other countries, but not Saudi Arabia, the diplomats said.

The United Nations has raised the idea of holding an expanded meeting of the Quartet that would include Israeli and Saudi leaders, but the Saudis balked at a public meeting, the diplomats said.

In an interview with Time magazine last week, Olmert said, "I can tell you that if I'd had an opportunity to meet with King Abdullah of the Saudis – which I have not – he would be very surprised to hear what I have to say.

"I look very favourably at the active role the Saudis are now playing in the Middle East for many years," Olmert added, calling the Saudi peace initiative "a very interesting approach."

Israel Briefs

Arrow passes another test

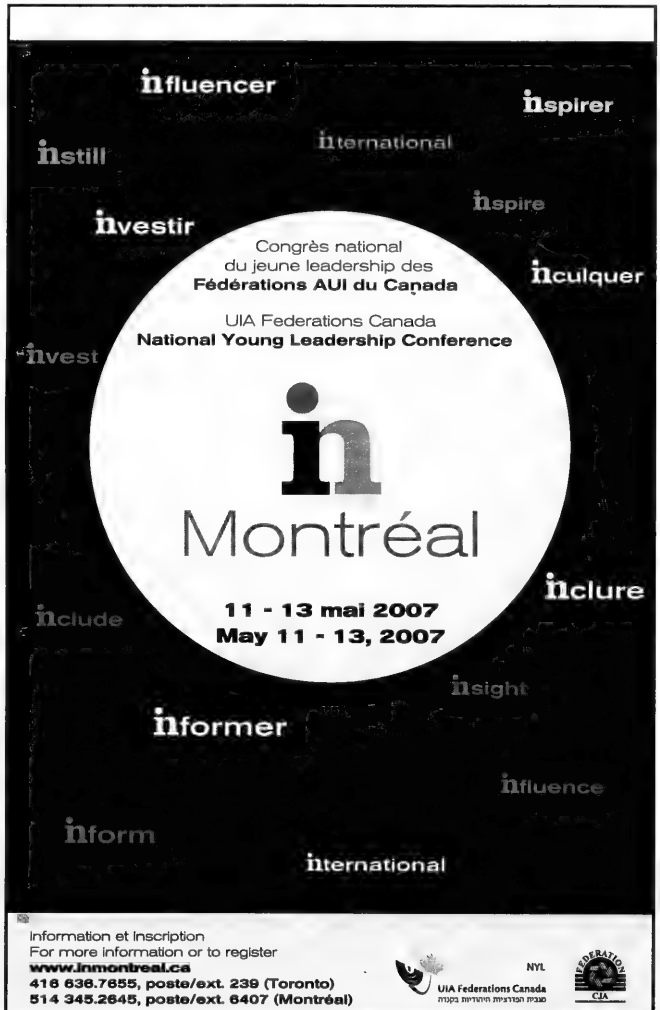
Israel's Arrow II anti-missile defence system passed another test. The Arrow, envisaged as Israel's main bulwark against any future ballistic missile attacks by Iran or Syria, was fired this week in what the Defence Ministry said was a successful test of its avionics. The U.S. Missile Defense Agency has taken part in its development. Out of 16 live tests, the Arrow has passed 13, Israeli sources say.

Saudis admit Israeli

Saudi Arabia admitted an Israeli journalist for the first time. Orly Azoulay, a U.S.-based correspondent for Yediot Achronot, flew to Riyadh last week as part of a press delegation accompanying UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon at the Arab League summit. Azoulay wrote that Ban, "who is now working to promote the Saudi peace initiative between Israel and the Arab states, wanted to convey a message of conciliation: He believed that if he were to bring together on his plane Arab journalists and an Israeli media representative, he would succeed in partially breaking the ice."

Regular meetings set

Ehud Olmert and Mahmoud Abbas agreed to meet twice a month, the U.S. secretary of state announced. Condoleezza Rice's statement followed three days of shuttle diplomacy between the two sides. The scheduled discussions between the Israeli prime minister and Palestinian Authority president could include plans to form a Palestinian state, in addition to discussing everyday details of the two sides' relationship. Rice said practical issues to be addressed include stopping Palestinian rocket attacks from Gaza and improving conditions at Israeli crossing points for Palestinians and their commercial goods.



Paris lawyer will continue the case against French state railway

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"We will continue our fight for justice," said French lawyer Avi Bitton last week, shortly after learning that an appeals court had overturned a ruling that France's state railway should compensate the families of Jews deported to Auschwitz during the Holocaust.

Bitton, based in Paris, represents more than 400 Jewish families, including 20 from across Canada, who are pressing for compensation from the Société Nationale des Chemins de fer Français (SNCF).

Despite Bitton's assertion, Michael Marrus, an internationally known University of Toronto historian who has written books and monographs on the Holocaust in France and elsewhere, expressed skepticism about the wisdom of prosecuting the SNCF, and believes "it is time to move on."

Michael Marrus

During the four-year Nazi occupation of France, approximately 75,000 Jews, of whom 24,500 were French nationals, were sent to Auschwitz via the Drancy transit camp near Paris.

The pro-German Vichy regime, which reduced French Jews to second-class citizenship, gave the order to deport Jews from France on SNCF trains.

Last June, an administrative court in Toulouse ordered the SNCF to pay the equivalent of $82,000 (US) to the family of George Lipietz. A Polish Jew, he and his brother were transported to Drancy in an SNCF cattle car in May 1944.

Appealing the decision, the SNCF claimed that it was not responsible, since it was acting under orders.

Lipietz and his brother spent three months in Drancy before being liberated, but the vast majority of Jews transported to Drancy were later sent to Auschwitz, where all but about 2,500 were murdered.

Lipietz died after launching a complaint against the SNCF in 2001, but his son, Alain – a Green party member of the European Parliament – sued the SNCF and the French government, which holds a majority share in the railway.

After Alain Lipietz filed his claim, Bitton entered the case, arguing that the SNCF did not try to stop or slow down the deportation of Jews to Drancy.

Last week, an appeals court in Bordeaux accepted the SNCF argument that the case did not fall within the jurisdiction of the court in Toulouse.

The Bordeaux ruling was regarded as a victory for the SNCF, because more than 1,200 families and groups filed an appeal for compensation after last June's verdict in Toulouse.

In an interview, Bitton said the appeals court in Bordeaux did not judge "the merits of the case."

As he put it: "They only decided that the administrative tribunals and courts – which have exclusive jurisdiction on state entities – have no jurisdiction on the French railroad company."

Bitton said the case is still in play, given the fact that the Lipietz family has launched an appeal before the supreme administrative court, the Conseil d'État.

He pointed out that the SNCF won its case on the strength of "procedural arguments," adding that "the truth is bold, and we will continue our fight for justice."

Responding to the latest developments, Marrus said no one should be surprised by the verdict in Bordeaux.

"My first sense is that the Bordeaux court has it right. I have not yet read the judgment, so I cannot comment in detail. What I can say is that the decision to overturn the original judgment against the SNCF is not surprising and should not change our overall historical assessment of responsibility for the deportation of Jews from France, most of whom met their deaths in Auschwitz."

Saying that the Nazis were responsible for the shipment of Jews to Auschwitz by way of Drancy, he commented, "The responsibility falls mainly on the Nazi regime, whose decisions were responsible for the crime, and to a lesser degree on the French collaborationist regime of Vichy, which not only assisted the German occupiers, but which took the initiative, beginning in 1940, to persecute the Jewish minority in France."

However, these issues did not figure in the legal battle pitting Lipietz against the SNCF, he noted.

"What was at issue here was whether, in addition to important French efforts at reparation – an official acknowledgement of responsibility, restitution, pensions and the establishment of a national foundation for Holocaust memory – there should be legal remedies for some victims from one of the many institutions, the SNCF, that was part of the Holocaust."

Marrus said the case against the SNCF raises a number of questions: "How far should the quest for remedies through the courts go? Does this kind of lawsuit make sense more than 60 years after the event? To what degree was the SNCF independently responsible?"

Many Jews in France are skeptical of Lipietz's tactics, he noted.

"Serge Klarsfeld, who has done more than any single person to bring important French and German perpetrators to trial in France, [is] similarly opposed to the case against the French railways," Marrus said.

"Although the plaintiffs have declared their intention to appeal to the highest judicial level, I doubt that they will win. In legal terms, it is time to move on. That means that historians should continue their research, asking new questions and constantly re-evaluating the evidence we have, and for everyone else to ponder what the past has to teach us."

Low-radioactive energy used to transform waste

"It also makes a good recyclable material for building and paving roads," he assures them. Earlier, Shrem said in an interview that EER can take low-radioactive, medical and municipal solid waste and produce from it clean energy that "can be used for just about anything."

Using a system called plasma gasification melting technology (PGM) developed by scientists from Russia's Kurchatov Institute research centre, the Radon Institute in Russia, and Israel's Technion Institute – EER combines high temperatures and low-radioactive energy to transform waste.

"We go up to 7,000 degrees centigrade and end at 1,400 centigrade," says Moshe Stern, founder and president of the Ramat Gan-based company.

Shrem adds that EER's waste disposal reactor does not harm the environment and leaves no surface water, groundwater, or soil pollution in its wake. The EER reactor combines three processes into one solution: it takes plasma torches to break down the waste; carbon leftovers are gasified and inorganic components are converted to solid waste. The remaining vitrified material is inert and can be cast into molds to produce tiles, blocks or plates for the construction industry.

EER's Karmiel facility (and its other installation in the Ukraine) has a capacity to convert 500 to 1,000 kilograms of waste per hour. Other industry solutions, the company claims, can only treat as much as 50 kilograms per hour and are much more costly.

According to the journal Research Studies, "the production of nuclear weapons/power in the United States has left a 50-year legacy of unprecedented volumes of radioactive waste and contaminated subsurface media and structures... Nuclear waste generators include the national laboratories, industrial research facilities, educational and medical institutions, electrical power utilities, medical diagnostics facilities, and various manufacturing processes."

In the United States alone, Research Studies predicts that this year's market for radioactive waste-management technologies in America will cap $5.5 billion (US).

EER was founded in 2000 and has maintained a low profile until revealing its reactor last week. "We spent our time on R&D and building up the site in Israel which we started constructing in 2003. We realized that nobody was going to believe us unless we started doing the process physically. They always said it sounded too good to be true, so we had to prove it to them," said Shrem.

Back in 2004, the Ukrainian government put out a tender searching for a solution that would provide safer hazardous waste disposal methods. At that time, the country was looking for a way to treat its low-radioactive waste zones resulting from the Chernobyl explosion. EER sent in their proposal, and their technology won the bid.

According to Stern, the former Soviet Union was the first to build nuclear plants. Over the years they have generated "huge amounts of low-radioactive waste. They came to us looking for a solution," he said.

The Chernobyl nuclear meltdown on April 26, 1986, was beyond a doubt the largest civil nuclear explosion in the world and one still linked to thousands of deaths. More than 20 years after the explosion, the area around the reactor is still highly radioactive; and some 30,000 radioactive homes remain buried along with household appliances, food and clothing, explained Stern.

"The European community is afraid of what is happening there," notes Stern, warning that it is time for the cleanup to begin, even if it means making only a small dent in the massive pile. "The low-radioactive waste is slowly contaminating the water and will continue to do so over the 300 years it takes to break down."

And since new conventions have been set by the Basel Convention on the Control of Transboundary Movements of Hazardous Wastes and their Disposal, First World countries are no longer permitted to traffic their hazardous waste to third world nations – forcing Western countries to drum up immediate and responsible solutions.

With a strict eye over its operations by Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection, EER revealed its proof-of-concept to Israeli and foreign dignitaries in Aeblin, near Karmiel last week, showing how it can take mountains of municipal waste and reduce it to a pile of black rubble.

"We are not burning. This is the key word," Shrem said. "When you burn you produce dioxin. Instead, we vacuum out the oxygen to prevent combustion."

EER then purifies the gas and with it operates turbines to generate electricity. EER produces energy – 70 per cent of which goes back to power the reactor with a 30 per cent excess which can be sold.

"In effect, we are combining two of the most exciting markets in the United States – the environment and clean energy," says Stern, "We also reduce the carbon footprint."

The cost for treating and burying low-radioactive nuclear waste currently stands at about $30,000 per ton. The EER process will cost $3,000 per ton and produce only a 1 per cent per volume solid byproduct.

In the United States, EER is working to treat low-radioactive liquid waste and recently contracted with Energy Solutions, the largest American company in the field with 75 per cent of the United States market.

Based on the financial forecasts, EER is certainly giving a fresh meaning to the expression, one man's garbage is another man's treasure. But in EER's case, one's man's hazardous waste, may very well be EER's goldmine.

Falash Mora compound in Ethiopia shut

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — Following the closure of the main Jewish aid compound in Ethiopia, officials from other Jewish organizations involved in Ethiopian immigration said they would work to avert a humanitarian crisis.

Some 7,000 Falash Mora waiting to immigrate to Israel were left without welfare services in the wake of the compound's closure March 19 by Ethiopian authorities.

Located in the city of Gondar, the compound provides schooling and Jewish education, as well as some food aid and employment assistance, to the Falash Mora who live in adjacent neighbourhoods.

The facility is funded by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry (NACOEJ), but has been run by intermediaries ever since the New York-based group was barred from operating in Ethiopia after legal troubles 2½ years ago.

Those legal problems and a dispute with the local community forced the closure of NACOEJ's other Ethiopian aid compound, in Addis Ababa, in late 2004. That compound remains closed.

"The Beta Israel feeding and education compounds were ordered closed on Monday, March 19," NACOEJ's director of operations, Orlee Guttman, told JTA, using the Ethiopian appellation for the Falash Mora. "We hope they will re-open very soon."

NACOEJ does not sponsor any aid facilities in Ethiopia other than the multi-site Gondar compound.

The closure appears to have been prompted by a fight among locals interested in control of the substantial aid money being spent there – an estimated $1 million (US) per year in a desperately impoverished country where most people make about $1 per day – and greater say over who is and who is not eligible for aliyah.

This despite the fact community leaders have no say in determining who is eligible to immigrate to Israel and that U.S. Jewish groups have pledged not to fund any renegade communal leadership.

"It is my understanding that there are competing factions within the Ethiopian community itself who have called into question the leadership of the compounds," said the United Jewish Communities' (UJC) senior vice-president for Israel and overseas affairs, Doron Krakow, who happened to be in Gondar the day the compound was shuttered.

"Those who are interested in impugning the local leadership of the compound are looking for any way possible to knock these guys out."

Meanwhile, officials from other Jewish organizations said they would monitor the situation closely.

"Should there be a humanitarian need to feed those who are eligible for aliyah, the Jewish Agency will take action in order to feed and provide for the welfare of these people," said a spokesperson for the Jewish Agency for Israel, which manages immigration to Israel from Ethiopia.

Officials at the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which provides the Falash Mora with medical care, and the UJC federation umbrella group, which sponsors aid operations for the Falash Mora, have given similar assurances.

The Falash Mora are Ethiopians of Jewish ancestry whose progenitors converted to Christianity several years ago to escape economic and social pressures. They are now turning to Judaism in a bid to come to Israel, and they have been emigrating at a rate of 300 per month.

Crossing the Sea

The cool desert breeze lifted the flaps of the small tent. Inside, the family sat on the floor in a circle. The freshly baked matzot lay on a mat in front of them. "So, tell us about when you were slaves in Egypt!" burst out Benny.

"And how God punished them with the ten plagues!" added Sarah.

"The frogs and the fiery hail!" demanded Avi.

"The locusts! The wild animals!"

Abba threw up his hands. "I should tell you? You should tell me! You kids know all the stories already."

"Oh, please?"

"All right…I just wish there was something new to say."

"You never told us about the Red Sea."

"I didn't?"

"That's right," agreed Ima. "Every year, by the time we get up to that part, everyone's already falling asleep."

"I can't believe I never told you! That was the best part. Oh, but was it scary!"

"Tell us!" everyone chorused.

"Okay, okay…Where do I begin? Well, you already know about when we left Egypt. It was a glorious spring day. We were all singing happy songs of praise to God. Clutching the leftover matzot and maror from the night before, we marched triumphantly, no longer slaves to Egypt. A tall, pillar-like cloud glided before us, leading the way."

"So what about the Sea?" piped up Benny.

"I'm getting there! Six days later, we reached the Sea of Reeds, the Red Sea. We camped there, and I was sitting with my brother Judah when we heard the hoofbeats in the distance. People started screaming, and pandemonium broke loose. The ground trembled, and we could hear battle cries echoing across the desert.

"'What's going on?' I demanded.

"'The Egyptians are coming!' cried an old woman. 'God save us!'

"'What?'

"'Look!'

"I looked up, and saw thousands of mounted soldiers and war chariots streaming down the crest toward us!"

"But I thought they said you could go free!" said Sarah.

"They changed their mind. They wanted their slaves back," explained Ima.

"Were you scared?" asked Avi.

"I was terrified! In minutes they would overtake us. And there was nowhere to run, except into the water. I started crying. But Judah said to me, 'What are you afraid of? God has taken us so far. He's not going to let us die now.'

"Then the news reached us. God had told Moses that we should travel into the Sea!"

"I was close to Moses' tent," said Ima. "I saw him walk toward the Red Sea and raise his staff. Then he stretched his hand out over the water."

"And then what?"

"The wind started howling. It was getting dark. Huge waves leapt up in the water. But even so, people started walking into the ocean to obey God's command. At the lead was Nachshon, one of the tribal princes. The wind blew harder, harder."

"And then?"

"There was a deafening crash, and the water burst apart. Nachshon and the people with him were walking on the rocky ocean floor, and the water piled up like walls on both sides of them. Everyone followed them, and we walked between the towering walls of water. Many miracles happened that night."

"Like what?" demanded Benny.

"What, the splitting of the sea isn't enough for you?"

"You said many miracles!"

"Well," said Abba, "for example, I was telling my brother how hungry I was, when suddenly an apple popped out the water."

"Huh? How did that happen?"

"It was a miracle."

"You know," laughed Ima, "I think the biggest miracle of all was that nobody dropped anything as we ran through."

"You were running?"

"Of course! We were so scared. The Egyptian army was chasing us."

"Into the ocean?"

"That's right."

"That's crazy. Didn't they realize that the water could drown them? Hadn't they figured out after the ten plagues that God didn't want them to mess with us?"

"That's a very good point, Avi. They were blinded by hatred and greed."

"So then what happened?"

"Anyway, eventually we came out of the ocean onto the shore. And behind us, we could hear the Egyptians howling as they charged through the sea."

"And then?"

"Moses stretched out his hand again. And the walls of water collapsed. The sea crashed down on the Egyptian army, and they drowned in the churning waters. Soldiers and chariots, horses and riders disappeared. Gold and silver from the army chariots washed up on the shore."

Ima took off her golden bracelet. "You see this? It washed up from the Sea."

"Everyone was so grateful to God," continued Abba. "We realized that even though we had been so scared at first, it was all a setup, to make sure the Egyptians would never bother us again. We sang a song of thanks to God."

"It's getting late," said Ima. "It's time to eat the matzot."

Abba yawned. "Agreed."

"Wow, that was a great story!" said Sarah.

"I see nobody fell asleep."

"Are you kidding?" burst out Benny. "That was the best story ever. I felt like I was there!"

"You know, that's really the purpose of the Passover Seder. To relive what God did for us when he freed us from Egypt — as if we were really there."

The power of kindness

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Making the choice to be kind will always stand you in good stead. And indeed, in Gateway to Happiness, Zelig Pliskin writes: "When you develop a love for doing acts of kindness, you will be very happy every time you have the opportunity to do a chesed for others."

So what does this mean? We always have a choice in every human interaction to say a kind word, do a kind deed, or even just think kind thoughts before we speak or even act. The funny thing is that when we live with love in our hearts and with kindness, we actually feel happier. As Dennis Prager, the author of Happiness Is a Serious Problem, among many others, said in a talk recently in Toronto, as Jews we have a responsibility to be happy and to be a light to others.

Studies have shown that kind people live longer, are healthier, and are more productive and happier than others. When we wish others well, we feel good, too.

But being kind doesn't necessarily mean being a "human doormat" or a cloying handservant, says Piero Ferucci in his book The Power of Kindness: The Unexpected Benefits of Leading a Compassionate Life. Nor does it mean a superficial form of kindness. He writes: "Heaven save us from fakes, self-interested politeness, calculated generosity, superficial etiquette and even kindness against one's will."

In his inspirational book, Ferucci, one of the world's most respected psychologists, maintains that the trait of kindness will not only lead to our own individual happiness and the happiness of those around us, but will guide in a world that has become colder, or as he puts it: "We are in the midst of a 'global cooling' because you park your car and find out the parking attendant has been replaced by a meter. You wait for a letter from a friend and receive an e-mail. And rather than playing ball in the backyard, kids move in the virtual world of video games.

> Studies have shown that kind people live longer, are healthier, and are more productive and happier than others

"So with the absence of human warmth in all of these experiences, we need to inject even more kindness for ourselves, and for each other."

Indeed Aldous Huxley, who was a pioneer in the study of philosophies aimed at uncovering human potential, had a very simple answer when he was asked what the most effective techniques for transforming your life were. In a lecture toward the end of his life, he said: 'It is a little embarrassing that after years and years of research and experimentation, I have to say the best answer is – just be a little kinder."

In his book, Ferucci talks about how kindness is composed of many elements – honesty, warmth, forgiveness, sense of belonging, empathy, humility, patience, generosity, respect, gratitude, service to others and ultimately to joy, which is what we experience when we act from a place of kindness.

The truth is that being kind and compassionate are two of the qualities that lead you to a more meaningful existence and being kind just takes less energy than holding to old hurts and anger. When we act from a place of forgiveness, our hearts are lighter and more peaceful.

Have you ever noticed how your children glow when they do an act of kindness, especially when it becomes so natural, they don't even realize they're doing it? Invite your children and yourself to perform one act of kindness every day. As Aesop said, "No act of kindness, no matter how small, is ever wasted."

In what respect do you need to be kinder to others? In what respect do you need to be kinder to the world? And the one where most people get stuck is, in what respect do you need to be kinder to yourself?

I know that kindness and happiness go hand in hand and that we feel great joy when we act from a place of kindness and love.

The beauty and paradox of kindness is that to find our own happiness, often the best way to achieve it is to help other people and contribute to their happiness. Ultimately, when we are kind to others, it is the same thing as being kind to ourselves.

ENGLISH NOVELIST WINS $100,000 LITERARY PRIZE

British writer-teacher Tamar Yellin bagged her third major literary award recently when her 2005 novel The Genizah at the House of Shepher won the first Sami Rohr Prize for Jewish Literature. One of the largest literary awards anywhere, the prize is worth $100,000.

The novel had previously won Hadassah magazine's Ribalow Prize. Yellin also won the Reform Judaism Prize for Jewish Literature for a 2006 story collection, Kafka in Bronteland. "I'm thrilled and feeling slightly dizzy," she said from her home on the Yorkshire moors of England.

The Genizah at the House of Shepher tells the story of an English Jewish woman's search for a Hebrew text buried in her family's home in Jerusalem, with interwoven stories about her great-grandfather's emigration from England to Jerusalem and her father's return to England a century later.

The Sami Rohr Prize was established last year in honour of the 80-year-old philanthropist, currently of Miami and formerly of Bogota, Colombia. It will be given in alternating years to new works of fiction and non-fiction on themes of Jewish interest.

America's Most Wanted: The unsolved murder of a young Vancouver man is being featured on an upcoming edition of the television program America's Most Wanted, and a spokesperson for the show said he hopes it will help solve the case and bring relief to the victim's grieving parents.

Marc Rozen was "a wonderful Jewish man" who was killed three years ago "while trying to sell a diamond ring that he had bought for his fiancée," said Avery Mann, the show's director of public relations, who is himself Jewish and from Vancouver. "When the couple broke up, Marc tried to sell the ring and was murdered."

As the program explains, Rozen struggled with three attackers, two men and a woman, who robbed and fatally shot him; the gun was also used in a double homicide in the nearby town of Abbotsford.

"Having been born and raised in Vancouver, I have a personal family connection to this case, which is how the story first became known to us," Mann said. "I did the interviews with Marc's parents, Jack and Doreen Rozen. Marc's father is a Holocaust survivor and both of them pray every day that his killers will be caught."

The show airs on the Fox Network and CHUM TV stations on Saturday, April 14, 9 p.m.

Teen launches jazz CD in Toronto and Winnipeg

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Sixteen-year-old jazz singer Sophie Berkal-Sarbit's debut CD The Gypsy In My Soul will be released this month.

A Grade 11 student at Kelvin High School in Winnipeg, Berkal-Sarbit has been compared to the great jazz chanteuse Peggy Lee by jazz pianist Gene Dinovi.

Although she counts jazz singers Ella Fitzgerald, Sarah Vaughan, Carmen McRae and Dinah Washington as influences – which is evident by the many standards on her album to be released on April 10 – Berkal-Sarbit's first musical influence was her maternal grandfather, Rabbi Louis Berkal. Rabbi Berkal, 92, is one of Canada's oldest cantors and, in fact, recorded his debut CD at the age of 87.

"I would go to synagogue and hear him sing, and even though I wasn't completely sure what he was singing, I knew that it was magical and something I wanted to carry on. I know that we share a bond where singing is another way of expressing yourself," says Berkal-Sarbit, who lives with her manager-mother, Harriet Berkal; her father, Larry Sarbit, who owns a mutual-fund company; and her brother Manny, 11.

In 2001-02, Berkal-Sarbit received the best solo musical theatre award at the Canadian National Dance Championships for dancing and singing. In 2003, she won top vocalist honours at the New York International Festival held in Los Angeles, Las Vegas and at New York's Madison Square Gardens. By the time the New York engagement rolled around, her father – who according to his daughter has millions of jazz CDs in the basement – suggested she tackle a song from the genre. She selected Angel Eyes and was hooked, leaving musical theatre behind.

"Jazz was so much more challenging. There was so much more I could do with the songs, so I decided to stick with it. After winning the award, I was trying to find opportunities to sing. I wanted to get trained properly on how to sing jazz, I came across these people in Winnipeg who were trained. I made some demos," she says.

Bill King, a Toronto-based pianist, composer, record producer, publisher and broadcaster, was introduced to her music through musician Mike Murley, whom she had hired to back her up on her demos. King invited Berkal-Sarbit to sing as part of his Real Diva Series at JazzFM's Valentine's Day showcase and at the Toronto International Beaches Jazz Festival.

"Bill proposed the idea of making a CD, and I was absolutely thrilled because he was Bill King… and I hadn't even been singing jazz for that long. Working with Bill King has been really cool. I know how well-known he is, and for him to have such faith in me is really an honour," she says.

"I'm so excited. I don't even know what to expect because I've never had my own CD or even been to a CD release. It is going to be interesting," says the singer, who studies with famed vocal coach Elaine Overholt in Toronto and vocal instructor Helen White in Winnipeg.

When she's not singing, Berkal-Sarbit enjoys boxing at the gym, going to movies with friends and cooking Jewish food with her mom. Potato and onion knishes are her favourite to whip up.

The teenager is already thinking ahead to her second CD. "I want something very different for my next CD, just to show versatility," she says. "Also, I would really like to start writing my own songs. I definitely want another jazz album.

"After recording my last CD, I started listening to Kurt Elling – he's a jazz singer from Chicago. I would say that he would be my biggest influence now. His improvisation is absolutely amazing. He really makes a song his own. If you hear a normal jazz standard and then you heard him, you wouldn't even know it was the same song."

Berkal-Sarbit will be launching her CD in Toronto on April 11 at a new jazz venue: Live @ Courthouse, 57 Adelaide St. E. at 7 pm. Tickets are $10 at the door. In Winnipeg, she will have a launch on May 1 at the Berney Theatre.

She will also be performing at the National Jazz Awards on April 10 at Toronto's Palais Royale, 1601 Lakeshore Blvd. For more information, visit www.nationaljazzawards.com and www.sophieberkalsarbit.com.

Brave Old World performs songs of Lodz Ghetto

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Brave Old World's upcoming performances at Toronto's Isabel Bader Theatre will be filmed for a future documentary on the songs of the Lodz Ghetto.

The renowned Jewish music band Brave Old World will be performing songs sung in the World War II ghetto, where the Nazis confined the 230,000 Jews of Lodz, Poland. The concerts will be filmed by Canadian filmmaker David Kaufman, who directed Brave Old World's DVD Live in Concert.

Kaufman said the group is one of the leading Jewish bands around today.

"They are not simply a revival band as many of the good bands are – they also have reinvented Jewish music of prewar eastern Europe. They do a number of programs including their own music, most of the time, but this is a program of street songs from the Lodz Ghetto."

Most of the songs in the concert program were written by Yankele Herszkowicz, a street singer from the ghetto who survived the Holocaust, only to die by his own hand in the early 1970s. Kaufman said that many considered him a genius. His most famous song, which is included in the concert, is Rumkovski Khayim, named after the man whom the Nazis appointed leader of the Lodz Ghetto. These songs were first gathered in the 1980s by Israeli ethnomusicologist Gila Flam.

Kaufman said he was blown away by the group – whose members include vocalist, violinist and Yiddish expert Michael Alpert, musical director, accordionist and pianist Alan Bern, clarinettist Kurt Bjorling and Stuart Brotman who plays the bass, trombone, percussion, cimbalom and violin – when he saw them perform at KlezCanada in 1998.

"Brave New World take these songs, which sound relatively tuneless and ordinary when sung by ghetto survivors, and transforms them through wonderful arrangements into a window of the wide musical landscape of prewar and wartime Poland – marches, lullabies, tangos, theatre and folk songs, all in one program."

Kaufman, whose previous films include From Despair to Defiance: The Warsaw Ghetto Uprising and The New Klezmorim: Voices in the Revival of Yiddish Music, said the concert at Isabel Bader will be the centrepiece of his new documentary, so that people can see and hear the songs.

"I will be interviewing mostly survivors [for the film] and other knowledgeable people about the role of music and street music in the ghetto," he added.

Kaufman has interviewed notable Yiddish writer Chava Rosenfeld, who was born in Lodz and wrote what he calls the most important fictional account of life in the ghetto in her trilogy Trio of Life.

"The past is not dead," Kaufman said. "All the issues that people lived with, in the most dire circumstances in Jewish history, are issues that have resonances and echoes today. Not only for Jews but for all people.

"I think that when you see a program like this, it really contributes to an understanding of the human condition under very difficult circumstances and unfortunately circumstances that keep repeating themselves in history."

Brave Old World performs selections from their CD Song of the Lodz Ghetto, with surtitles, at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St. W. on April 7 at 8:30 p.m. and April 8 at 2 p.m.

Tickets are $36 and are available by calling 416-978-8849, online at www.uoftix.ca or at the University of Toronto box office in Hart House, 7 Hart Circle. It is open Monday to Friday, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Epic WWI battle brought to life by Toronto producer

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A new TV documentary, Vimy Ridge: Heaven to Hell, by Toronto production company Yap Films, is as edifying as it is entertaining.

In World War I, one of the fiercest battles took place on France's western front at a heavily fortified, seven-kilometre ridge held by entrenched German forces at Vimy.

It was considered almost unconquerable.

For 18 months French, British and assorted European allies assailed the ridge with nothing to show for it except nearly 200,000 soldiers lost.

Then, on April 9, 1917 Canadian troops came in, under British command, with revolutionary new battle techniques and took the ridge in just four days.

The Canadians took heavy losses, nearly 10,000 soldiers were killed or wounded in the offensive, but it was a major turning point of the Great War.

Elliott Halpern

According to Hamilton native Elliott Halpern, executive producer of the documentary and co-owner of Yap Films, it was also "a critical moment in Canadian history," the moment where Canada's warriors distinguished themselves for all time and the country found a national consciousness.

Halpern told The CJN he's always been fascinated by war and military achievement.

Though there are few veterans left from World War I, the film does an outstanding job of making the Vimy battle relevant for a new generation, depicting the harrowing conditions in which the troops had to live, and their gallantry in war.

A dearth of actual film from the era might have risked leaving the documentary as yet another dry history lesson. But Halpern and his crew overcame this impediment by using a combination of dynamic, computer-gaming style animation and live re-enactments to simulate the battles and tactics discussed.

Calling the Canadian assault on the ridge a "3D" innovation, Vimy Ridge unveils how Canadian field engineers and soldiers applied some creative strategies to unseat the Germans via a three-pronged approach.

By tunneling underground, triangulating enemy gunnery-bunkers by air for the first time and applying a new battlefield technique called the "creeping barrage," where artillery fell just in front of advancing troops, giving off smoke to mask soldier movements from enemy fire, the Canucks were able to win the day.

The film also follows the story threads of three Goderich, Ont. soldiers, each of whom played a role in the various dimensions of the attack, and helps bring a human side to the documentary.

Most striking are scenes where Vimy Ridge archaeologists dig up assorted patches of land on location in France and discover intact tunnel systems, discarded ammunition, skeletons and all manner of materiel used by the allied troops 90 years ago.

The filmmakers and on-screen crew alike couldn't help but be moved upon finding an underground staging area, replete with the desperate wall etchings of Canadian soldiers, bidding farewell to their loved ones before being dispatched to their fates.

Of particular import in this scene is the abundant presence of the maple leaf engraved on the walls at a time before it was Canada's national symbol.

With Canada barely 50 years old at the time of the battle, the film asserts that the soldiers began viewing themselves as more than just British subjects and turned to the maple leaf as a newfound symbol among countrymen.

Canada's War Museum website calls Vimy Ridge, "more than just an important battlefield victory... men from all regions of Canada were present at the battle. Brigadier-General A.E. Ross declared after the war, 'in those few minutes I witnessed the birth of a nation.'"

That nation included the more than 130 Jews who fought for Canada in World War I.

One of those, Pte. Max Rodin of the 78th Canadian Infantry's Manitoba Regiment, has his name enshrined on the Vimy Ridge monument, though he died in 1916, six months before the Canadian assault on the ridge.

Vimy Ridge is compelling viewing for anyone interested in Canadian military history.

So compelling, in fact, that, according to reports, the Queen herself has ordered a copy of the film so she can view it in advance of this year's commemoration ceremony at the Vimy monument.

Vimy Ridge premiered on History Television last Monday. It airs again on April 8 at 6 p.m. to commemorate the 90th anniversary of the battle.

Emma Lazarus considered a writer of first rank

Emma Lazarus by Esther Schor, Nextbook-Schocken, New York.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Emma Lazarus, who died 120 years ago at the premature age of only 38, fixed her place in American literary history through her poem The New Colossus, which famously graces a bronze plaque at the base of the Statue of Liberty.

Some of its stanzas are too well known to need repeating even today, but, ironically, the poem languished in obscurity for years after Lazarus penned it and only came to light through an accidental discovery in a bookshop.

Emma Lazarus

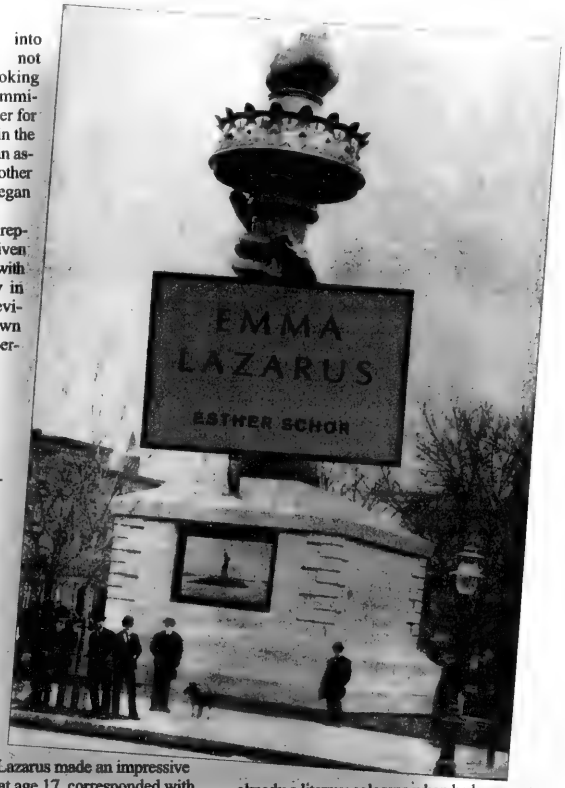
Like Walt Whitman, Bret Harte, Mark Twain and other authors, Lazarus had been approached in 1883 to submit a poem to be auctioned off to raise funds for Miss Liberty's pedestal: this was to be a people's monument. At first the American-born poet insisted she "could not possibly write verses to order," no matter how worthy the cause.

Dissatisfied with this response, Constance Cary Harrison, one of the chief fundraisers, tried to spur and inspire her: "Think of the Goddess of Liberty standing on her pedestal yonder in the bay and holding the torch out to those refugees you are so fond of visiting at Ward's Island," she said; and as Harrison would later recall, "the shaft sped home."

Lazarus submitted her poem two days later; it became part of a collection auctioned off for $1,500, then was promptly forgotten. New York's towering lady of the harbour was dedicated in 1886 and Lazarus died the following year, never imagining her name and verses would become inextricably linked with the iconic statue.

The poet's friend, artist Georgiana Schuyler, discovered the poem in a bookstore in 1903 and arranged for its words to adorn the bronze plaque. From that day on, the famous statue gained a cultural context that took in the sweep of history. It would not be just a glorified harbour ornament, but rather a poignant celebration of American democracy and freedom. Appropriately enough, in the age of mass inbound immigration, Lazarus' famous lines defined the statue as a welcoming beacon for the "tired… poor… huddled masses" of Europe, fleeing regimes under which the older colossi of tyranny and repression were still untoppled.

As Esther Schor notes in her recent literary biography Emma Lazarus, The New Colossus soon went into eclipse but not before "yoking statue and immigrants" together for the first time in the public mind, an association that other artists soon began to fortify.



The poet's reputation was given another boost with the discovery in 1980 of a previously unknown cache of her personal letters. Published in 1995, they became the impetus for Schor's probing scholarship, which penetrates deeper into Lazarus' personality and personal life than any previous biographer.

Born to a wealthy Jewish family in New York City in 1849, Lazarus made an impressive literary debut at age 17, corresponded with Ralph Waldo Emerson and Henry James, and turned her pen to burning issues of Jewish concern such as the Russian pogroms. "She was a woman so far ahead of her time that we are still scrambling to catch up with her – a feminist, a Zionist and an internationally famous Jewish American writer before these categories even existed," Schor writes.

Besides poetry, Lazarus dabbled in a variety of forms, including theatre criticism, historical essays and dramatic monologues. She wrote a novel about Goethe and translated the writings of Heinrich Heine, the German Jewish poet. She was an outspoken critic of racial prejudice and an untiring defender of the Jewish people at a time when the doors of many private clubs and establishments in America were closing to them.

She was an articulate, one-person Jewish Defence League of her day, writing articles and rebuttals for some of America's top magazines and relying only on the strength of her words to win the debate.

Schor describes her subject's visit to a temporary refugee shelter in Ward's Island in New York harbour following the rash of violence in Russia in the early 1880s. Deeply moved by what she saw, Lazarus worked to help the Jewish refugees find homes, jobs and a respected place in America society. Her sympathy for the plight of the impoverished, transplanted immigrants found perfect expression in The New Colossus.

American writer Ralph Waldo Emerson was already a literary colossus when he became acquainted with Lazarus's poetry; they began a correspondence and she dedicated a volume to him. Generous in his praise for her work, he became an important mentor and support to her. Regrettably, she took it as a personal affront when he chose not to include one of her poems in an anthology he had edited, and wrote him a letter bristling with disappointment.

"I can only consider this omission as a public retraction of all the flattering opinions and letters you have sent me, and I cannot in any degree reconcile it with your numerous expressions of extravagant admiration," she wrote. "This public neglect is in such direct variance with the opinion you have expressed to me in private, that it leaves me in utter bewilderment as to your real verdict…" The letter went on much longer in the same vein. Although she requested a reply from the aging writer, he gave none. When they met months later for the first time, she was again disappointed at how closely Emerson's wife guarded access to him.

Lazarus, although Jewish and a woman, was considered a writer of the first rank in her day. She was a champion not just of Jewish liberties but also of universal civil rights and the best in American democratic ideals. She celebrated her various identities fully in harmony with the spirit of Whitman's famous poetic proclamation, "I am large, I contain multitudes." For this, she deserves to be remembered as Schor has done so well – as a trailblazer who left a positive and indelible mark on American letters and life.

Filmmaker to be honoured at MIPDOC in Cannes

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

While I wait to meet director Larry Weinstein in the reception area of Rhombus Media – the company he joined in 1979 – I can't help but notice row upon row of awards on display. A tall man comes out to greet me – it's Larry – the guru of music documentaries.

Then we sit down for coffee and mandelbrot and discuss his love of music (inspired by his parents, Bill and Marilyn) and his films, which are highly praised.

This year, Hot Docs – the film festival that features documentary filmmakers – selected Weinstein as an "international trailblazer" for his innovation and creativity. Weinstein, one of eight filmmakers from around the world, will also be honoured this month at MIPDOC, an international showcase for documentary screenings in Cannes.

"I was asked to represent Canada. It is very moving when these things happen," the 50-year-old director says.

"I've been asked to show one of my films, and I've decided on Mozartballs because I know the other films are going to be heavy issue-oriented, but I want to show something out of the ordinary – it's fun to give audiences something different."

Weinstein's 2006 film Mozartballs takes a sensitive yet light-hearted look at Mozart's life through testimonies of five fans who idolize him. There's David Cope, whose computer program can write a Mozart concerto as quick as you can double click; Konrad Rich, a retired teacher who believes Mozart saved his life; and Franz Vieböck, an Austrian astronaut who takes Mozartballs – Mozartkugeln (chocolate) – into space.

Weinstein took Steph Waller who believes she's Mozart – his spirit lives within her – and Lynette Erwin who thinks she's Mozart's true love, Nancy Storace, to Vienna and Salzburg, to film them.

Portraying his subjects without "compromising their integrity" is paramount, he says.

How does Weinstein achieve this? He immerses himself in his work. To prepare for Mozartballs, he and scriptwriter Thomas Wallner, his longtime collaborator, spent time with their subjects.

"I want them to be comfortable with me, and I want to be comfortable with them. In fact, I spent more time with them in the research stage than in the filming," Weinstein says.

When asked how he can balance his family and work with that kind of commitment, he replies, "Balance, that's a really good question – there have been times when I travel a lot and other times when I travel more. Mary and our daughters Ali and Dania have accompanied me on several work-related trips, but that's the rare exception, so I'm thankful that they're so tolerant of my ridiculous work schedule."

Weinstein's "ridiculous work schedule" has earned him many awards, including Emmys, Genies, Golden Sheafs, Rose Dors (golden roses), Nombre Dors, Gold Apples, Gold Cameras, Golden Gates and Golden Pragues. They are a testimony to his incredible body of work – Mozartballs, Beethoven's Hair and Ravel's Brain, to name a few.

Beethoven's Hair, a journey of intrigue, follows the path of Beethoven's locks, which travel from Austria to Germany, and in 1942, to Denmark, saving lives of Jews hiding from Hitler, and then to Sotheby's auction house in Arizona in 1994, where the hair is bought by two Beethoven fanatics. Dramatic reconstructions and expert testimonies uncover the story while Beethoven's music is performed.

Weinstein's first film, Making Overtures, about a community orchestra in Cobourg, won a Gemini at the inaugural ceremony of the awards. Since then, he's had 26 personal nominations, 11 personal wins and his films have won many awards. He has directed 25 films that have been broadcast in 40 countries and filmed in 11 languages.

You won't see orchestra after orchestra performing in concert halls or a narrator reciting details about the composer's life in his films.

What you will see is Weinstein's creativity in action. The rock musician Lou Reed, in his "stripped-down" style, sings Kurt Weill's September Song in a mysterious warehouse, in The Music of Kurt Weill: September Songs. In Ravel's Brain, two dancers – choreographed by Robert Desrosiers – perform a portion of the ballet Daphnis and Chloë. In Solidarity Song: The Hanns Eisler Story, Ernst Busch sing's Eisler's The Secret Mobilization, protesting fascism. The scene is set in a steel factory.

Weinstein researches composers and gets actors to give first-person accounts of their lives. "I want you to feel their presence. I want you to hear their words and hear their struggles, and their frustrations in their own lives," he says.

It's not surprising that some of Weinstein's films are about composers who fought for people's rights – those with a social conscience – including Schoenberg, Shostakovich, Eisler and the composer of Bolero, Maurice Ravel – Weinstein's personal favourite since he was 13.

"Ravel was not a political person, but he was a very humanistic person. He was kind to the Jews. When Hitler came in and refugees would come to the door, the composer would give them money," Weinstein says.

"Ravel was a profound atheist whose only religious music was Hebrew folk music. He always identified with the suffering of the Jews."

Weinstein recently went to Prague and visited Theresienstadt while he was in the Czech Republic with Wallner and producer Jessica Daniel, preparing to make the documentary Inside Hana's Suitcase, about Hana Brady who perished in Auschwitz at the age of 13.

Production is set to begin in June in Toronto, with most of the funding coming from the Canadian government and broadcasters who were quick to commit to the project.

DVDs of Larry Weinstein's films are available at Amazon.com.

Let them stay or send them away

By YOSEF ISRAEL ABRAMOWITZ

KIBBUTZ KETURA, Israel — With two miles of bare footprints behind them, Ahmed and Fatima, and their three children, approached the border with Israel in the middle of a cold winter night. Snow was falling in the Sinai.

Avoid the Egyptian military patrols, they were warned by their Bedouin smugglers, whom they paid with money borrowed from Sudanese friends.

"If they catch you, you could be shot or deported back to Sudan," the Bedouins said.

The 12-hour trip from Cairo was the last leg of a multi-year journey stretching from the violence of Darfur to Sudan's dangerous capital, Khartoum, to the teeming streets of Cairo. Ahmed had been imprisoned in each city.

Israel was their last hope for what Fatima calls "a normal life" without the "fear of being sent back to Sudan."

Two hours after dusting the sand off their dark clothing from crawling under two security fences, their 5-month-old baby's cry pierced the silence of the frigid Negev air.

The response was an Israeli military spotlight.

"Do you know where you are?" the soldiers called out in Arabic.

"Yes," they answered.

"Why are you here?"

"Because we were mistreated in Egypt."

"Who are you?"

"We are Sudanese."

Ahmed lowered his two-year-old son from his shoulders and held up his Sudanese passport, as well as the worn yellow card from the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, or UNHCR. The card had been obtained in Cairo and saved them from being deported back to Sudan, as the Egyptian police had threatened.

The Israeli soldiers gave the children their green military coats.

"We were afraid of the Egyptian army, not of the Israeli army," Ahmed recalled later.

In an often reluctant ritual that has been repeated almost weekly for two years with Sudanese sneaking into Israel, Israel Defence Forces patrols gathered up the tired refugee family, placed them in an ambulance and handed them over to the Border Police. The Border Police sent Ahmed to Ketziot prison for violating the Infiltration Law, a 1954 statute enacted against enemy combatants. If the experience of others before him is any precedent, Ahmed could remain incarcerated for at least a year, until Israel figures out what to do with him and the more than 120 other imprisoned Sudanese.

Fatima and the children were sent to a battered women's shelter in the western Galilee that has largely been taken over by Sudanese refugees whose husbands are in prison.

The failure of the United Nations to cope with the doubling of refugee applications in the past decade, or to intervene to prevent the genocide in Darfur has had ripple effects throughout the world.

That now includes Israel and the Jewish world.

Faced with genocidal threats from Iran and terrorist groups, a legacy of the Holocaust, and even echoes of the Exodus 3,700 years ago, Israel is torn between its commitment to universal humanitarian concerns and its own security interests.

After two years of legal challenges and growing Israeli media attention, the issue now is coming to a critical juncture.

The practice of arresting and indefinitely detaining Sudanese asylum seekers on security grounds is being tested in the courts even as Israeli Border Police are showing signs of resisting the orders to arrest and detain the refugees crossing the borders.

Major international human rights figures have embraced the cause, and a handful of Knesset members and activists in Israel are pressing for a resolution of the crisis. Some of these activists in turn have strong ties to the American Jewish community, which has embraced the cause of Darfur as a top humanitarian priority.

Some 200,000 to 400,000 people have been killed in the Darfur region of western Sudan. Another 2.5 million have been displaced.

Israel's quandary is a difficult one.

"Sudanese refugees are right now considered enemy nationals since Sudan is an Islamic fundamentalist country," explained Anat Ben Dor, the country's leading refugee rights lawyer, who has emerged as a top advocate for the Sudanese refugees. "Yet Israel is a signatory to the International Convention on Refugees, which guarantees humane treatment and a safe haven from genocide."

Ben Dor, 40, directs the Tel Aviv University Law School Refugee Rights Clinic, and in late February filed suit against the government for its alleged treatment of three refugees.

Israel helped author the convention in the aftermath of World War II. Jewish refugees fleeing Nazi Germany were routinely refused safe haven because they, like the current Sudanese, were classified as enemy nationals.

Activists enjoyed a small victory March 21 when Israel's Supreme Court gave the state 45 days to determine whether the detainees were getting a fair and proper judicial review.

"Bringing justice is the issue here," said Supreme Court Chief Justice Dorit Beinisch, who is presiding over a three-judge panel hearing the case.

"This is very significant," said Ben Dor, who together with the Hotline for Migrant Workers, filed the appeal to the court arguing that those Sudanese arrested and put in jail for illegally entering the country should not be charged as infiltrators of an enemy state.

The petition against Israel's defence and interior ministers argues that even though 150 Sudanese have been released into alternative detention, the lack of formal judicial review makes the detention illegal. Under Israeli law, other nationals who sneak through the Sinai desert into Israel are charged with the Law of Entry. In those cases, the government must review their cases every 30 days and justify their imprisonment. But since Sudanese are considered "enemy nationals," they are charged under the harsher Infiltration Law, which has no official review mechanism and by which detainees can be held indefinitely.

Irwin Cotler, Canada's former minister of justice and human rights attorney to such well known dissidents as Natan Sharansky and Nelson Mandela, has joined with the Israel Bar Association in filing supporting documents on behalf of the Sudanese to the Israeli High Court.

"Israel should be more part of the international struggle against genocide in Darfur," Cotler said. "If Israel grants refugee status or temporary resident status to the Sudanese, it can be Israel's own modest contribution to speaking up against the genocide rather than interring them and making the opposite statement."

Although the numbers are fluid, an estimated 300 Sudanese have arrived in Israel over the past two years. Of these, some 120 remain in prison; the rest are in alternative detention, meaning crisis centres, kibbutzim or moshavim, where many of them work and live but are not free to leave the premises.

Another estimated dozen or so Sudanese men in the Sinai are partnered with Israeli women and have children, but cannot enter Israel for fear of arrest.

Sigal Rozen, 39, co-founded the Hotline for Migrant Workers with a grant from the New Israel Fund. Her tiny fourth-floor offices next door to a Tel Aviv police station are a hot spot for undocumented workers of all colors and nationalities who come knocking for assistance.

The hot line brings them to the U.N. High Commissioner on Refugees offices to get protection papers, documents that verify their refugee status so they can qualify for a temporary work visa.

"There are people from all over the world who come to Israel," Rozen said. ``If a Turk and a Chinese come across the border with a Sudanese, only the Sudanese is imprisoned. That is discrimination."

Israeli government officials say the situation is a difficult one.

"The Israeli government is endeavoring to deal with this issue as humanely as possible," said Mark Regev, a spokesman for the Foreign Ministry. "Jewish history has made us especially sensitive to genocide. No one is being sent back to the inferno in Darfur."

At the same time, he said, "we have to take precautions" to minimize the security risk given where the refugees come from.

In the March 21 court case, state attorneys argued that the system was working and there was no need to change the legalities under which the Sudanese are being held.

Some officials, in private conversations and in Knesset testimony, contend that beyond the immediate security concerns about individual Sudanese, the greater fear is the ripple effect of even more refugees seeking asylum in the Jewish state. The fault lines drawn around the refugee battle between those advocating deportation and those advocating granting asylum are "a paradox," as one high-ranking Jewish organizational official called it.

"Israel is deeply sensitive to the issue of genocide," this official said, "but it is also worried about a massive influx of Sudanese at its border."

The prevailing government preference is to deport the refugees back to Egypt – if Egypt will guarantee it will not deport them back to Sudan.

"The natural and correct solution is a return to Egypt," Eliyahu Aharoni, deputy director of the Immigration Police, testified to the Knesset in late December.

"Sudan is one of six nations that supports Islamic terror," he said. "All the security services say that there is a danger when it comes to the Sudanese. Detention or alternative detention is legitimate in a democratic country and also in the State of Israel."

Debate is being waged about how many Sudanese would seek refuge here if the detainees are released from prison and accorded good treatment in the Jewish state.

"What we do here will determine if 3 million will come" from Egypt or will stay there, said Yossi Edelshtein, director of the Enforcement Unit of the Immigration Police.

The 3 million figure is often cited by Israeli policy makers, particularly in the security services. But others dispute those figures.

"Anyone who talks about millions of Sudanese coming to Israel is scare-mongering," said Michael Kagan, an American human rights lawyer who has worked in Israel and Egypt. "No one even knows that there are millions of Sudanese in Egypt; some estimate there are only a few hundred thousand.

``But in any case, we're not talking about all Sudanese. We're talking about refugees," he said. ``The U.N. says there are only 15,000 Sudanese refugees in Egypt, and of these, how many are going to pay big money, risk their lives and risk arrest to go over the desert to Israel?"

As to the porous border with Egypt, it is not the Sudanese that Israel most worries about but terrorists like Muhammed Faisal Saksak. On Jan. 29, the 21-year-old Palestinian crossed the border about 12 miles north of the resort city of Eilat and blew himself up in a small bakery, killing three.

In either a slip of the tongue or a calculated leak to remind the Knesset of the potential security risks of too liberal an asylum policy, Aharoni of the Immigration Police revealed to legislators in his Knesset testimony that "it appears that one Sudanese refugee belonging to al-Qaida was released."

Half a dozen ministries, including the Prime Minister's Office, would not respond to queries about the link.

Daniel Ben-Zaken, the director of Ketziot prison, which is holding many of the detainees, told JTA: "We asked and we received no information about anyone connected to anything like that."

In 2005, the security forces caught 5,600 people trying to infiltrate across the Egyptian-Israeli border, including drug and weapon smugglers, women destined for prostitution, foreign workers and refugees. In 2006, 100 of those caught trying to infiltrate belonged to terror organizations, according to Israeli media reports. That same year, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees in Israel saw an increase in its case load, with 1,600 applying for refugee or asylum status, up from 1,000 in 2005.

Most of the increase was from foreign workers who did not want to return to their native lands, often because of wars in the Congo, Sierra Leone, the Ivory Coast and other African countries. The number of Sudanese seeking protection in Israel started to increase after Egyptian police killed 27 and injured several hundred Sudanese refugees protesting outside the UNHCR office in Cairo at the end of December 2005.

None of the Sudanese who have crossed into Israel in the past 18 months has been granted asylum or temporary refugee status, according to Michael Bavli, head of the UNHCR office in Israel.

This contrasts with the some 200 asylum seekers from many countries, including some Sudanese, who had been granted permanent asylum in Israel between 1985 and 2005.

A Knesset lobby headed by Labor Party member Avishai Braverman and Likud member Gilad Erdan formed last November to "push for the release of all the prisoners who have sought asylum in Israel," said the lobby spokesman Yehuda Minkovitz.

Its focus is having the prisoners released and then advocating for at least some being granted permanent asylum status in Israel.

"I am ashamed as a person and as a Jew," Braverman told JTA, referring to the practice of imprisoning asylum seekers. "We of all people have to know how to behave."

Yosef Israel Abramowitz is an award-winning journalist and founder of socialaction.com. JTA correspondent Dina Kraft in Israel contributed to this piece. The names of the refugees have been changed to protect from reprisals against family members in Arab countries.

Israeli teams gear up for IIHF tournaments

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When you're putting together Israel's national senior and junior hockey teams, it's always a challenge.

Finding capable skaters is hard enough. Israel's stock of top players is not so deep, and getting them to commit to playing makes it even harder. Unlike other countries that compete at the higher levels of International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) spring tournaments, Israel must rely almost exclusively on amateur players. That means they often have other commitments and are unavailable to the national program.

Last year, when Israel's senior team advanced to Division I (one level behind the elite section that includes Canada, Russia and Sweden), they relied on the talents of the Eizenman brothers – Alon, who played professionally in France, Oren who starred with RPI Engineers in the NCAA, and Erez, another talented player.

This year, none of the Eizenmans is available and the team's organizers are hopeful that Max Birbraer, who's playing semi-pro for a team in Wales, will be through with his playoffs so he can join the team in time for game one of their tournament in Seoul.

Israel will line up against teams from the host South Koreans, North Korea, Mexico, Australia and Iceland in Division II, Group B of the IIHF. Last year, they faced pro-stocked teams from England, France and Hungary, among others. The Israelis went 0-5 in that tournament and were sent back to the more familiar confines of Division II, where they have historically been one of the better teams.

This year, acknowledged Alan Maislin, head of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel, "it'll be tough for us. We have a challenge ahead of us. Last year, our guys earned the right to get to Division I. We were the only team that was 100 per cent amateur. Every other team was 100 per cent professional."

With the absence of the Eizenman brothers, unavailable because of "school issues," 2007 is shaping up as a "transition year," Maislin said.

Senior team coach Jean Perron, the one-time Montreal Canadiens bench boss and Stanley Cup winner, has brought up some of the better Israeli juniors to add to the mix.

Alan Maislin, left, chair of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel, Sergei Matin, centre, its Israeli president, and head coach Jean Perron have the senior and junior teams ready for two IIHF tournaments.

Israel should be strong between the pipes with Jevgeni Gussin in goal and in addition to Birbraer, the team has Itzhik Levy and Daniel Bochner, who played semi-pro in Europe this year.

The senior tournament gets under way on April 2 and runs until April 8.

The Under-18 team, meanwhile, will compete in Budapest, Hungary in Division II, Group A from April 15-21.

They will face teams from Hungary, Estonia, Mexico, Belgium and the Netherlands.

Like the senior team, they will arrive a few days prior to the first game for two-a-day practices as Perron attempts to make a cohesive unit out of players from Israel and Canada.

While IIHF tourneys always get the competitive juices going, skaters from the senior and junior squads will have an opportunity this summer for a more fun event. The first-ever World Jewish Hockey Championship will be held in Metulla beginning on July 12 – the one-year anniversary of the Israel/Hezbollah war. The event will see six teams representing seven countries participate. In addition to the host Israelis, teams will represent Canada, the United States, Mexico, France, Sweden and Russia. The latter two countries will contribute players for a single Baltic team, Maislin said.

The Americans will be managed by former New York Ranger GM Neil Smith and one-time LA King player and coach Dave Taylor is expected behind the bench. The French team will be coached by the national team's head man, Dave Henderson, a Canadian, while the Mexican national team coach will lead that country's Jewish team. The French squad will include three national team players and the Mexican team will have two skaters from that country's national team, Maislin said.

The tournament will open with a ceremony to commemorate last year's war.

Alex Voihanski, general manager of the Canadian entry, said he has been actively scouting Jewish players for some time and networking with hockey people to put together a strong team. He has compiled "a large list" of players from the NHL (Mike Cammalleri) to Tier II Junior A, with plenty of representation from the NCAA, CIAU, AHL and ECHL.

Invitations to the pros and college players went out a few weeks ago and at press time, he had 14 skaters and two goalies who had committed to the tournament. It was still early to determine whether the pros and top pro prospects would agree to participate though virtually all had expressed interest. However, top players faced insurance issues, along with crowded schedules, training regimens and other hurdles to overcome.

Nevertheless, Voihanski believes "we'll be the team to beat."

He hopes to put together "a good blend of professional hockey players and junior players."

Players are enthusiastic when they hear his pitch, which comes down to a once-in-a-life-time opportunity to play hockey for Canada, in Israel, with top Jewish players from around the world. In addition, for those young players hungry to move their careers forward, playing in front of people with NHL connections can't hurt, he said.

A successful tournament could also signal to the IIHF that Israel can host an international event despite its notorious security concerns. An IIHF junior competition was withdrawn last year from Metulla, which is on Israel's northern border with Lebanon, because of safety concerns. That was well before last summer's war with Hezbollah.

First it was MySpace and now it's Facebook. The days of picking up the phone or even sending a quick e-mail to say hello are done now that there are online programs designed to keep you updated on anyone and everyone you've ever come across without ever lifting a finger.

Call me old-fashioned, but this generation tech that I belong to is starting to scare me. Case in point: a bunch of girls got together recently to celebrate my best friend's birthday at her house. It had been a while since we all had the chance to catch up, but within the first hour and for the rest of the night, we were huddled around her computer logged on to Facebook, looking up old crushes, old nemeses and even some old friends, wondering what they've been up to.

Gossip has been taken to a whole new level.

With a single name search, and without our object of curiosity ever suspecting a thing, we know their relationship status and who their friends are. Best of all, we can even see what conversations they've had and with whom as people post comments on each other's walls, or whatever they're called.

We never wrote to the people we looked up that night. We just talked about them. It was lashon hara at its worst.

When did we start to care so much about other people's lives? Or maybe we should ask ourselves when was it that we started to take ourselves so seriously that we thought we'd post our pictures and daily blogs for the world to see?

One thing I know for sure: those who continue to believe these programs are nothing but "friends networks" are kidding themselves. Just because you're the most popular person on Facebook with 2,000 friends (and trust me, there's competition out there to see who has the most Facebook/ MySpace friends) doesn't mean that you're any closer to the people you've connected with.

Getting requests for "friendship" from acquaintances who were never your friends is a regular occurrence.

A friend of mine got such a request from a classmate he never spoke to in university.

"Just because I'm adding her doesn't mean we're ever going to speak," he said.

"Why add her then?" I asked, only to get an exasperated response.

"Why not? Aren't you curious about what she's up to?" he said.

Umm, no. If I was, I'd make an effort to get in touch with her in real life, not in an online community.

At this point, though, I have to admit that I feel left out when I'm at a party and someone yells "MySpace!" when posing for a picture. I refuse to buy into any of it.

These so-called friends networks have arrived when I'm at an age where I have naturally drifted away from some friends and have gotten closer with others. It doesn't mean that I no longer care about friends from my past, only that I believe our friendship meant enough to me to merit a personal effort – either through an e-mail or a phone call, and not a quick wink on a convenience website.

I remember when sending an e-mail instead of a letter was considered bad form, and maybe there's an argument to be made that sites like these enhance the e-mail experience. Any connection is better than no connections at all, I guess. But what I think is truly bad form is forgoing traditional get-togethers, either at birthday parties or even high school reunions, for a different type of reunion in which connections are made at arms length. These sites could supplement relationships, but they don't. They replace them.

Sure, there's value in something that makes it easier for us to get in touch with each other, as long as that's what we're doing. But I'm just afraid that Facebook offers an excuse to those of us who believe we're too busy to reach out and touch someone to reach out and click on a Poke icon.

A Family Business for over 80 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

How am I going to tell my parents that I have fallen in love with a man who isn't Jewish?

I went away to university three years ago and met a guy who became my closest friend and confidant. Gord and I remained "just good friends" until this year. We stopped fighting our feelings for each other, and once we decided to finally explore a deeper more intimate relationship, it happened. We have fallen deeply in love and want to get married and raise a family together. Gord is the best thing that's ever happened to me. I have dated Jewish guys, but nothing ever clicked, and although neither one of us meant for this to happen, it did.

I was raised in a Conservative home where we kept kosher, my dad went to shul on Shabbat, I went to Hebrew school – you get the picture. I know my parents never thought this would ever have been possible, but neither did I. I'm scared to death to tell them. What am I going to do?

Don't Want to Hurt Them

Dear Don't Want to Hurt Them,

There is no way for me to predict how your parents will react to this news, but from the tone of your letter, I can see you are very worried.

If you have made up your mind that this is the direction you are going to take, then you have no choice but to tell them.

There is no easy way out of this one, because you know deep down in your heart what this will mean to them. Your parents have certain expectations and dreams for you, which are reflected in the way they raised you and from the values and traditions your family instilled in you as you grew up. When those expectations and dreams are violated, you can expect major fallout.

That being said, I can only guess that with time, your parents will end up accepting Gord, because the alternative of losing you would not be an option. All you can do is try to make them see in Gord what you see.

Give them a lot of time to adjust and expect that they will do everything in their power to change your mind. They will probably go through a series of stages that include anger, denial and sadness, but let's hope that the last stage will be acceptance. In the end, you know that they want you to be safe and happy, but it may be a long, emotional road before they realize what that means.

Born on third base

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

A fellow I met told me the lesson he learned from never making a good living is it didn't allow him to throw money at his children's needs and challenges. It makes him interact with them, play ball with them, and encouraged him to talk with them, as opposed to schlepping them from dance lessons to skating programs – and encourages his children to be thankful.

The man's words were wise. I have encountered so many of our youth who have this great sense of entitlement; a belief that the wealth that exists today in our society will stay forever.

A friend told me of a friend who took his teenage daughter to a high-end women's dress store, had a private viewing for her, and allowed her to spend $10,000 on clothing.

What does a child think knowing his parents are spending $15,000 a year on his education? What does a teenager think, having the opportunity to travel to Israel for no money and zero responsibility? What belief system must a pre-university student have who states that the Ivy League schools are the only schools they will apply to? Entitled, or as former football coach Barry Switzer said, "Some people are born on third base and go through life thinking they hit a triple."

I am not bemoaning the affluence in our society. In fact, I say thank God for those with great resources, as they are partners in ensuring that the poor survive. Indeed, having money is not a shame (as Canadian culture might have you believe), nor is it something to be embarrassed about.

The question, however, is how does one deal with our gift of wealth? How do we achieve a balance in life with our children, knowing so many of us are in the top two per cent of the luckiest people in the world, in regards to lifestyle?

(The richest two per cent of adults in the world own more than half the world's wealth, according to a new study released by the Helsinki-based World Institute for Development Economics Research of the United Nations University.)

On Pesach we are instructed to invite into our homes the poorest among us. The Haggadah states: "Those who are hungry let them come and eat."

This is not a simple directive, as it requires all Jews to open up their doors to individuals who are in need. It compels us to teach our children about giving and obliges us to include our children in our tzedakah so that they recognize the responsibility that being born into this comfortable and lavish time in history carries.

Think about it, if this were practised in real terms. We would look in the back alleys, nooks and crannies of our streets, shouting to the homeless, the shut-in or the isolated senior living at subsistence, to join us at our Passover seder, as if we were all one – because we are all creations of God.

But in reality this is not what usually happens. We are afraid of the poor, the scraggly homeless, and although we will contribute to their welfare through tzedakah, we prefer to keep them at a distance.

And if this is the case, if we are uncomfortable with how the poor look or what they represent – perhaps our ability to fail – then we are raising our children to feel the same. We are encouraging their belief that they are entitled by separating them from those in need.

Play ball with your children. Interact. Teach them that money is fleeting and entitlement is an illusion.

"It is well to remember that the entire population of the universe, with one trifling exception, is composed of others." – Andrew J. Holmes, Wisdom in Small Doses

Y firebombed on Passover

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Montreal Jewish community's security co-ordinating committee, speculates that "the reckless demagoguery" of some politicians during the recent Quebec election may have motivated the Passover attack on the YM-YWHA-Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre with what police describe as a small home-made explosive device.

At approximately 11 p.m. on April 3, the night of the second Passover seder, two propane canisters were ignited outside the main entrance of the Y on Westbury Avenue. A minor fire was quickly extinguished by the Montreal fire department, and police investigators were on the scene almost immediately, said Bram Freedman, FEDERATION CJA's chief operating officer.

Third attack on community in three years

There were no injuries and no property damage, only some charring of the pavement. The building was empty, except for cleaning staff. Police had no leads. No notes or graffiti were found at the scene, nor had any threat been made, according to information at the time of writing.

"They appealed to the worst element in people's natures and exacerbated social tensions for short-term political gain," Rabbi Poupko said of the politicians. "While we can't speak with certainty about who committed this act and what their motivation was, some very important questions have to be asked about this reckless demagoguery that put the finger on religious minorities.

"This campaign emboldened the bigots, the racists, the anti-Semites."

Asked which politicians he meant, Rabbi Poupko replied, "They know who they are."

As of last week, the police had not designated the incident a hate crime, saying that certain burdens of proof had to be established beforehand.

Police were reviewing the tapes from surveillance cameras on the site.

While B'nai Brith Canada immediately labelled the incident a hate crime and asked the police to investigate it as such, Freedman said last week, "We have no indication, at present, with respect to the motivation for this incident."

B'nai Brith legal counsel Steven Slimovitch said when a bomb is placed outside a clearly identified Jewish institution, especially during

Canadian army medic attracted to the soldier's life

By PAUL LUNGEN

There was an incident that occurred during Tamar Freeman's posting in Afghanistan that she did not relate to her parents until she was safely home in Toronto.

While on patrol in a convoy, someone – Taliban, Al Qaeda, who knows? – fired a rocket propelled grenade (RPG) at their vehicles as they passed by. The bomb hit an embankment, popped up into the air and landed a couple of hundred metres away, where it exploded. The convoy never broke stride, as it were, continuing on its mission.

Today, Freeman can tell the story openly, and though her parents might fidget when they hear it, they know Tamar will not soon be returning to Afghanistan. Her six-month deployment is over and she will now be given safer duties at Camp Petawawa, near Ottawa.

Freeman, 40, is a fairly rare breed of Canadian Jew, a woman who has chosen the armed forces as her career. No longer simply a reservist who is permitted to turn down overseas postings, she is a full-time soldier in the Second Field Ambulance unit, where she serves as a medic. Freeman, a corporal, enlisted knowing full well that Canadian army duty does not consist, as the public mythology would have it, of merely serving as peacekeepers. She speaks with something approaching disdain at those who ignore the Canadian Forces' fighting tradition. Even in Bosnia, when part of a peacekeeping force, Canadian soldiers were engaged

CANADA

Firm To Be Liquidated

HAMILTON — A Jewish-owned scrap metal dealer that was one of Canada's largest was ordered into liquidation late last month so that an assets sale could cover part of what one of its founder's sons owes the other in a longstanding legal battle. In 1983, Chester Waxman tricked his brother Morris into selling him his half interest in I. Waxman and Sons, a scrap metal recycler that their father founded in Hamilton in 1911. Morris was paid $3 million, a fraction of his share's value. He sued and Chester and his children were ordered to pay him as much as $50 million. The final amount will be determined at a court hearing next month, the Hamilton Spectator reported.

Law Change Urged

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada is urging the federal government to make the glorification of terrorism a crime after the parliamentary committee that had been reviewing Canada's anti-terror laws recommended the move in its recently released report. "The proposed amendment to the Criminal Code, if adopted, would close the loophole that now exists in the legislation that allows such actions to go unpunished, despite their obvious inherent dangers," B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant said. The group noted that it recommended the change when it testified before the committee on public safety and national security.

WORLD

Fire at Neturei Karta

NEW YORK — A suspicious fire destroyed the synagogue and residence of a senior rabbi of a haredi sect that angered many Jews by attending a Holocaust denial conference in Iran in December. No one was injured in the April 1 blaze at Yeshivas Bais Yehudi in Monsey, N.Y. Police and fire investigators said the fire was suspicious because Neturei Karta, the anti-Zionist group, has been the target of threats, a local paper reported. Rabbi Yisroel Dovid of Neturei Karta said the group suspects arson because of earlier threats.

Swiss Attitudes Probed

ZURICH — Ten per cent of the Swiss population is anti-Semitic, according to a recent study. The 10 per cent had "systematic anti-Semitic attitudes," meaning across the board, Swiss news outlet NZZ reported, while another 28 per cent held some anti-Semitic views. The head of the Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities said the 10 per cent figure is "worrying," but has remained constant in recent years. Some 37 per cent had a positive attitude toward Jews.

Graves Desecrated

PARIS — Fifty-three graves were desecrated at a Jewish cemetery in France. Late on the night of March 31 in Lille, headstones were broken off the graves. Police opened an inquiry but had yet to make arrests last week. The municipality of Lille condemned the desecration as an "outrageous act of anti-Semitism." The mayor visited the cemetery the next morning, and the new French Interior minister, Francois Baroin, said, "We will employ all our means to find out as soon as possible who is responsible for these intolerable acts."

Wertheim Heirs Get Holocaust Settlement

BERLIN — The heirs of the Wertheim family have received one of the largest compensation payments ever from Holocaust-related restitution.

In a settlement announced last March 30 in Duesseldorf, the KarstadtQuelle corporation agreed to pay the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany $117 million (US) for the last remaining major pieces of property formerly belonging to the family.

The settlement was negotiated by the Claims Conference during months of secret meetings, and it will administer the settlement. Some funds will go toward Claims Conference-funded programs for Holocaust survivors, and the rest will go to the Wertheim heirs.

Ida and Abraham Wertheim ran one of Germany's largest department store chains, but lost their property after they fled Nazi persecution in 1939. Speaking for some 50 members of her family, Wertheim heir Barbara Principe of New Jersey said she and her family were "glad that we have finally reached this agreement with KarstadtQuelle AG to end the legal battle over Wertheim."

As part of the settlement, KarstadtQuelle also reportedly will withdraw claims on 50 other Wertheim properties in Berlin and the former East German state of Brandenburg.

Rabbis become involved in Organ Donation Week

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis has joined forces with the Trillium Gift of Life Network to address a common misconception in the Jewish community about organ donation and boost the number of organ donors in Ontario.

This is the first year that the Toronto Board of Rabbis, headed by Beth Shalom Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, has been involved in the annual National Organ and Tissue Donation Awareness Week that is set to take place between April 22 to 29.

Rabbi Flanzraich explained that the Trillium organization, an organization that is responsible for the organ donation program in the province reached out to the board because of the "deepening concern of some erroneous notions that some Jewish people have in the community regarding organ donation," he said.

"Not only is it not a violation of Jewish law to donate organs, but it is actually a religious imperative to donate organs," the rabbi said.

He suggested that the misconception may have come out of the Jewish concern for the dignity of the deceased and the requirement to show honour and respect to the deceased.

"And 30 or 40 years ago, if someone underwent a heart transplant surgery, they generally didn't live any longer had they kept their own heart… [and people thought] we shouldn't do it because there was no apparent benefit. Now we know that organ transplants are enormously successful at prolonging life and not just giving life, but improving the quality of life."

Rabbi Flanzraich

Rabbi Flanzraich said that although most aspects of Jewish life are subject to debate, the overwhelming majority of the Jewish world embraces organ donation as a valid halachic response.

According to the pamphlet that the Toronto Board of Rabbis drafted in conjunction with the Trillium organization to promote the campaign, the value of pikuach nefesh (the saving of a life) is a cardinal value in Jewish law.

"This is a value which is expressed through the obligation for self-preservation, but also in the duty to save the life of another human being… The Toronto Board of Rabbis affirms this principle in unambiguous terms, because no one should see the preservation of human life as optional – for Jews, it is obligatory."

When it comes to whether Jews are required to be buried with their bodies intact, there is a clear distinction in the case of donating organs or tissue to save a life, the pamphlet states.

"We're working very [hard] to ensure that the community is aware of the need and the permissibility," he said, adding that when the awareness campaign launches on April 22, members of the board will distribute the pamphlets at shuls, pulpits will be asked to give sermons related to organ donation, and they will continue to spread the word at community centres and hospitals.

"The hope is that they will listen to us, that they will sign those organ donation cards and save someone's life," the rabbi said.

Those interested in becoming organ donors can register at any Ontario driver's licensing office, they can leave a request to be an organ donor in their will, or they can simply talk to their family and make them aware of their wish. It's been seven years since the Ontario government's Trillium Gift of Life Network Act was passed in 2000.

The legislation was designed to significantly increase organ and tissue donation in Ontario, where someone dies every three days waiting for an organ transplant.

"The Toronto Board of Rabbis was very honoured to work with the government on this program because we feel that it was an excellent partnering of the provincial government and our community to solve a human problem," Rabbi Flanzraich said.

Hyperbole and hypocrisy

From the editor's desk

These thoughts were written as the Arab League summit meeting drew to a close last month in Riyadh. Even before the conference concluded, Israel was the object of many tsunami-like waves of sanctimonious finger-wagging.

"If Israel refuses [to accept the Arab League's proposal], that means it doesn't want peace. Then [the conflict] goes back into the hands of the lords of war," Saudi Foreign Minister Saud al-Faisal said as the conference opened.

Faisal's statement was as close to the truth as Earth is to Mars.

Israel has never rejected the pursuit of peace, as an honest assessment of its diplomatic initiatives since 1948 (and before) would show. It has only ever rejected international pressure to commit national suicide.

But sincerity and truth were not expected at the conference. Hyperbole and hypocrisy were, the usual discourse at gatherings when posing, posturing and politics are the chief purpose.

And they landed in bucketfuls.

The Arab leaders' self-righteous hectoring of the Jewish state filled the pre- and post-conference air as distinctly as newly fallen ordure in a cow shed.

I will not comment on the political implications of the conference. Two weeks have elapsed since it concluded, and a great deal of analysis and commentary have already appeared.

Suffice to say, the Arab League decided not to amend the original 2002 Saudi plan that called for the right of Palestinian "refugees" to return to Israel.

Suffice also to say that Israel did not reject the conference results out of hand, but decided rather to reflect on the results, despite the refusal by the league to acknowledge its concerns.

My comments are restricted to the absurdum tremendum that emanated from the president of the Palestinian Authority.

The Arab peace plan could be Israel's last chance to live in a "sea of peace," Mahmoud Abbas told the waiting Riyadh press even before the conference began.

"If this initiative is destroyed, I don't believe there will be another opportunity in the future like this. This is the most important initiative since 1948 to solve the problem of the Israeli occupation," he added.

At the conclusion of the two-day conference, Abbas said: "I reiterate the sincerity of the Palestinian will in extending the hand of peace to the Israeli people… We should not waste more chances in the history of this long and painful cause… The entire region will be under renewed threats of war, explosions, as well as regional and international confrontations, as a result of the absence of a solution or the impossibility of implementing one," he said.

What chicanery! What shameless effrontery! What hand of peace – sincere or otherwise – has the Palestinian people extended to Israel ever, before or after the creation of the state?

What hand of peace did the Yasser Arafat-led Palestinian Authority extend to the Israeli people after he walked away from Camp David?

What hand of peace has the Ismail Haniyeh-led PA extended to Israel since its election in 2006? The Qassam rockets continue to this day to fall on Sderot and the surrounding area.

What hand of peace has been extended to the forlorn family of Gilad Shalit?

Abbas has no ability whatsoever to make peace with Israel. His Fatah movement has been essentially trampled and surpassed by Hamas.

Hamas' leaders Ismail Haniyeh and Khaled Meshal refused, even for the expedient purposes of the Arab Summit, to recognize Israel, let alone try to make peace with the Jewish state.

As long as Hamas controls the decision-making levers of the Palestinian government, Israel has no one with whom to make peace. And the Arab League has no ability to negotiate peace with Israel on behalf of the Hamas-ruled Palestinian people. Abbas knows this. Faisal knows this, too.

And what attitudes are the Hamas leaders inculcating in the Palestinian people?

According to the Palestinian Media Watch – a non-profit service based in Israel that monitors public debate in the Palestinian territories – late last month senior Hamas leader and former PA foreign minister Mahmoud Al-Zahar told a mass rally in memory of Hamas founder Sheik Ahmad Yassin: "Our position is the liberation of Palestine, all of Palestine. This is the final and strategic solution for us. There is a Qur'anic message for us, that we will enter the Al-Aqsa Mosque, and the entrance to the mosque means the entrance into all of Palestine. This is the message, no one can deny it. Anyone who denies it must check his faith and his Islam."

Two weeks ago, a cesspool structure in northern Gaza collapsed, sending torrents of sewage into a nearby village. Five people drowned or were poisoned by the suddenly surging effluent. The mayor of Gaza City blamed the incident on local people unlawfully digging dirt away from the earthen embankments of the sewage dump, thereby irreparably weakening the structure.

The symbolism of what happened in Gaza is too profound to ignore: the entire Palestinian governance enterprise is rank and foul, incapable of advancing a noble cause such as nation-building because the framework of their society has been so weakened by the constant hallowing of hatred of Israel and the Jews.

And of course, it fell to Israel to solve the problem. The Jews sent two large floating pumps to help lower the sewage levels.

Wiesenthal Centre looks to reach Muslim world

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When you're a spokesperson for one of the Jewish world's best known organizations and when your bailiwick is international anti-Semitism and global terrorism, your travels can take you to pretty exotic locations.

Take Rabbi Abraham Cooper for instance. As associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center (SWC), he's a frequent flyer whose travels recently took him to South Korea, Singapore, Jakarta and even Toronto. While in Canada, he participated in the opening of the Friends of SWC's Resource and Leadership Training Centre at 5075 Yonge St. The 2000-square-foot space includes a library of tolerance, interactive computer workstations and a classroom-style lecture space.

During his visit to Jakarta, he met privately with former Indonesian president Abdurrahman Wahid and appeared on a widely seen television program in which various world religions were discussed.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper

That trip allowed Rabbi Cooper to implement a new centre strategy designed to give the Islamic world a look at real-life Jews and not the demonic stereotypes that media in many countries are presenting.

In addition to personal appearances, he said the centre will soon launch the "Ask Musa" (Arabic for Moses) website – a sort of Judaism 101 primer for Muslims curious about the Jewish people and their faith that is unmediated by the likes of Al-Jazeera and local imams.

The website will launch in May and will be offered in Arabic, Farsi, Urdu and Indonesian. It will address the Jewish perspective on charity, prayer and God and will include parables and other stories with a moral message. In addition, it will provide a historian's response to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist secret-police forgery that purported to show Jewish control of many of society's institutions. The Protocols are widely disseminated in the Islamic world.

Rabbi Cooper said he met with many Muslim religious leaders in Jakarta as well as other opinion leaders. It was refreshing to find that "not everyone has Israel and the Jews on the brain and not all Muslims see themselves as victims," he said.

With a population of more than 200 million, 86 per cent of whom are Muslims, Indonesia is home to the world's largest Muslim population.

Rabbi Cooper said that Indonesians practise a "moderate" version of Islam, but radicals are attempting to influence their views on faith and politics.

"The question is, who reaches them first?" when it comes to forming opinions about Jews and Israel, Rabbi Cooper said.

Based on his Indonesian TV experience, Rabbi Cooper believes it's not too late to foil the radical Islamic message. At the start of the show, the moderator openly embraced him and called him brother.

"We cannot be naive. But we cannot assume the entire constellation of the Muslim world is lined up against Jews," Rabbi Cooper said.

The first question he faced was, "'What does the Torah say about Islam?'" the rabbi recounted.

When Rabbi Cooper explained that the Torah preceded Islam – "that may seem like aleph-bet to us" – there was "silent reflection" from his interrogator. "That was new."

Rabbi Cooper said he met "many urbane people, sophisticated Muslims. But if we leave it to Al Qaeda and Al-Jazeera to educate people who we are, we'll be in deep trouble.

> 'If we leave it to Al Qaeda and Al-Jazeera to educate people who we are, we'll be in deep trouble'

"You're talking about a kind of hatred that's toxic and getting worse."

He acknowledged that creating a website on Judaism is only a modest undertaking, but the alternative is to "write off the greater Muslim world to the Al Qaeda camp."

Part of the centre's strategy was demonstrated in Haifa last November when it hosted a conference on tolerance that included local religious leaders and a number of European Muslims. "We will continue to bring moderates and religious leaders from non-confrontation states," he said.

In Toronto, meanwhile, the Resource and Leadership Training Center was launched with an exhibit titled "The Making of a War Criminal." Created by Toronto artist Ian Leventhal, the display examines similarities between Hitler and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Workshops, seminars and film screenings have been scheduled for the coming months, along with the Spirit of Hope Benefit. Once it is fully operational, some 10,000 people are expected to access the facility yearly.

New interfaith council broadens dialogue for local rabbis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Lori Cohen of Temple Sinai Congregation and Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation are part of the new Toronto Area Interfaith Council, launched March 20 at a breakfast with Mayor David Miller.

The two rabbis, representing the Toronto Board of Rabbis, were among more than 190 representatives from more than 40 faith communities and 15 interfaith organizations to attend the inaugural event.

Rabbi Cohen – whose participation came about through an ad hoc interfaith committee that is working on a proposal for an interspiritual centre for Toronto's waterfront – told The CJN she thinks initiatives like the new council are important. "We live in such a diverse city, ethnically and religiously, and I think we do need to find these bridges."

As a result of the mayor's breakfast, she was asked to speak on April 1 at a multifaith program organized by the International Muslims Association.

Imam Abdul Hai Patel, who was scheduled to speak at the same program, is also on the new council. "We are looking forward to greater awareness and relationships among faith communities," he told The CJN. "We have to see ourselves as Canadians and work together on issues affecting us, and see how we can support one another."

Although Rabbi Cohen has participated in the occasional interfaith program in the past, her involvement has deepened in the last couple of months, she said, noting that she also took part in a recent panel discussion with Bishop Philip Poole and Raheel Raza, journalist and author of Their Jihad – Not My Jihad, for the York Credit Valley Area Ministry Day.

There seems to be an increase of this type of programming in the city, she said. "I think more people are reaching out and trying to find some kind of common values."

The council's goals, according to a news release, include "initiating and facilitating interfaith celebratory and commemorative observances, providing information about religious practices and finding ways to connect the commonalities of diverse faiths."

Miller told participants at the breakfast that interfaith dialogue and shared activities "build bridges and promote mutual understanding, good community relations, tolerance and acceptance."

Rabbi Tanenbaum, who has an extensive background in Jewish-Christian interfaith work over the past 37 years, said in a telephone interview that, "living in Toronto, it's more and more apparent that there's a lot going on besides what's represented by Christian-Jewish [initiatives]. There's a growing Islamic community, a growing Zoroastrian community. We have a Hindu community, a native community... We're a multi-cultural city."

Yom Hashoah V'hagvurah

On the hillside of Mount Herzl in western Jerusalem, deep within the silent spaces and swaying trees of Yad Vashem, a sculpture carved by Boris Saktsier memorializes the life and death, the goodness and the bravery of Janusz Korczak.

The sculpture is an eternal testament to the Polish Jewish educator, humanist Janusz Korczak, (born Henryk Goldsmidt), who ran an orphanage in the Warsaw ghetto. Korczak emerges in the statue at the centre of a cluster of sorrowful and sad youngsters. His left arm encircles the children, holding them close, fortifying their resolve against the fear of the inevitability of their cruel fate.

Countless were the men and women who defied the sadistic barbarity of the Nazi oppressors, but none more boldly nor with the commanding dignity of Korczak. No one from that dark, terrible time more tragically embodied Shoah (unspeakable suffering) nor more triumphantly exemplified gvurah (heroic example) than Korczak.

It was 65 years ago, on August 6, 1942, that Korczak walked in single file with his children out of the Warsaw Ghetto to the train that would take them to their deaths in Treblinka.

In her book The King of Children: The Life and Death of Janusz Korczak, Betty Jean Lifton described the group's last walk.

"Unlike the usual chaotic mass of people shrieking hysterically as they were prodded along with whips, the orphans walked in rows of four with quiet dignity… This was no march to the train cars, but rather a mute protest against this murderous regime… a procession the like of which no human eye has ever witnessed.

"As Korczak led his children calmly toward the cattle cars, the Jewish police cordoning off a path for them saluted instinctively… A wail went up from those still left on the square. Korczak walked, head held high, holding a child by each hand, his eyes staring straight ahead with his characteristic gaze, as if seeing something far away."

In her work, Lifton also makes note of the last Pesach seder that Korczak celebrated with his orphanage children. "We don't know if there were nuts, or matzah balls, or even soup at that last seder," she writes. But we have a report on its "charm" in an account written in the Jewish Gazette by one of the guests, Herman Czerwinski.

"Korczak sat at the head table with sixteen of the older choir members, who burst into a Zionist song whenever something in the Haggadah referred to Palestine. The seder guests [180 orphans] were seated in the rear. When the youngest child asked: 'And how is this night different from all other nights?' Korczak responded with a few words that 'moved' everyone."

During the reading of the Haggadah, Lifton noted, Korczak walked to the window and raised his fist, as if crying out to God in rage and despair to account for the suffering of his children.

But he never abandoned them.

As we approach the solemn commemoration of Yom Hashoah V'hagvurah, on Nisan 27, (April 15) we recall Janusz Korczak and tremble with reverence at his courage and find inspiration in the example of the unconquerability of the love he felt for his people.

Support for states that repress women

Too bad newspapers don't have "irony" columns. The article "U.S. talks with Saudis, Israel prior to Arab League summit" (CJN, March 15) includes a picture of two women, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, meeting in Jerusalem. Yet most of the left in this country, while claiming to champion women's rights, prefers to support states where women, in many cases, are not even remotely the equals of men and often suffer severe repression. I guess Kafka and Orwell would have made sense of it.

War is being thrust on Jews

In "Shalom… peace" (CJN, March 15), Avrum Rosensweig completely ignores the real threats from the dangerous Iranian regime, the global jihad, a rearming Hezbollah, and the democratically elected terrorist Arab leadership in Gaza and the West Bank to tell us that we need to concentrate on peace. He completely ignores the indoctrination that hundreds of thousands of young Muslims in the worldwide Wahhabi Madrassah system have received and the pronouncements of world- dominating aims by their leaders. Who of us does not desire peace? Who of us wishes to start a fight when peace is an option? Rosensweig's questions are irrelevant, even absurd, considering that we have not chosen war; rather it is being thrust upon us as Jews, Christians, westerners and non-jihadist Muslims. There are sadly no doors that we face that simply open to peace should we but shout our desire for it loud enough. We need to face the threat with resoluteness and courage.

Death camp rail car project for Toronto

From a recent article in the Forwertz (Forward), we learned that an authentic railroad car that was used to transport Jews to death camps was shipped from Poland through Germany to Fort Lauderdale, Fla. This car will be exhibited at the Florida Holocaust Museum. A railroad car was also purchased by a principal and students of a school in the small town of Whitwell, Tenn., to commemorate the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust. It is my firm belief and wish that a similar project should be undertaken by the Jewish community of Toronto. I hope that many people will support this project.

Agrees headline was inaccurate

I read the letters to the editor from J. Rose ("Headline doesn't reflect article's content," March 29) and Nora Gold ("CJC's high-calibre advocacy work," March 29) criticizing The CJN for a headline it used, which they claim was not reflective of the article beneath it. The letters were so emphatic that I fished out the March 15 issue from a pile of old newspapers.

I was taken aback by the headline "Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past.'" My immediate conclusion was that CJC was in demise. Then I read the article. I was saddened because I have an innate trust that The CJN's headlines will reflect properly on the story, and in this case as Rose and Gold point out, it failed terribly.

I suppose the only really good news in all of this is that I have been taught a rather valuable lesson: do not judge an article by its headline. I wish I had the time to read every article in The CJN, but that is just not possible. That is why I always believed that I can at least get a flavour of the issue by scanning some of the headlines in your paper. That I can no longer trust The CJN for accuracy in this respect troubles me deeply.

Arbour's role misstated

In the article "The uphill battle to change Israel's reputation," (According to Reports, CJN, March 29), it is stated that Louise Arbour is the head of the UN Human Rights Council. In fact, she is high commissioner for human rights, and her office is distinct from the council, which is a body made up of states (47 of them). The high commissioner is independent from the council and reports to the secretary general of the United Nations.

Going home to a place I had never been Lisa Newman Greenspan, whose grandfather, Lajzer Rotenberg, left Ivansk, Poland, in 1893, is a Toronto health care consultant and counsellor. Along with other Ivanskers, she organized the restoration of the badly neglected Jewish cemetery in Ivansk, one of thousands of Jewish cemeteries that lie neglected in Poland.

By LISA NEWMAN GREENSPAN

After I returned from Poland, I found myself speechless when people asked me about the trip; I felt strangely silenced, quite unable to speak or to write about it.

What finally loosened me up was my commitment to give a talk about the trip, to a "lunch and learn" at the shul I attend, to a group of about 100 people, many of whom I have known for most of my life.

It was while preparing my talk that I realized my self-imposed silence was akin to the silence of trauma survivors, who are often unable to speak about traumatic events till some time after they occur.

From my reading and from interviewing more than 100 Holocaust survivors to tape their memories (including for the Spielberg Oral History Project), I am familiar with the difficulty that Holocaust survivors had in speaking about their horrific ordeals. Very often their new friends and neighbours and even their own families could not bear to hear or understand the horrors, and the survivors did not begin to speak out publicly for many years after the events.

Of course, it would be presumptuous in the extreme to compare my experience to the horrors of Holocaust survivors. I was born in Toronto, more than 50 years after my grandfather fled here in 1893. I grew up in the quiet safety of Canada, and my postwar generation has never experienced war, deportation, etc. Jews are increasingly powerful in today's Canadian society, and anti-Semitism, while not absent, is no longer socially acceptable as public policy.

And yet many times while I was in Poland I felt I was coming home again – to a place I had never been before. This was a trip back in time, not only in space.

This feeling first occurred to me at the beginning of our tour, on our very first morning. As we got off the bus at Warsaw's huge Jewish cemetery, the group was directed to walk the length of a brick wall from our parking spot to the cemetery entrance. Being one of the last off the bus, I looked ahead and saw our line of Jews doing as they were told, walking straight ahead in somewhat disorderly but determined fashion. At that moment, there was a kind of short circuit in my brain, as I contemplated this scene and realized that were thousands like it during the Holocaust.

This was not a rational reaction, but rather something very deep – it was as if the perception evaded all the cognitive centres of my brain and went straight to some primitive, emotional, collective memory of our people.

Another moment came when our group attended the prize-giving ceremony for the Ivaniska junior high school students for their essays about the history of Poles and Jews in their town. The students put on a well-rehearsed folk-dance presentation for us (I'm sure I was not the only one among us who couldn't help staring at their Cossack-type boots, with all their associations of pogroms and violence), and then a musical presentation of what could best be described as klezmer music. Again, the feelings aroused by the music – in this case, joyful ones – seemed to short-circuit in my brain and bypass all intellectual activity to connect with something deep within me that, if it had words, would perhaps say, "Here we are at a bar mitzvah/wedding, so let's get up and dance!" And get up we did, dancing an impromptu and very emotional hora there in the school gym.

Food was as instinctive as music in connecting me to the Polish past of my ancestors. At the hotel buffet on my last morning, I lifted the lid of a large serving platter to find sweet cheese blintzes with raisins. They were just the way I like to make them for my family. The Warsaw supermarket had familiar, Polish names for food products I previously only knew as Jewish or Israeli [like vaffelim and kahshe], and the dried mushrooms I bought in the market were the same ones so highly prized by the Polish Jewish housewives of the past.

Poland, it seems, is in my blood, though I don't speak the language, have only a fumbling knowledge of Yiddish, and have never before visited the country. I am reminded of Chava Rosenfarb's epilogue to her wonderful novel Of Lodz and Love, describing a young Jewish woman leaving Poland in 1947 after World War II. The Polish passport control officer examines her one-way ticket and asks, "How long have you lived in Poland?" and, though the answer that springs to her lips is, "A thousand years," she simply says, "I was born here," and continues on her journey, never to return.

My Jewish ancestors were Poles and at the same time they were not. To Jews, the Pole was the "goy"; to Poles, we were foreigners, the archetypical "other" in Polish society, even though we were 10 per cent of the whole and were represented at every level and in every class. Perhaps because of their own history of victimization by Sweden, Russia, Austria and Germany, Poles tend to be suspicious of foreigners and put a high value on Polish ethnic purity. This goes along with a commonly held view in Poland that all the evils of the Holocaust were perpetrated by the Germans. In this mindset, Poles see themselves as innocent victims of Nazi brutality and cannot accept the fact that they themselves perpetrated atrocious crimes against their Jewish neighbours.

Stereotyping and labelling another person or group is never helpful in understanding their behaviours, and I want to steer clear of the oft-repeated saw that all Poles are anti-Semites, that they drink it in with their mother's milk. While it cannot be denied that many Poles were complicit in murdering or betraying Jews to the Nazis, it is also true that Poland is the country that produced the greatest number of Righteous Gentiles recognized at Yad VaShem. Poles' self-identification as victims may conveniently excuse them from responsibility for their cruelty to Jews, but there is also truth to the assertion that Poland and the Poles were victimized during the war. The more one delves into the subject of Polish-Jewish relations, the less simple it seems. Daniel Mendelsohn in an interesting book, The Lost, compares the history of Jews and Poles to the troubled, at times violent relationships between the biblical brothers Cain and Abel, Jacob and Esau, and to his own difficult relationship with a brother whose arm he broke in a jealous rage.

Anti-Semitism in Poland did not end with the destruction of Polish Jewry. Today the anti-Semitic Radio Marija enjoys wide support among Poles, and I was told by a native speaker that in Polish, zyd is a negative, not a neutral term.

On a pleasant stroll through a Warsaw market, I contemplated the delicious-looking fruits and beautiful flowers and remembered our guide telling us how proud Poles are of their healthy produce, not contaminated by chemicals. It was when I decided to look around for some folk art that I saw a crudely carved figure of a caricatured Jew – wearing a shtreiml and a long cloak, and clutching a sack of gold – sitting atop one merchant's cash register.

There are Poles alive today who have robbery and murder of Jews on their consciences, both during and after the war. But not all Poles are the same, any more than all Jews are the same. There are Poles today who are discovering and honouring their own Jewish roots, and there are Poles who are fascinated by Jewish literature, music and culture, as strange as that seems in a country with only a tiny remnant of its Jews. And there are many Poles who wish to see their country, newly admitted to the European Union, revert to its multicultural past.

And just as different people react differently, different towns behave differently: in Ozarow, the first Jewish cemetery in the region to be restored, all the gravestones were left standing during the war. In my grandmother's shtetl, Zawichost, the town at its own expense put up an impressive memorial on the spot from where the Jews were deported. By contrast, in Ivansk, it seems that local people looted the Jewish cemetery of all its stones and even searched in the ground for the buried Torah scrolls, which they used to make shoes.

The trip was an overwhelming experience for me; there was a moment when I looked down at my digital camera flashing "memory bank full" and felt that summed up my own state of mind pretty well. So many thoughts, perceptions, feelings crowded in; I will continue to ponder their meanings for a long time. Will I revisit Poland? I doubt I will visit alone, though I do hope to take my children and perhaps my grandchildren there in the future, to make the same pilgrimage that we made.

I am very glad to have participated in the cemetery restoration project in Ivansk. The graves of our ancestors, while still unmarked, now lie within an orderly setting and will be cared for in the future, and there is appropriate documentation on the memorial plaques of the Jewish presence in Ivansk for hundreds of years. This would have been the task of generations before us, had there been no Holocaust. But a whole generation of Ivansk Jewry was decimated and we, who mostly descend from Ivanskers and emigrated before the war, have discharged the responsibility to the best of our ability. Ivansk had not seen so many Jews within its boundaries for 64 years, since October 1942. And we who congregated in the town, many of us meeting for the first time, were acutely aware that our coming together to walk in the footsteps of our ancestors served as an existential link in the continuity and the history of our people.

A word about the uniqueness of the infrastructure for this project: it was accomplished almost entirely by a few individuals, without a formal organizational structure, without meetings, minutes, slates of officers, etc. Throughout the almost five years that we worked on it, the project seemed to find the people it needed, almost as if it was bigger than any of us. I feel privileged to have participated in this tikkun olam, as I do feel it is possible to ameliorate if not correct the past in such ways. And I am very very grateful to Norton Taichman of Philadelphia, who showed us all that it was possible.

Why I wear a tallit

I wear a tallit. Every morning when I pray I wrap myself in the tallit and recite the blessing. I have done so for 32 years. It is an unusual act for an Orthodox woman. It caused some problems communally. But for me it has always been the correct praxis.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

The legal and theological sources are clear. In Numbers, God tells Moses to tell the children of Israel to put fringes with a blue thread on the corners of their clothing. The command concludes with the following reflection: the fringes shall be a reminder of all of God's commandments.

This reminder is visual, but will directly lead to practice and thence to holiness. This is the pact of our redemption from Egypt.

Am I not one of the children of Israel? Can I afford to lose this mitzvah?

Can I ignore the biblical commandment that might bring me close to God and to God's commandments? Passover (my favourite holiday) celebrates our redemption, but the tallit is a daily reminder.

The rabbinic legal tradition, as articulated in the Babylonian Talmud, exempts women from this command. The discussion is interesting but gives no clue as to the reasons. Many have presumed some domestic obligation, but in truth we do not know the rabbinic rationales.

What is unambiguous is the later discussion that permits the voluntary performance of exemptions (along with shofar, lulav and Torah study).

Thus, Rabbeinu Tam opines that not only may women wear tallit, for example, they may also say the requisite blessing. Some, like Maimonides, allow the performance but not the blessing. Ashkenazi authorities follow Rabbeinu Tam.

Hence, I say the brachah.

I don't wear the tallit to make a public point. I don't wear it to show everyone. I don't wear it because it is pretty or to keep warm. It's not about equality.

I wear it because it helps me to pray, because I am commanded by God, and because I need the reminder. I need to be linked to God's commandments, and the midrash claims the fringes tie us to God's Torah. It is so difficult to really pray, to be motivated and focused. I can use all the liturgical help I can get.

For the past 32 years, I have been the only woman in our congregation to wear a tallit. Even bnot mitzvah don't don it for the occasion. I am not a role model and that's great.

It's not about my relationship to other Jews. It's about each individual's prayer, God and ritual. The tallit symbolizes serious and fervent commitment to God's ways. I wrap myself and pray that I, too, shall be embraced in holiness.

A question that should remain unasked

"People who are searching for good have to explain evil." While I can't attribute this quote to an author, it resonates on Yom Hashoah. This is a day for memorializing the ultimate challenge to belief in a divinity that seeks the welfare of the human race.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Those who entered the camps as liberators came, some have said, as messengers of hope after the dark night of their souls and bodies. Just as humanity had sent Jews to their deaths, humanity (but obviously not the same people) came to rescue them, the brand snatched from the burning fire that destroyed one-third of our people and so many millions of others as well.

But how to explain the evil?

I quote Rabbi David Weiss Halivni, himself one of those rescued: "It must have been with tongue in cheek that the great second-century sage of the land of Israel, Rabbi Shimon ben Yochai, speaking on a different matter, said 'Four things the Holy One, blessed be He, detests, and I don't like them either'... I would like to say the same, in all seriousness, in connection with the Shoah.

"There are four things the Holy One, blessed be He, detests (at least this is my hope), and I reject them as well. These four things are, first, theological justifications of the Holocaust, which must be rejected out of hand; second, even raising the theological question of why there was a Holocaust, implying that an answer might be found; third, the notion that survival was possible only at the expense of others and that, therefore, every survivor must have a sense of guilt; and fourth, the idea that all survivors of the Holocaust necessarily share certain sociological and psychological characteristics. (In this last instance, unlike the first three, I merely disagree. I would not go so far as to say that I detest those who search for commonalities.)"

The thought that somehow Jews were responsible for the Holocaust because of their own actions – because they were secular, Conservative, Reform, or any other kind of Jew – is a revolting and evil concept. If the Shoah came about because of our sins and could have been avoided by the western world acting in time, would these theological accusers, Rabbi Halivni asks, have it brought about some other way as just punishment? The thought nauseates.

For Rabbi Halivni, there is no "because." All the historical, economic, psychological, and religious factors that relate to the Holocaust should be studied and understood. But they cannot encompass a reason. For him, the "why" is inappropriate. That doesn't let us off the hook, however. We must continue to explore the roots of anti-Semitism, whether religious, economic or just plain loony. But an answer? "The question," he writes, "should remain unasked."

The idea that somehow God punished Jews for entering the modern world is one, however, that refuses to die. It creeps in where you would not expect it – in sermons, in conversations. Usually, it's non-Orthodox Jews who were at fault, but not always. The idea that we were exiled because of our sins is an old theological concept in traditional Jewish thought, one that reappears at times of major catastrophe. It's also one that should be thoroughly and finally eradicated from our midst.

"Suspended in mystery" – that is Rabbi Halivni's answer to the "why" question.

He rejects survivor guilt and dysfunction.

A personal reminiscence: I once asked to interview a man who had come through the fire.

"I have nothing to say to you," he said. "When I came here, I was told by [a prominent member of the community] 'You people only survived by picking the pockets of the dead.' So why should I tell you my story?'"

I have worked with many Holocaust survivors over the years, some of whom I have written about in this column. Yes, some individuals were destroyed by their experience. But the vast majority raised families, strengthened the Jewish community, taught generations of students about the need to eliminate prejudice and violence, and, without forgetting the horror, were able to make for themselves, their families and their communities a place where they could rebuild and contribute.

For that, we should all stand in awe.

Yom Hashoah 2007

Each year, Jews around the world formally commemorate the memory of the Holocaust. We also annually recall the events of Kristallnacht. But remembering the Holocaust is more than these annual events. The Holocaust is an integral part of the Jewish historical experience. It is our history and is also a part of the very fabric defining Jewish people worldwide.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Remembering the Holocaust honours the tragic victims and recognizes the experience of the survivors. Yet it also helps to define the dark side of the human experience. Violence, hatred, slavery, oppression, genocide and other vitriolic kinds of human behaviour – this malevolence has manifested itself in every generation and in virtually every corner of the earth.

Why is there so much racism and hate in the world? No one is born a racist or inherits hatred.

People learn to hate from their parents, their peers, through music, literature and all the other influences that bear upon attitude formation and personality development.

Racism is taught through inference and language, through action and through inaction. Discrimination spreads in the workplace, in the playground, in the media and in the home.

Hatred may be manifested as a series of isolated or disparate events, but it can also be a systematic attack on a targeted group as it was in Nazi Germany and throughout most of Europe. In that context, normally trustworthy institutions such as governments, communities and schools became the very institutions that promulgated the hatred and violence.

Could this happen in Canada today?

Canada has a checkered history when it comes to systemic discrimination. Aboriginal Canadians and women were slow to get the vote. Chinese Canadians, Ukrainian Canadians and Japanese Canadians were victims of officially sanctioned discrimination. And Jewish Canadians were also victimized, often more subtly but in very tangible ways.

It appears that hatred is endemic to the human experience, and although we commonly believe that education provides the best way to promote respect and understanding, it is ironic that we witnessed the actual teaching of anti-Semitism in Alberta public schools in the Keegstra case.

We do have laws that attempt to protect us against the spread of various forms of hatred. There are both federal and provincial anti-discrimination laws with respect to employment and with respect to access to accommodations, facilities and services customarily available to the public.

There are hate propaganda provisions that are designed to curtail the spread of vitriolic expression, and there are sentence enhancement provisions in the Criminal Code to address crimes motivated by prejudice and hate.

In Canada, we have achieved significant success in fostering a greater understanding of the diverse cultures that define our society.

Nonetheless, we still experience the manifestations of hatred. The B'nai Brith League for Human Rights in Canada recently conducted its 25th annual survey of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada and reported that in 2006, there was an all-time high number of such incidents. This audit of anti-Semitic incidents showed a significant increase in the number of such occurrences compared to 2005 and attributes the number of incidents, in part, to overseas crises and their consequential effects on anti-Semitism in Canada.

However, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai Brith in the United States recently reported that the number of anti-Semitic incidents there declined for the second consecutive year. This report is encouraging and might demonstrate that vigilance and the annual reporting of the data could itself be useful in stemming the spread of hatred.

Unfortunately, one cannot imagine a society totally devoid of hatred, prejudice and discrimination. There is simply too much violence and conflict in the world and no single country is immune from these pejorative influences.

However, one can envisage a society in which hatred and discrimination are frowned upon and are viewed as forms of attitudinal pollution or festering sores that must be treated before they spread.

There are many messages emanating from Yom Hashoah. Hopefully, one day we can, with uplifted spirits, declare "never again" and feel confident that that declaration rings true in a society that regards the evils of hatred with utter disdain.

The Kirshner File

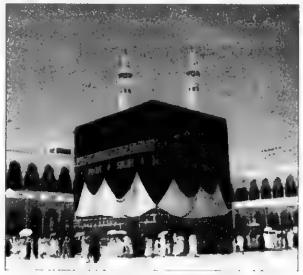
Saudi Arabia torn by contradictions

Westerners lucky enough to obtain a tourist visa to Saudi Arabia, a rarity in any season, can usually expect to receive the finest traditions of Arab hospitality, generosity and kindness.

Yet visitors should be aware that Saudi Arabia – the home of 15 of the 19 hijackers who crashed commandeered planes into the World Trade Centre and the Pentagon on Sept. 11, 2001 and the site of last week's Arab League summit – can be quite an inhospitable place.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

John Bradley, a British journalist who worked there for two years, knows this to be true from personal experience. In Saudi Arabia Exposed: Inside a Kingdom in Crisis (Palgrave Macmillan), a bracing, refreshing, honest account of an extremely closed society, he sets out the unpalatable facts. Saudi Arabia, he writes, is governed by perhaps the most corrupt family in modern history, the House of Saud, which regards the nation as a fiefdom to be milked. Saudi Arabia is basically a police state that, at best, tolerates Wahhabi-style Islamic extremists and pays lip service to democracy. It treats Third World guest workers virtually like slaves. It has a condescending attitude toward women and the Shiite minority. It demonizes Jews in its school textbooks.



Mecca, the heart of Islam

And Bradley minces no words about its pretensions to democracy. The majlis, the traditional Bedouin forum Saudis and foreigners alike use to air grievances and complaints and voice requests for help, certainly serves a need. But the majlis also exists to further "the myth" of the benevolence and paternalism of the House of Saud. Saudi princes have constantly delayed meaningful political and social reform, and have thrown money, when possible, at every problem. In other instances, they have used brutal force to stifle dissent.

Freedom of the press, of course, is a luxury in Saudi Arabia. Editors are appointed by the government and censorship is common. A joke has it that the sports daily Arriyadiyah is the most popular newspaper in the land because it is the only one that prints the truth.

The House of Saud, he says, does not rely on the army to enforce internal security. That task is assigned to the National Guard, which plays on tribal loyalties. Nevertheless, Saudi Arabia has been beset by crises, from the assassination of King Faisal in 1975 to the siege of the Grand Mosque in Mecca in 1979. Today, the Saudis are fighting a homegrown rebellion mounted by disaffected Islamic fundamentalists.

From its inception as a state in 1932, Saudi Arabia has been labouring under one huge contradiction. It is torn between its ties to the jihad-inspired Wahhabi religious establishment, which confers legitimacy on the state, and its relationship with the West, which guarantees its external security.

Taking note of this schizophrenia, Bradley comments: "For seven decades, generation after generation of Saudis has grown up being told at school by Wahhabi-inspired teachers that the West is the source of all evil. At the same time, they have been forced to accept, also without question, that the very survival of the kingdom's ruling elite – and the development of its infrastructure – is entirely dependent on its intimate co-operation with the West."

Western powers, reliant on Saudi oil, have by necessity turned a blind eye to the fact that the House of Saud governs in co-operation with Wahhabai fanatics whose ideological goal is the destruction of the infidel West.

Anti-Semitism is a key facet of Wahhabism. As Bradley puts it, "What is painfully and continuously made obvious from living among them is that Saudis are seeped in a culture of profound anti-Semitism. This is not to be confused, as apologists might indicate, with anti-Israel criticism, although the two inevitably feed off one another."

He tells of an official Saudi television channel that broadcast a program in which young Saudi men and women were asked a number of questions about Jews.

Here are excerpts from the transcript:

"Would you, as a human being, be willing to shake hands with a Jew, and why?"

"Of course I wouldn't be willing to shake hands with a Jew, for religious reasons and because of what is happening now in Palestine," replied a clean-shaven young man clad in western clothes.

Another young man said, "No. Because the Jews are eternal enemies. The murderous Jews violate all agreements. I can't shake hands with someone I know is full of hatred towards me."

Bradley appears to place much of the blame for such attitudes on the Saudi education system, which he describes as appalling. It is not only hostile to Jews and other non-Muslims, but demonizes the arts. As a result, all but a fraction of the books available in Saudi Arabia revolve around Islam.

Saudi King Abdullah greets Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and PA Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh at last week's Arab League summit in Riyadh.

Saudi officials berate Israel for its treatment of the Palestinians, but Saudi Arabia's treatment of its Shiite population is deplorable. Wahhabi clerics demean Shiite Muslims as heretics, while the government neglects areas dominated by Shiites.

"Even today many local schools continue to teach Shiite children that their sect is an apostasy from Islam, and even part of a Jewish plot to sabotage the Muslim nation," Bradley writes. He adds that the authorities have continually repressed the Shiites, the worst waves of which occurred in the late 1970s and early '80s.

Of late, Saudi women have improved their status. But they are still required to wear the abeyya, the neck-to-ankle black robe, and are not permitted to drive cars. In restaurants, banks and other public places, women must enter through special doors.

The Saudi economy would collapse without the presence of nine million foreign workers. Garbage would pile up in streets. Restaurants would close. Goods would remain undelivered. The water supply would trickle to a stop. Roads would not be repaired. The sick and injured would have to wait many more hours for care at hospitals. And yet many of these workers are treated badly.

Joblessness among young Saudis, estimated as high as 35 per cent, has had serious consequences. Political restiveness has increased, as had the crime rate. Drug possession, for example, rose from 4,279 in 1986 to 17,199 in 2001.

Saudis who commit grave crimes, from murder and rape to adultery and drug trafficking, can expect little mercy and are often beheaded. According to Bradley, beheadings are the sole form of "public entertainment" apart from soccer. That sounds like an exaggeration, with all due respect to Bradley.

Despite the puritanical values that prevail in this desert kingdom, everything that is officially forbidden – drugs, alcohol and sex outside marriage – is available for the right price, he says.

Homosexuality has long been illegal in Saudi Arabia, and in theory, the punishment for sodomy is death. Nevertheless, gay and lesbian discos, gay-friendly coffee shops and gay-oriented Internet chat rooms flourish in major Saudi cities.

Islamic hard-liners bridle at the relative liberty gays and lesbians enjoy in the privacy of their own spaces. Zealots also complain that satellite dishes are lowering moral and cultural standards by the import of western licentiousness.

Bradley claims that a question mark hangs over the future of the House of Saud. Saudi youngsters were encouraged to fight infidels in Afghanistan and Chechyna. "But now they are turning their attention to the home front," he writes. "The combination of hard-line Islamic dogma, hatred of the West, poverty and a perceived corrupt pro-western ruling elite has created a monster."

And, he adds, anti-American sentiment inside Saudi Arabia is building.

In closing, Bradley says that the ruling Al-Saud family cannot have it both ways. "To be a force for controlled modernization while upholding tradition; to be the ally of the West, while both influencing it and keeping its corrupting influences at bay, and simultaneously backing a Wahhabi establishment."

The glaring contradictions that characterize Saudi Arabia may yet be its undoing.

Community leaders are Taking Care of Business

One-day conference will highlight business and philanthropy

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

It is no secret that the Toronto Jewish community includes a distinguished cadre of Canadian business and philanthropic leaders. On Sunday, April 22, the Business Cabinet of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will provide community members with the opportunity to mine that expertise at a one-day conference called Taking Care of Business. The conference will also be offering insight into ways that business professionals can stay connected and committed to the needs of the Jewish community in both Toronto and Israel.

Barry Sherman, chairman and CEO of Apotex Inc.

Ed Sonshine, president and CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust

Morris Perlis, UJA Federation Campaign 2008 Co-Chair

"The title 'Taking Care of Business' relates not only to traditional business, but also to the obligation of taking care of our community," explains Howard Lichtman, vice-chair with Richard Wajs of the Business Cabinet. "We have an incredible lineup of amazing success stories and we should be proud, as a community, of their accomplishments. They have not only made an impact on Canadian society in general, they have also improved the Jewish and broader communities from a philanthropic basis," says Lichtman.

Topics on the program range from doing business online to private equity; from the business of entertainment to Bay Street banking.

Speaker highlights include Sherry Cooper, executive vice-president and chief economist at BMO Capital Markets, who will present an economic update; Heather Reisman, founder and CEO of Indigo Books and Music Inc., who will participate in a panel on entrepreneurial insight; and Larry Tanenbaum, chairman and CEO of Kilmer van Nostrand, who will discuss the business of sports, a subject he knows well. Tanenbaum chairs the Board of Maple Leafs Sports & Entertainment Ltd., which owns the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Toronto Raptors, Toronto FC of Major League Soccer and the Air Canada Centre.

One session in particular, "From Success to Significance," gets to the heart of the conference, says Lichtman.

"The title begs the question of what does success really mean – is financial success really enough? If people are looking to make a contribution or have a legacy, what they have to search for is significance, and significance comes from helping others."

Providing their perspectives on this issue will be Barry Sherman, chairman and CEO of Apotex Inc., and Ed Sonshine, president and CEO of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, who will join fellow Toronto business leaders Morris Perlis, UJA Federation Campaign 2008 co-chair, and David Koschitzky, UJA Federation vice-chair of the Board, to speak about business and philanthropy.

"I hope that the conference is energizing and motivating," says Ken Tanenbaum, co-chair of the Business Cabinet with Gilbert Palter. "Most of all, I hope participants take away a positive message on engaging in community service and philanthropy."

To register for the conference, contact Elena Livertovsky at 416.635.2883 ext. 329 or elivertovsky@ujafed.org or sign up on the web at www.ujaevents.com/registration/tcob.

Israel's new pioneers

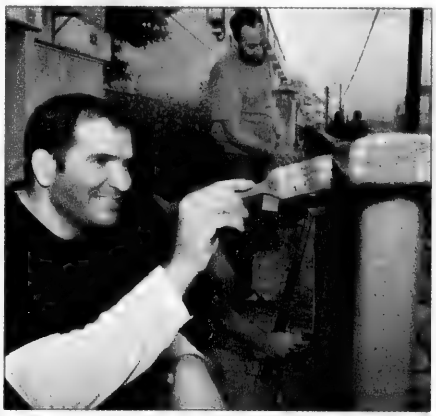
"I chose to dedicate myself to education and to changing the direction of Israeli society because if we don't take on this responsibility, our society will have no direction," says Meyrav Kvashne, 32, a member of the Ravid Educational Kibbutz, a Young Community, supported by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner.

Dany Gliksberg, a leading member of the Ayalim Association, which has also established a number of Young Communities in the Negev and the Galilee with the support of JAFI, echoes Kvashne's sentiments. "We are bringing young, dynamic people to settle in the Negev and the Galilee, promoting social activism and providing equal educational opportunities."

"We are making a difference," continues Gliksberg. "We believe that the social structure in Israel needs to change for the better, and we are doing something positive about it."

Young Communities are imbuing Israel's periphery with a new, innovative spirit, after being founded with the goal of strengthening both settlement and social involvement in the Negev and Galilee.

Following their army service, many talented Israelis remain in the centre of the country to pursue a college education and launch their professional careers. Yet growing social activism is motivating the next generation to work toward closing social gaps and building a more just society. They are doing this by living in the Negev and the Galilee, building Young Communities and contributing to the fabric of each region's community life. They volunteer to work with underprivileged children and youth through the Jewish Agency's Youth Futures program by participating in informal education and social programs and encouraging community involvement.



Young Communities are transforming the Negev and Galilee with an infusion of dynamic young Israelis, committed to building their country.

"These young people are the Rolls-Royce of today's Zionism," says Zeev Bielski, chairman of JAFI. "They give up their private pleasures. Instead of lying on a beach in Goa or making money, they are willing to settle the Negev and the Galilee, to help others and to sit for hours with senior citizens. They deserve our help."

With the Jewish Agency's backing, and the support of Jewish Federations including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Young Communities are cropping up throughout Israel – from Kiryat Shmona in the north to Dimona in the south.

The Ayalim Association was founded with the vision of "young people from all over the country, who have completed military service in elite units, working together on tasks with national significance, taking a real part in rebuilding the land, in the footsteps of the generations that came before them."

Avoiding a refund

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

Chances are if you've already filed your 2006 tax return by the time you're reading this column, it's probably because you're expecting a refund. If that refund makes you excited, you are probably suffering from a common, but seldom-diagnosed disease known as "intaxification."

Intaxification is the euphoria of getting a tax refund that lasts only until you realize it was your own money to begin with.

You are not suffering alone. A 2003 survey found that 55% of Canadians expected a tax refund, with the average refund being about $1,800. Getting a tax refund is actually a sign of poor tax planning — after all, you've loaned your hard-earned money to the government, interest free, for up to 18 months.

A tax refund typically arises when the amount of tax owing on your return is less than the amount of tax that was withheld from income you received during the year.

Jamie Golombek

The most common type of income from which tax is deducted at source is employment income. The amount of tax withheld by your employer is calculated without taking into account various deductions normally claimed on your tax return, such as RRSP contributions or childcare expenses, which reduce your ultimate tax payable.

Similarly, charitable donations made during the year reduce your ultimate tax payable through the donation tax credit but are not taken into account by an employer when deducting tax from your employment income.

Fortunately, by taking advantage of the "undue hardship provision" under the Income Tax Act, it's possible to get your tax refund throughout the entire year, on every pay cheque, instead of waiting until your return is filed the following spring. To apply, you simply complete Canada Revenue Agency's (CRA) one-page form, the T1213, "Request to Reduce Tax Deductions at Source." On this form, you indicate the various deductions or credits that, if not taken into account, would otherwise result in a tax refund for the year.

This form is then sent to your local CRA tax services office for review and approval. Once approved, the CRA will send you a letter of authority, which must be given to your employer, authorizing the employer to begin deducting less tax at source.

Let's take an example of an employee who makes $69,000 per year and who also contributes $9,000 to her RRSP. Based on 2007 Ontario tax rates, she would be eligible for a reduced tax withholding of $240 per month. If this $240 monthly savings is then automatically redirected from the employee's bank account into which her payroll was deposited to a systematic investment program, the employee won't miss the money because her net pay remains constant. The only difference is that instead of the money sitting with the government, earning no interest, it can be invested. Over a working career of 25 years, at a 7% annual compounded growth rate, the $240 of tax savings per month can grow to nearly $200,000 – and this is in addition to any savings accumulated in her RRSP.

Last summer's war makes Walk With Israel 2007 especially vital

Toronto community encouraged to participate – heart and sole

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY

Now that Israel is faced with the aftermath of last summer's war with Hezbollah, Torontonians have the opportunity to publicly renew their commitment to Israel.

It's Toronto's annual Walk With Israel on Sunday, May 27, the world's largest Diaspora solidarity walk in support of Israel, uniting both Jewish and non-Jewish Torontonians.

Proceeds from this year's Walk are going to two very different Israeli causes: a new daycare centre in the war-damaged northern town of Harzor Haglilit, and educational programs, which provide job training to Ethiopian women in Kiryat Moshe.

Helen Silverstein, chair of this year's Walk With Israel along with Ruth Ekstein, still recalls the blisters she had on her feet when she went on her first UJA Federation Walk in Toronto, 30 years ago.

Although the Walk has since changed and is no longer 32 kilometres long, it is still a great Israel solidarity event that brings 15,000 people from all corners of the community together, says Silverstein.

"The Walk is for people of all ages. It is an opportunity for parents and children to come out as a family and grandparents to walk with their grandchildren. It is a time for birthright israel alumni to reunite and for the old and young to walk together and show support for Israel," explains Silverstein. "For some people, this might be the main event that brings them out to support Israel."

Toronto youth happily show their support by participating in the Walk With Israel.

Along with supporting Israel, walkers will be treated to a jam-packed day filled with great food, entertainment and lots of fun.

"The Walk is the single most important Jewish community event that we have in Toronto. It is our opportunity to show Israel how much we care and to demonstrate our support for the kidnapped soldiers," says Ruth Ekstein.

Ekstein has been participating in the Walk since she was a child with her parents, friends and cousins. Today she looks forward to walking with her husband, children and their friends.

"There are 200,000 Jews in the city of Toronto. I feel it would be absolutely amazing to have each and every one of them come out, hold an Israeli flag and walk through the streets of Toronto to show support for Israel," says Ekstein. "I can't think of anything better to do on a Sunday morning in May."

Dedication completes UJA Federation educational campus in Israel

By FLORENCE LOW
UNITED ISRAEL APPEAL OF CANADA

The month of March marked a historic event for the community of Kfar Gvirol – the dedication of the Nathan and Lily Silver Community Centre. The centre, together with the Menachem Begin Elementary School, named after Israel's former Prime Minister, completes the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Educational Campus in Kfar Gvirol, located just southwest of Rechovot.

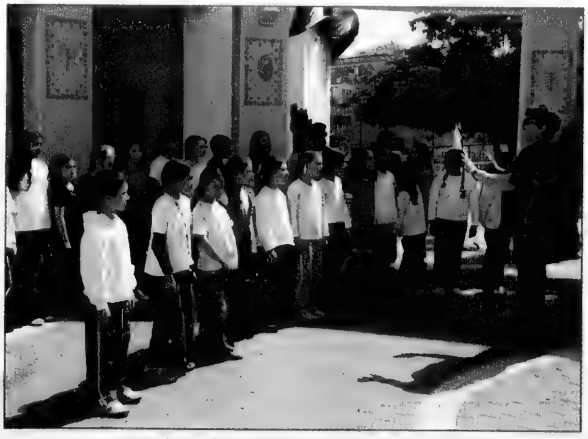
The dedication coincided with the 10th anniversary of the passing of Nathan Silver.

At the ceremony, the Silver children, Shoel, Debra, Joey and Bonnie, reflected on their parents' commitment to the Jewish community and to Israel.

After two children from the Begin school read biographies of Nathan and Lily, former Knesset member Dr. Benny Begin, son of the former Prime Minister, and Shoel Silver spoke of their close friendship. It evolved from the close relationship between their parents, Menachem and Aliza and Nathan and Lily. Both spoke about the importance their parents placed on education for the future of Israel, epitomized by the Begin Elementary School.

"This all began due to the close friendship between my father and Nathan Silver, which expanded to close family ties between the Begin and Silver families, which will now foster new friendships throughout the entire community," said Benny Begin.

Also in attendance at the ceremony were Shuki Forer, Mayor of Rehovot; Gabi Golan, head of the residents community; Yechiel Kadishai, head of Menachem Begin's office when he served as Prime Minister; MK Yisrael Katz and Faigie Zimmerman, chairperson of the Israel Residents Committee of UIA.



Students at the Begin School sing at the dedication of the Nathan and Lily Silver Community Centre.

The campus is a prime example of the impact of Project Renewal, through which Diaspora populations empowered communities in Israel. Project Renewal, which impacted over 120 cities and neighborhoods throughout Israel, was a historic initiative by none other than Menachem Begin himself.

Women share info in online forum

BY DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Finding a place on the Internet to schmooze with other Jews is relatively easy, with hundreds of sites to choose from. But a group of Jewish women have created a forum that enables its members to securely talk about anything among themselves.

The Jewish Women's Network online (www.jwnhome.com), officially launched two years ago, has grown as a popular medium for discussion for hundreds of women worldwide.

After deciding that there was no all-encompassing place for Jewish women on the Internet, Rachel Swirsky, a modern Orthodox woman in Toronto, and Sarah Atkins, a Chabadnik from Philadelphia, established the free site.

"A few of us broke away from a number of different forums. From there, we went to another site that didn't have any of the services we needed. We started this because we wanted to keep it a safe place, safe from spammers, scammers and unwanted posts," says Swirsky, who is one of the administrators. "In the beginning, we posted everything – jokes, games, dvar Torahs, anything to get people talking. We tried to make it fun."

And it has taken off. Today, they have members from all over the world, from Alaska to Australia. There are now 10 moderators. A pediatrician moderates the children's health section.

Apart from the regular chitchat and world news area for discussion, they also have specialized areas for teens, divorcees, parents of multiples, women dealing with infertility, and other groups.

They come from all areas of Judaism including modern Orthodox, Chabad, Conservative, Reform, intermarried, non-affiliated and people who are related to Jews. Swirsky describes the site as a "helpful and non-judgmental forum."

One member from New Orleans had posted on the site that Hurricane Katrina had devastated her family's home and possessions. In response to the crisis, a group of members came together to fill a moving truck full of food, water, clothing and Judaica that would be needed right away, such as Sukkot items. It was delivered personally by a forum member's husband, a truck driver who drove the truck down there.

The site also has areas covering different aspects of Jewish life and resources online. One of the newest ventures is what they are calling a bibliography project. It is an effort to collect all websites and recommended books on different topics, and to post them in one thread by category. Thus, if a user were to click "Keeping Kosher," she would get a whole list of recommended resources about how to keep kosher.

There is a section dedicated to Canadians, covering items such as sales specific to those living north of the 49th parallel, or resources that Jews living in Canada might have an interest in. There is a cooking section on the site with recipes and suggestions for everything from cooking for diabetics to fancy desserts.

Recently, they organized a mishloach manot contest, encouraging people to submit pictures of their Purim baskets. Members voted on the ones that they liked the most. A pair of earrings was awarded to the winner.

The section about making aliyah includes a question-and-answer area provided by people who have already made the jump and are willing to offer advice or hospitality. Swirsky, 28, plans on making aliyah next year with her husband and two-year-old daughter, and found the forum useful to find more information on the process.

BETH TIKVAH SYNAGOGUE

Invites the Community to remember together at an evening to commemorate

YOM HA SHOAH V'HAGVURAH

Tuesday, April 17 at 7:30 p.m.

Memorial Candle lighting service; words from Beth Tikvah Holocaust Survivors and the screening of Echoes that Remain

ECHOES THAT REMAIN

Echoes that Remain is a poignant study of Jewish shtetl life before the Holocaust. It combines rare archival photos and previously unseen film footage with live action sequences from Jewish communities in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Poland, and Romania. The film will bring laughter and tears to both young and old. We quite rightly recall the Six Million but often overlook the destruction of our culture, communities and language. Narrated by Martin Landau & Miriam Margolyes. The film contains no graphic images.

All are welcome to attend. This program is free of charge.

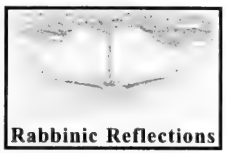
Questions for the rabbi about the Omer

By RABBI YECHIEL GOLDREICH



Ask your rabbi to tell you exactly what the Omer is and why we say it's counted this time of year. You'll be hard-pressed to get a satisfactory answer. We count the days and weeks, and yet we say that it's the Omer (a measure of grain) we count.

Ask your rabbi if the weeks between Passover and Shavuot are happy or sad ones. Again, you won't get any clear response.

Going to Mount Sinai was happy. But the death of Rabbi Akiva's students was sad. Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron are also very sad. However, Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayim are both happy. Sitting in the middle of these weeks is Lag b'Omer, the birthday of Jewish mysticism, which is on the whole a happy day, albeit in a spooky, mysterious sort of way.

If you're in a really wicked mood, ask your rabbi why we speak about the villainy of Germany on Yom Hashoah when Iran seems so much more evil these days. Ask him to highlight the appropriate sentiments one should have at a Yom Hazikaron commemoration, considering the Israeli soldiers killed in tragically ill-considered wars. Ask for the correct liturgy and proper rituals for a Yom Ha'atzmaut that celebrates an unpopular and scandal-plagued government in Israel. Find out if Yom Yerushalayim will still be celebrated after "east Jerusalem" is bartered away on the negotiation table.

I guarantee that you will get a reaction to those questions. However, it will probably be more political than religious or halachic.

I believe it's by Divine will that Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron, Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayim – the modern holidays – all occur during the days of the Omer.

The days of Omer are about the energy of the moment and are subject to shifting definitions. The springtime of the Omer, full of vigor and vitality, has always been about making the most of the moment. It's the time of year that the dead miss the most while in the afterlife. It's the time of year to travel to Sinai or sadly, like Rabbi Akiva's students, to destroy ourselves with disrespect and internal conflict. It's really up to us.

The only thing we are given is time – 49 days that dispassionately march by, marked only as a series of lunchtimes, one Omer's worth of grain, two Omers' worth of grain, etc., at a time.

Time indeed will tell if these holidays of the Omer will have staying power, or if the changes made to the calendar will be, by historical standards, only temporary. It took years for us to nail down Purim as a permanent fixture on the Jewish calendar. It took years to determine that the "Day of Nikanor" (a holiday that's no longer in observance) would not be a keeper. But the decisions of our generation will determine the outcome, liturgy and true mood of the Omer holidays.

So ask your rabbi about the Omer, about its fill-in-the-blank name, its mood and its politics. Or don't ask him. It's less a question than a call to complete unfinished business. We know that it will eventually end well for us, at Mount Sinai.

Until then, all we can do during the Omer is try to make each day count.

Rabbi Goldreich is assistant rabbi at Congregation Bnai Torah in Toronto.

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

We will soon be marking Yom Hazikaron, the Day of Remembrance for fallen Israeli soldiers. It is a sad and touching day, and unfortunately, many Diaspora Jews think it has nothing to do with them.

But for me, it falls around the same time of year as my own sister's yahrzeit, and so my thoughts in the early spring always turn to the question of how to best serve a loved one's memory – especially if that loved one, like so many of Israel's soldiers and my own sister, died too young. Each time I go to Israel I visit the military cemetery or the Kinneret Cemetery, and I note the young people who lie there and I feel a deep kinship with the mothers and sisters of those soldiers, even without knowing their names, because I too have walked the valley of the shadow of death.

Memory is a central tenet in Judaism. Three times a year, we memorialize our dead with the Yizkor prayer. We say to them in a very public way, "You live on in my daily life and your presence is as real to me as your absence." During the Passover seders that we just conducted, we dipped greens in salt water to remember the tears of slavery, and ate bitter herbs to experience that memory in a physical, visceral way.

But travelling in Uluru, in Australia, I met aboriginal tribes whose tradition was to forget. When a member of the tribe dies, the family burns their clothing, destroys their belongings and never speaks their names again.

One of the reasons the tribe doesn't allow pictures to be taken of its members is because once the picture finds its way out of Australia, they can't destroy it when the tribe member who was photographed dies. Remembrances of those now gone are considered anathema to them. How can a person's soul be at rest if there are still memories? How can the living "let go" of their dead if they keep remembering them?

And so a real tension exists, and we shouldn't shy away from naming it. On the one hand, we must go on with our lives. And going on sometimes means letting go in a real way. We have to force ourselves to put one foot in front of the other, and to do that, we sometimes become hard and we seem like the tribe in Uluru, denying our loved ones their memories.

On the other hand, we yearn to remember in a real and lasting way, so that as time passes, the memory doesn't fade and the face is as clear as yesterday and the stories go on. But it's true that the last picture is really the last– that we won't see them again in 20 years as a grown-up, and that they won't come to another seder. How hard it is to find the balance between the memory and the future. Judaism and Uluru both speak the truth to someone who has lost a loved one.

Those of us who have suffered tragic losses are never the same, and as a friend who also lost a sister once remarked to me, "We form a 'club' that no one wants to be a member of, yet only those who are members understand each other fully."

On Yom Hazikaron, the entire Jewish people gets an honorary membership, and it behooves us to be present for those who suffer.

The State of Israel was built, and continues to be built, on those sons and daughters who no longer sit at the seder table. My heart goes out in friendship and understanding as a "member of the club."

Witnesses and juries in Jewish law

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The riveting financial news of the past month has been the trial of Conrad Black, who is accused of fraud, racketeering, money laundering and obstruction of justice during his tenure as CEO of Hollinger Inc.

Unfortunately, our society seems to enjoy hearing about the minute details when high powered people are humbled and humiliated. While I am unaware of any restrictions on reporting Jewish judicial proceedings – apart from the general laws of lashon hara – one of the bedrocks of such proceedings is the dignity given to the convicted, not to mention the merely accused.

In an unbelievable talmudic interpretation, the rabbis assert that the verse "you shall love your neighbor as yourself" is said to be referring to a convicted criminal, even one deserving of death. "Choose for him a good death" the rabbis demand. While western court systems do show much dignity to the convicted, our media outlets are generally less concerned with such ethical demands.

There are, however, numerous ways in which western and Jewish court procedures diverge. The most relevant is the admissibility of testimony. Prosecutors in North America will often offer plea-bargain deals to lesser felons, who in exchange for testimony against others will receive a lesser sentence. Such testimony is then used to convict an even greater felon.

David Radler, Black's longtime business associate, who himself is accused of illegally diverting funds, has "agreed to cooperate" with the prosecution and will receive a lighter sentence than Black would likely get if he's convicted.

But Jewish law is clear that those who violate the many monetary mitzvot of the Torah are invalidated from being witnesses. Furthermore, accepting testimony from those who have a personal stake in their own testimony is problematic. That is the essence of a plea bargain, making it an unacceptable tool in the hands of prosecutors.

There are many cases in which informants with checkered pasts have been shown to lie under oath in a court of law. The western justice system has yet to learn the fundamental truth that those who have a history of illicit activities, absent evidence of a change in lifestyle, can't be trusted in a court of law – period. Taking such an approach would spare us the spectacle of accepting and relying on the testimony of known liars, cheats and even murderers.

While the testimony of former colleagues is acceptable in Jewish law, it's sad to see former close friends become bitter enemies when they are pitted against one another on opposite sides of a courtroom.

Perhaps this is the basis of the Torah forbidding relatives (first cousins and closer) from testifying. It seems to stem from more than the mere fear that relatives might lie. Even Moshe Rabbeinu and his brother Aaron are disqualified. Rather, the Torah didn't want families to be torn apart. Imagine what it would do to a family if one person's testimony was the basis of his brother being sentenced to death or even just to pay a fine. Sometimes, even justice must take a back seat.

Interestingly enough, the Talmud records an opinion (one that's not accepted in practice) that close friends are also disqualified from testifying against one another. Such testimony is liable to strain a friendship beyond repair.

Another difference between Black's trial and a Jewish court is in the makeup of the jury. Western jurisprudence deems judgment by one's peers to be the ideal (though in practice that is rarely the case – the jurors selected for the Black trial are not a cross-section of high flying CEOs). The beit din system, however, has no separate jury – judges, who must meet exacting standards of intellectual and moral achievement, serve as the jury. Rendering serious judicial decisions requires a special expertise that the average person does not have.

Yom Hashoah and Jewish resistance

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This year on the evening of April 15, people will pause to remember the heroism of the millions of Jews who perished in the Holocaust. They will also remember the Jews who marshalled what resources they had in order to fight back against Nazi oppression. As Yom Hashoah approaches, a look at Jewish resistance during World War II.

There are many sites that do an excellent job documenting the events leading up to the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising in 1943, such as the Jewish Virtual Library [http://tinyurl.com/ d8txe] and Yad Vashem Magazine. [http://tinyurl.com/yues7k]

But to get a feel for what it was like to be there, I recommend reading the lengthy memoir written by Marek Edelman, the only surviving leader of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising. "The partisans were on the alert everywhere… From balconies, windows and rooftops they showered the moving truckloads of SS-men with hand grenades and with rifle and pistol fire. Once, even a truck speeding on the 'Aryan side' was blown up. On one occasion, Rozowski and Sziomo, during the course of an area inspection, noticed an approaching German truck. They thought for an instant and then swiftly climbed to a balcony. From here they threw a four-pound powder charge straight down into the truck, killing all but five of the 60 SS-men in it." [http://tinyurl. com/2cbgyq]

Although it was the most famous act of defiance, the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising was far from being the only Jewish rebellion during the war. As the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum points out, "between 1941 and 1943, underground resistance movements developed in approximately 100 ghettos in Nazi-occupied eastern Europe (about one-fourth of all ghettos), especially in Poland, Lithuania, Belorussia and the Ukraine." [http://tinyurl.com/29ts9n]

You can find out much more about those other movements at The Miles Lerman Center for the study of Jewish Resistance [http://tinyurl.com/27 gwgr] and at the Resistance Timeline, part of the Teacher's Guide to the Holocaust created by the University of South Florida. [http://tinyurl.com/yt 64k8]

When you arrive at the Jewish Partisan Educational Foundation website, you are greeted with some difficult questions: Would you leave your family? What would you risk? Would you fight back? How far would you go? Then you are invited to "Learn about the tens of thousands of young people who stood up to Nazi tyranny and oppression and saved the lives of thousands of Jews." This excellent site is geared to young people and is relatively light on text but gets the message across through dozens of gripping video interviews with partisans.

As well, visitors are encouraged to e-mail questions to a panel of six partisans who post their responses on the site. One sample question: "How did you survive the winter's cold?" Frank Blaichman's response: "Outside like an animal. Sleeping on the freezing ground. Went through hail, snow storms, rain storms. When you woke up in the morning I was covered with a blanket of snow many times. Snow was like insulation. It was not cold. Kept you warm a little bit. That is how we survived the first winter 1942-1943. We had no bunkers, they were destroyed in November, and we could not build any more bunkers. The spirit was high. We knew we were going to live." [www.jewishpartisans.org]

I recently focused on websites that look at the challenges and resources available to Jews in prison. Karen Paikin of Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto wrote to point out that the situation faced by Jewish prisoners in Canada is very different from that in the United States. You can learn more about the plight of two Jews behind bars on this side of the border from an article in Canadian Jewish News which also focuses on the work of chaplain Rabbi Ronald Weiss. [http://tinyurl.com/ywkol2] As well, Jewish Family and Child Service has created an overview of its chaplaincy department, which services hospital patients, residents of long-term care facilities, as well as Jewish inmates. [http://tinyurl.com/2lepy9]

Photos recall Jewish life in small Polish town

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The collected photographs of Zalman Kaplan, who ran a studio in the town of Szczuczyn, Poland, between 1898 and 1939, might never have been considered remarkable or been made the focus of a travelling museum exhibit, had it not been for the almost complete destruction of Szczuczyn's Jewish community of 3,000 souls during the Nazi era.

His carefully posed and composed photographs – some 200 of which form the basis of "Lives Remembered: Photographs of a Small Town in Poland, 1898 to 1939," currently on view at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue – seem to reveal a prosperous town whose well-kept Jewish citizens were happily involved in a range of middle-class activities, including playing volleyball, listening to phonograph records, riding bicycles and driving automobiles.

Kaplan's various group photos record the vibrant everyday life of Szczuczyn Jews at home and school, on nature outings, in military uniform and at synagogue. But as the photographer's grandson Mike Marvins points out, they do not show the poor yeshiva bochers, squalid marketplaces or shtreiml-wearing old rebbes typical of the photographs of Roman Vishniac, who captured the more romantic, Old World elements of Polish Jewry.

"Vishniac's pictures are mostly of impoverished people and mostly chassidic people, but my grandfather's pictures show ordinary, everyday people," said Marvins, himself an accomplished Houston-based photographer who put the show together and attended its Toronto opening.

Toronto, it turns out, has played a significant role in Marvins' family history and in the genesis of the exhibition, which was created for the New York Museum of Jewish Heritage more than a decade ago. (It has travelled to various American cities and the Jewish Historical Institute of Warsaw, Poland, and a version of it is currently touring Poland; several of the photographs also appeared in an earlier exhibit at Beth Tzedec.)

Kaye Marvins, the photographer's son, came to Toronto in the 1920s as Moishe Kaplan and worked briefly for the Gilbert photography studio on Queen Street West before relocating to Boston and then Houston.

Recollecting that Marvins used to babysit him when he was a child, local photographer Al Gilbert noted that Zalman Kaplan, who died in 1941, had once expressed a wish to cross the Atlantic. "When he first got a Leica camera – that was the Rolls-Royce of cameras – his comment was, 'If I could just take this camera to America, I would be a wealthy man,'" Gilbert said.

Another Kaplan son settled in Toronto permanently. Laura Kaplan Silver is a retired Toronto-area teacher and a granddaughter of the photographer who helped her Houston cousin assemble the exhibition.

A photograph captioned, "Kelsen leaves for Canada," showing several people at a table, suggests that other Szczuczyners also reached these shores. Indeed, some Kelsen family members attended the opening and proudly pointed out their respective fathers, Max and Haim Kelsen, as boys in a blown-up photograph of a group of costumed children acting in a Purim shpiel. Both are wearing fake moustaches as they stand amidst the colourful group. Max became a cigar store proprietor in Toronto, Haim a manufacturer.

Ellen Scheinberg, director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, also took a personal interest in the exhibit, explaining that her paternal ancestors lived in Szczuczyn but left for New York before 1914. "It's a really impressive exhibit," she said. "It gives you a good sense of the community before the Nazis tore it apart."

In the mid-1990s, Marvins and Silver pooled their private collections of their grandfather's photographs and realized they could mount a poignant exhibit of the town's Jewish community if they could find more samples of his work.

Eventually they collected more than 800 of their grandfather's photographs, more than enough for a first exhibition in 2002. "I keep getting pictures," Marvins said. "I just got a new picture last week."

"Lives Remembered: Photographs of a Small Town in Poland, 1898 to 1939" is on view for several months at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, 1700 Bathurst St., where it was attractively installed in the second-floor mezzanine gallery by curator Dorian Leibgott. A book of the exhibit – Lives Remembered: A Shtetl Through a Photographer's Eye – is also available. For more information, call 416-781-3511.

Shuls join to observe Yom Hazikaron

For the first time, three Bayview Avenue synagogues will join together to observe Yom Hazikaron, in commemoration of those who have given their lives in defence of Israel.

The memorial service will be held April 22, 7 p.m., at Temple Har Zion, 7360 Bayview Ave., Thornhill.

A tribute to Israel's fallen heroes will be performed by vocalists Cantor Anna Trubashnik of Temple Emanuel; Rabbi Cory Weiss, Tara Abrams and Eleanor Rice of Temple Har Zion; and the Beth Tikvah Synagogue choir.

A Yizkor service will be followed by words from Rachel Kaplan, Jewish Agency for Israel shlichah to Hillel of Greater Toronto, and a message from a representative of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada.

Beit Halochem Israel, a world leader in integrative rehabilitation of those injured in battle or terrorism, assists soldiers and civilians and their families after their injuries have been medically treated, by offering physical therapy, recreational activities and moral support.

In Canada, the organization has been raising funds since 1984, and each year it hosts a group of Israeli disabled war veterans who participate in cultural and entertainment activities in Toronto, visit Jewish day schools and other Jewish facilities.

Community shocked by firebombing

Passover, it should be assumed to be crime directed at the Jewish people – until there is evidence to the contrary.

The attack came almost three years to the day after the Passover firebombing at the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) elementary school, which destroyed its library. Since then, security at Jewish community institutions has been considerably increased and was traditionally high during holidays even before that.

Over Labour Day weekend last year, a Molotov cocktail exploded at the entrance of a chassidic boys school in Outremont, Toldos Yakov Yosef, causing significant damage. Although a suspect was caught on the school's surveillance camera, no arrest was ever made.

Now, the third bombing incident in as many years is taking a psychological toll on the community.

"We are stunned at this appalling attack on a Jewish community institution, which is doubly offensive because once again this attack comes as Jews celebrate Passover," said Joachim Normand, executive-director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region.

"Every act against a Jewish institution threatens the feeling of safety and security of the community. It is inevitable that the attack stirs painful memories of that heinous crime [at UTT] and [of the chassidic school's bombing]."

"This dangerous act of violence targeting the Jewish community occurred just as its members were gathering at their seder tables," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and co-chair with Rabbi Poupko of the security coordinating committee. "For many Jewish families, the joy of the Passover celebration was shattered by the news of this devastating incident."

Adel noted that B'nai Brith's 2006 audit of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada recorded a steep increase in Quebec to 226 incidents, up from 133 the previous year. The vast majority occurred on Montreal Island and include physical assaults on individuals, vandalism of synagogues and Jewish community property, and overtly anti-Semitic remarks.

"Montreal Jews are feeling particularly vulnerable and under threat and have already begun to review what additional steps may be necessary to secure their communal institutions and places of worship," Adel said.

B'nai Brith renewed its call for the Montreal police department to establish a hate-crimes unit, as has been done in most other large Canadian cities. Slimovitch said such a unit would ensure that the necessary resources and expertise are devoted to solving hate crimes.

But CJC and Rabbi Poupko commended the police for the way they handled the UTT firebombing, which resulted in the arrest a month later of the man eventually found guilty of the arson, and for an apparent breakthrough in the Toldos Yakov Yosef firebombing.

At the same time as the news of the Y attack was made public, the police announced that they believe the Toldos Yakov Yosef crime was committed by the same person who torched a car in east-end Montreal two weeks later. The connection was made through a laboratory analysis of a handwritten note left on windshield of a car parked behind the burnt vehicle and a similar document found at the school.

This is the first time police have made known that any writing was found at the school.

"We have always asked for a hate-crimes unit, but our main concern is that the job gets done, and that's what happened with UTT and now with the Skver school," Rabbi Poupko said.

Federal Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day said he was "appalled" by the Y incident.

"When such an act takes place at a holy time for both Jews and Christians, it represents an affront to the value that all Canadians place on their safety. We must not tolerate actions that threaten our communities, and I commend local authorities for the efforts they are making to find those responsible."

The incident was also denounced by the Canadian Council on American-Islamic Relations.

"We are asking anyone with information on the incident to contact police and assist with their investigation," said Sarah Elgazzar, the group's Montreal co-ordinator.

"Criminal attacks against religious and community institutions do nothing but create tension in our neighbourhoods and cities," Elgazzar said.

"It is critical that public authorities and elected officials act responsibly to ensure all are allowed freedom of belief, as enshrined in the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, and that criminals and bigots do not erode that value."

Willowdale MP calls it quits after 27 years

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

He's been an almost permanent fixture on Parliament Hill for the last three decades, but Jim Peterson, the long-serving Liberal MP for Willowdale, has decided to call it a day.

The Ottawa-born Peterson, 65, announced March 8 that he will retire from political life after the next federal election, whenever that may be.

The decision was made with his wife, Heather, after the last federal vote, when they concluded it was time for a change.

"It's a great time for us to get on with the rest of our life together," Peterson told The CJN in a recent interview at his Toronto home. "I'm looking forward to seeing a lot more of my family and friends."

Peterson, who has seen seven prime ministers hold the top job during his time as an MP (he was defeated by Tory John Oostrom in 1984, but regained his seat in 1988), recalled with fondness his interactions with his riding's Jewish community.

"When I was first elected [in 1980], I had both sides of Bathurst street and it was a very active Jewish community," he said. "That's one of the reasons I was so happy to be in Willowdale. I very much loved working with the community and with its leaders."

The riding, whose boundaries have been redrawn over the years, is now only about 10 per cent Jewish, but in the late 1980s and early 1990s, its Jewish population was roughly double that figure.

Throughout his interactions with the Jewish community, he was always sensitive to its concerns, primarily on the ongoing question of Israel, he said.

"Israel has the right to exist and to fight terrorism to defend itself," Peterson said unequivocally. "Israel's been at war since its birth and has come to peace agreements with only two of the Arab League countries around it [Jordan and Egypt]."

He added that Canada can play a role in promoting harmony in the region and helping Palestinians with development, but only if a peaceful agreement or accord can be arrived at.

"Whether this new [Hamas/Fatah] coalition is going to be of any value or not, we'll have to see. But I do believe that as a precondition to dealing with them, they should recognize Israel's right to exist," Peterson said.

On the global concern of Iran's belligerence toward Israel, Peterson slammed the UN General Assembly for having "not been very favourable to Israel in the past, to say the least. I don't want to leave the whole Middle East up to the general assembly. We know how one sided they have become."

Instead, the former international trade minister believes Canada should exert pressure on the UN security council to help rally support for the Holy Land.

Peterson also reminisced about his successes over the years. Of particular pride was a historic legal accomplishment.

From 1980 to 1984, in his role as parliamentary secretary to then-justice minister Jean Chrétien, he helped push through a constitutional amendment that saw changes to Canada's rape laws whereby a woman's past sexual history could no longer be used against her in court.

Jim Peterson

"The bill was such that we were being boycotted by the NDP and stonewalled by the Tories," said Peterson, who was a practising lawyer before entering politics.

"I told Mr. Chrétien, 'I bet you 25 cents I can get this through if I can do it my way.' We called in all the women's groups across Canada, who pressured the opposition parties. I think that made a huge difference in the law."

Though he has many memories of his time and successes in office, such as his creation of both the Canadian bank ombudsman position and the Financial Tracking Agency of Canada (FINTRAC) to counter money laundering, he also experienced exciting times prior to entering political life.

In 1972, the Sudanese government asked Peterson for advice on a contract it signed with a private sugar company.

While in Sudan, he urged its leaders to restructure the contract because it was unfair to the the government, but the advice was not well-received by certain politicians who had been bribed by the company.

He and his wife were forced to flee the country as a result.

"I'm quite proud of that adventure," Peterson said with a slight smile.

Then, in 1974 at the height of the Cold War, he was at the centre of an international incident: the defection of famed Bolshoi Ballet dancer Mikhail Baryshnikov in Toronto.

Peterson was instrumental in co-ordinating getaway cars and hideouts for the Russian, who made his escape from under the KGB's nose after a performance at what is now the Hummingbird Centre, and he acted as Baryshnikov's lawyer throughout the remainder of the defection process.

They are close friends to this day.

Recently, Peterson's interests have turned decidedly green. He's become very passionate about climate change and hopes to be more active in this area in the coming years.

"Greenhouse gasses know no borders," he said. "I want to see India and China in on [the Kyoto protocols] as well. I know that China knows [it's] going to suffer greatly because of the pollution [it could generate]. Canadians can help them find ways to burn clean coal and find alternative energy for them."

Peterson, who holds law degrees from McGill University, the University of Western Ontario and Columbia University, is also contemplating teaching law and working in the private sector.

"I've had an incredible time, and I haven't regretted a minute of it," he said. "There have been great personal and party ups and downs. What more could you ask for than the opportunity to be the spokesperson and voice for your riding in the nation's capital?"

When asked if he ever aspired to become prime minister, Peterson – who is the older brother of former Ontario premier David Peterson and current Ontario MPP Tim Peterson – chuckled and quickly responded, "Never for about more than 10 minutes."

His temperament isn't suited to the job, he added.

His parting words of advice for aspiring politicians?

"Work very hard and have a lot of fun. Don't take yourself too seriously, but take your country and your constituents seriously," he said.

The Liberal party has named former leadership hopeful Martha Hall Findlay as its candidate in the next federal election.

On her website, Hall Findlay praised Peterson's years of service.

"Jim Peterson has represented both Willowdale and Canada as an outstanding member of Parliament and cabinet minister," she wrote. "His distinguished parliamentary career is a terrific model for all."

Israel is not the real obstacle to Saudi plan

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

This column was being written just as the Arab League summit in Riyadh (March 28 to 29) concluded with the unanimous adoption of the Saudi peace plan in its original, unmodified form. Media reports leading up to the event were divided: it was either a fresh opportunity for peace or another doomed initiative.

Some journalists favoured the line that the Saudi initiative offered a renewed opportunity to achieve a comprehensive Arab-Israeli peace, based on a previous, reasonable plan that was unaccountably spurned by the Israelis.

For example, on CBC Radio (March 25), Nahlah Ayed reported: "Five years ago, Arab countries made an offer to establish normal relations with Israel if it withdrew from land occupied in 1967 and allowed Palestinians to establish an independent state with east Jerusalem as its capital. At the time, Israel rejected the deal, but recently, Israel has said that the offer has some positive elements." Ayed neglected to mention the crucial sticking point – the so-called Palestinian "right of return."

Similarly, in a front-page Globe and Mail report ("U.S. open to separate dialogue with Arabs," March 26), Carolynne Wheeler wrote that the Arab League summit is "expected to resurrect the 2002 Arab peace initiative. Introduced by Saudi Arabia and endorsed that year at an Arab summit in Beirut, it calls for a two-state solution based on the 1967 borders, with East Jerusalem as its capital and a 'just solution' for Palestinian refugees, in exchange for recognition of Israel and fully normalized relations with all signatory states."

However, some journalists were wary of the Saudi plan, recognizing that it contains the same fatal flaw as the 2002 initiative – the insistence on a "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel, which would mean the elimination of Israel as the Jewish state.

These journalists have looked at the actual wording of the 2002 plan, endorsed in Riyadh, that calls for "a just solution to the Palestinian refugee problem to be agreed upon in accordance with UN General Assembly Resolution 194" – what the Arabs interpret as enshrining that "right," which they are not prepared to relinquish at Israel's, or anyone else's, request. (Even the European Union's foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, urged the Arab states to be "flexible" toward Israel, but without success.)

The skeptical view was surprisingly found in the Economist, a highly influential British news magazine not known for its sympathy toward Israel. In its editorial, "Time for an Arab road map" (March 24 issue), the magazine noted that the Beirut plan is one "no Israeli government could accept, since it entail[s] Israel giving up every inch of land occupied in 1967 and implies letting all refugees displaced by the creation of the Jewish state return to what is now Israel."

Instead, the Economist argued that a revived Saudi plan, if serious, would "have to resemble Bill Clinton's 'parameters' of 2000: Israeli withdrawal from most but not all of the West Bank [hence no return to the precise 'Green Line'], land swaps to make up for any chunks [Israel] keeps, a deal to share Jerusalem and a return of most refugees to a Palestinian state rather than Israel proper."

Remarkably, the Economist placed more onus on the Arabs than on Israel to usher in a real breakthrough, based on the Clinton plan: "A good way to restart diplomacy would be for America and the Arab states to confirm that this is roughly how they see a final agreement. They might thus reassure Palestinians that they will get a fair deal, and assuage Israeli fears of being confronted with excessive demands. At the very least, the Arabs should indicate that their Beirut initiative was a starting point, not a final demand."

Unfortunately, it's doubtful that the Arabs will take the sensible advice of the Economist editors. Since the latest Saudi plan appears to echo the previous Beirut initiative, it again might, without modification, force Israel to reject it. Once more, the Saudis and others can deflect criticism of their diplomatic inflexibility by blaming Israel for failing to seize an historic opportunity.

Totally ignored will be the fact that the Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority rejects Israel's right to exist and insists, along with the Arab consensus, that it will never surrender the Palestinian "right of return" to what is now Israel.

The secret to the Technion's success

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Consider Intel's Centrino processing chip; or the Pentium II. How about Given Imaging's diagnostic pill-cam that replaced the uncomfortable tubes shoved down a patient's throat; or the Arrow, the world's most advanced anti-missile missile. Then there are MRIs and CAT scans, medical imaging devices that are used around the world. And there's drip irrigation, text messaging and....

If you wanted to name all the ingenious devices churned out by Israel's high tech industry, you could go on for hours. But if you wanted to name the single technological school that trained the people responsible for conceptualizing and developing most of those products, one name comes up again and again: the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology.

Israel is a world leader in high tech research and development, thanks in large part to the highly educated, motivated, creative and entrepreneurial work force trained at the Technion, said the institute's president, Yitzhak Apeloig. "The Technion is really unique. It is the institute that in many respects is responsible for the way you see Israel today. It's really the powerhouse behind Israel's economic and security viability."

Apeloig was in Toronto last week to meet with members of the Canadian Technion Society, who are among the Haifa-based institute's most important supporters. In recent years, the Technion received two major contributions from Toronto entrepreneurs. Peter Munk, founder of Barrick Gold, gave $18.5 million; businessman Seymour Schulich gave $20 million (US) to train scientist and scholars in the field of chemistry.

Though the Technion is funded in part by the government of Israel, gifts from supporters abroad enable the school to develop new areas of growth. One very large endowment to the Alfred Mann Institute for Biomedical Applied Research supports the development of new products and makes them commercially viable. Funds raised through the sale of Technion-generated items will be channeled back into the institute to support other developments.

Yitzhak Apeloig

Apeloig said many leading international firms are located in the Haifa area – Intel, Motorola, Microsoft, Cisco, among others – to take advantage of the human capital developed at the Technion.

"There's no large international company in high tech that does not have a R & D centre in Israel," Apeloig said.

When it was established in 1924, the Technion was the only facility in Israel educating engineers. Today, Ben-Gurion University does so as well, but Apeloig noted, "the departments there were created by Technion people.

"The Technion remains the largest and highest quality institute in Israel. You can trace all the developments in industry to the Technion and its graduates."

More than 12,000 students were registered at Technion in 2006, from undergraduates to doctoral candidates. Technion grads constitute more than 70 per cent of the founders and managers of high-tech industries in Israel.

Apeloig pointed in particular to Israel's aerospace industry, which relied entirely on Technion's aerospace engineering department when it was created in the 1950s. "Out of this single department, the entire aerospace industry of Israel – one of the most advanced in the world – has developed," he said.

One of the institute's most noteworthy military applications is the unmanned airplane. Israel was the first to develop pilotless drones and today the aircraft are a money-making export item.

Additionally, Israel is one of only six countries around the world that can launch its own satellites.

The Technion garnered international recognition in 2004 when two of its professors, Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover of the faculty of medicine, were granted the Nobel Prize in chemistry for their discovery of the role of ubiquitin in the process of protein breakdown in cells.

The result of all this applied brainpower is that Israel is now "second only to Silicon Valley in high tech companies," surpassing even Boston. Israeli companies are second in number of Nasdaq listings behind only U.S. corporations, passing Canada for the number two spot, Apeloig said.

Israel's high tech capabilities attracted more than $22 billion (US) in venture capital last year and for the first time in its history, Israel was able to record a balance of payments surplus, "mainly due to fast growth of high tech industries," he said.

So what makes the Technion so successful that educators from China, Singapore and Hong Kong have made the trek to the Mount Carmel campus?

"It's not simple," Apeloig said. "It's due to the combination of high education, research in technology and science and probably connected to Israel's character of entrepreneurship. People think independently. It's part of the culture.

"The first thing I tell my students is that I'm a professor, but don't believe everything I teach you in class. Go out and check it for yourself.

"We also try to encourage this in a variety of competitions."

Another factor is students' military service, Apeloig continued. "Many young people get a lot of responsibility in the army. It encourages them to take risks and independent steps."

Finally, there is the school's interdisciplinary approach, as illustrated by its research into nanotechnology (nano refers to one-billionth of a metre). Biology students study electrical engineering while engineering students study biology, he said.

Nanotechnology is one area Technion scientists are studying. The institute is investing $100 million over five years to examine ways of manipulating matter on the nano scale.

The payoff could be huge. As Apeloig describes it, nanotechnology could see all the information created by humanity in one year stored on a device the size of a sugar cube; or in medicine, censors could direct drugs to be delivered on a nano scale directly to the area of disease, sparing healthy tissues from the effects of powerful pharmaceuticals.

Another project currently awaiting FDA approval is one in which robots a couple of inches wide are inserted in a patient's back where they perform delicate spinal surgery.

Despite past and current successes, not all is rosy for the Technion. Educators have noticed a decline in the educational level of Israeli high school students over the past 20 years. "Many people are very concerned about it," Apeloig said.

Scores by Israeli students on international tests have dropped. Thirty years ago, they ranked first or second in math; today they are closer to 15th or 20th.

Students today are just as bright as the ones back then, but the public school system has failed them, he said.

To compensate, the Technion offers pre-academic "enhancement courses" for students completing their army service and the school helps candidates prepare for the Technion's entrance exams.

As if discussing any other technical glitch, Apeloig explains simply, "We fixed the problem."

Coast to Coast

'We are soldiers and soldiers are trained in soldierly skills'

in firefights and other hot engagements. Canadian soldiers were even taken hostage by hostile forces and "that was still seen as a UN soft mission," she said.

"The nice, friendly UN tour, like helping the poor people… that's been gone for about a decade," she said.

"We absolutely do softer missions but we are soldiers and soldiers are trained in soldierly skills."

Freeman, who joined the reserves in 1990, enlisted in the regular forces too late to be posted to Kabul, which was like "Disneyland" compared to the Canadian military's current zone of operations in Kandahar and the surrounding area.

In that hotly contested region, allied troops face a constant danger from IEDs (improvised explosive devices) that are placed on roads to take out passing vehicles. Her unit has taken small arms fire, RPGs and she tells of suicide bombers and remote controlled devices that are even placed on donkeys.

As part of Operation Athena, the Canadian Forces contribution to the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), she saw artillery, Apache attack helicopters, and A10 strike aircraft hit enemy forces.

During one battle, she was stationed with U.S. medics in forward "casualty collection point" between Allied artillery and advancing troops. At the same time, American psy ops (psychological operations) personnel set up massive speakers to blast annoying rock music at enemy positions to prevent them from sleeping and to generally make their lives miserable.

The Second Field Ambulance's primary job is to treat combat victims, although as a reservist she worked in a Vancouver emergency room. "I don't think anything can prepare anyone for that," she said.

When the casualties overwhelm the medical crews, other soldiers pitch in, including firefighters who have some training, and other troops, who help move patients and lend other non-medical assistance.

During her assignment, a few Canadians were killed in action, and of course when that happened, she immediately thought about her parents. Regulations, however, prohibit calls to Canada until the victim's family is notified, "so I tell mom, if you hear about it on the radio, it's not me."

Her comrades know she is Jewish, and she is sometimes asked to explain Jewish holidays and other aspects of Jewish life to curious Canadian soldiers.

During the High Holy Days, services were held at the Kandahar air base for Allied soldiers, but she was too far away to get there. However, the camp padre helped her celebrate the Jewish New Year by eating apples and honey together.

During Chanukah, her friends served her a big helping of greasy french fries, the closest they could get to potato latkes. However, she asked her friends not to sing Chanukah songs with her in the mess hall, as there were local interpreters present and she did not wish to publicize the fact she's Jewish.

Tamar knows her mother wasn't thrilled about the Afghanistan assignment. "I think she probably worried 24/7, but only for six months."

Her mother agrees, but she points to a picture of Tamar, as a member of a Provincial Reconstruction Team being thanked by a burka-clad Afghan woman at a village medical clinic. It has been blown up and was displayed as a poster at a welcome home party at the family's North York apartment.

"It speaks volumes," her mother, Gilda, said as she turned to Tamar. "As profound as our terror was in the six months and the three months before she left, we are very impressed with your compassion and your goodness."

With that, she plants a kiss on her daughter's head.

"I didn't tell my parents some things to protect them. The things you do for your parents," Tamar quipped.

Tamar's father Harvey, who served in the air force reserves, readily admits he wished Tamar was not exposed to the dangers of Afghanistan.

"It's not a nice place to be and it caused us some anxiety. In retrospect, we are proud of what she did – aid to the Afghan people and to comfort the dead and dying Canadians.

"She did a lot of good work that needed to be done. I see her doing tikkun olam [repairing the world] in Afghanistan in a small, hopeful way."

When not treating wounded soldiers, Freeman and her unit helped reconstruction teams better the conditions of ordinary Afghans. Canadian clinics help improve medical care of the local population and other small projects "that seem to make a difference."

"We did more than 400 projects in six months," she said.

Over the course of her Afghan rotation, Freeman believes those efforts engendered goodwill with the local population. Teenagers became friendlier and approached Canadians to practise their English. The older men ("we don't see a lot of women") made small talk, asking her about her family, whether she's single and she even received a proposal to meet someone's cousin.

"I don't know how many camels I would fetch," she joked.

Still, there is plenty of resentment from some locals, who don't like infidel foreigners in their country, she said. But with her 9 mm pistol and C7 rifle (a modified American M16), "they kind of give you respect."

Freeman, who attended United Synagogue Day School as a young girl, has always been intrigued by the military. Her father inspired her with stories from his days in the reserves, and she joined the reserves thinking "it would be interesting."

As a reservist, she committed to joining her unit one day a week and one weekend a month.

"It was certainly challenging," she said. She served on board ships, in hospitals and in defence research facilities.

"I was thinking, I was enjoying it so much as a reservist, why not do it full time?"

She knew that in exchange for the higher pay, subsidized housing and retirement package, she might be shipped abroad. But that was no deterrent.

A lot of her friends in the military were sent abroad on various missions.

"It's part of the reason you join… When you get the opportunity to go, you're doing what you've been training for for years," she said.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Italians saved 43,000 Jews during war: author

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Not many people know that the majority of Italian Jews survived the Holocaust.

In the final years of World War II, nearly 50,000 native-born and foreign Jews were hidden, cared for and protected by ordinary Italians, said novelist Mary Doria Russell.

"When Germany finally surrendered... approximately 43,000 of those 50,000 Jews were still alive."

She said although it's hard to get precise figures, "about 85 per cent of the Jews of Italy survived the Holocaust."

Russell, a convert to Judaism, is the author of the Pulitzer Prize-nominated novel A Thread of Grace (Random House), which is about Jews who sought refuge in Italy in 1943. Her recent lecture in Winnipeg was sponsored by St. Paul's College and the University of Manitoba.

When asked why it is not generally known that the Italians saved so many Jews, Russell said, "Academics in the field know about it, but Italians don't talk about it... After Germany finally surrendered at the end of World War II, Italy had a civil war and 100,000 people in northern Italy were killed... After a war like that, if you are going to go on having a civil society, you have to stop talking about the past... It's like a curtain of silence was thrown over the whole era."

"Also, many Italians I interviewed don't think they did anything so special in hiding Jews. They would say that it was nothing," she added.

Russell began to explore the fate of Italian Jews in the Holocaust when she came across a book by Alexander Stille titled Benevolence and Betrayal: Five Italian Jewish Families Under Fascism.

"When I saw that book, I thought wow. I am Italian by heritage and I am a Jew by choice... Everything I learned in Stille's book was a revelation," she said. "I thought, this has got to be my next novel."

Russell spent seven years researching A Thread of Grace. In Italy, she interviewed Jewish survivors, Italian rescuers and veterans of Italy's anti-fascist resistance.

During World War II, Italy under dictator Benito Mussolini was allied with Nazi Germany for three years, until Mussolini was deposed in July 1943. Weeks later, Italy secretly surrendered to the Allies – a move Hitler anticipated. When General Dwight Eisenhower announced an armistice with Italy on Sept. 8, 1943, German troops were massed along the Italian border and ready to occupy Italy immediately.

Russell said that even before the armistice, "the Italians' absolute lack of co-operation with the Final Solution drove the Gestapo crazy. In Italy's occupied territories, the Italian military police never co-operated with surrender on demand orders...

"For the three years that Italy was an ally of Germany, not one Jew was turned over to the Nazis," she said, citing Gestapo memoranda on the subject.

"Jewish refugees knew that [if] they could get behind Italian lines, they were safe. They could live like human beings. They didn't have to wear a star, they weren't press-ganged for labour, they were allowed to set up synagogues and old folks homes and schools under Italian occupation."

When Italy made a separate peace with the Allies, the German occupation was vicious and vindictive, after years of frustration with their former ally. The Nazis' first move was to round up Italian men between 15 and 50 for slave labour in Germany. The Nazis struck first in Rome and rounded up Jews and sent them to Auschwitz.

"Italians will tell you, 'Half of Italy was hiding the other half.' Everyone was hiding a brother or a son or a husband. So to hide a Jew wasn't that much more risky,'" Russell said.

"Hiding people from the Germans was a form of resistance. If they caught you, they'd kill you. People knew how dangerous it was, but they did it anyway."

When Russell interviewed Italians who hid Jews about their extraordinary response to the Shoah, they would respond with comments like, "It was nothing" or "I only did what anyone with a shred of compassion would have done" or "I was in a position to help, so naturally I did." One Italian asked Russell, "How could anyone have done differently?"

Russell is the author of the award-winning best-sellers The Sparrow (1996) and Children of God (1998), which have been optioned by Warner Brothers for a motion picture starring Brad Pitt. Her fourth novel Dreamers of the Day, about the 1921 Cairo Peace Conference, will be out in early 2008.

Canadian Jewish Congress present and future glory days honoured in Senate

In honour of the 88th anniversary of the founding of Canadian Jewish Congress, Senator Yoine Goldstein, Past Chair of UIA Federations Canada, praised the organization's ongoing success in a statement to the Senate March 20:

Honourable senators, last weekend marked the 88th anniversary of the establishment of the Canadian Jewish Congress. Its original founding convention was held from March 16-19, 1919. It was attended by 209 delegates and some 2,500 spectators. I have a particular affinity to that founding convention because my wife's maternal grandfather was one of those delegates. ...

Canadian Jewish Congress works to foster a Canada where Jews, as an essential part of the multicultural fabric of this country, live in and contribute to an environment of opportunity, mutual respect and tolerance. The mandate of Canadian Jewish Congress includes the proactive defence of the security, status and rights of the Jewish community, seeking the support of governments on a wide range of policy issues identified as having human rights significance and the promotion of the values of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and human rights here and abroad.

The congress advocates on behalf of Canadian Jewry to advance these objectives in cooperation and collaboration with other like-minded, not-for-profit and representative organizations. Much of the work of the congress is carried on through the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee, a separate charitable trust that supports a stronger Canadian society through activities involving fighting against anti-Semitism and all other forms of racism through education programs of inter-faith and cross-cultural relations.

Honourable senators, please join me in congratulating this historic Canadian democratic institution on the occasion of its 88th anniversary.

To register for the Canadian Jewish Congress Triennial Plenary to be held June 17 in Ottawa, contact Josh Rotblatt at joshr@cjc.ca or 1-888-407-5548. For more information about CJC, visit www.cjc.ca.

Victoria choir recasts Samson as terrorist

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Victoria Philharmonic Choir (VPC) recently decided to tread into political waters with a three-date, limited-run performance of Handel's Samson oratorio.

The twist? Samson, the biblical hero who tore down Philistine pillars to exact revenge for the Jewish people, was recast as Samson, Jewish suicide bomber.

The idea is the brainchild of VPC musical director, Simon Capet.

On March 29, Capet told CBC News Online he grew up in IRA-era Britain and lost friends in the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 over Lockerbie, Scotland, in 1988.

"Samson could be any 'freedom fighter'" Capet told the CBC. "Some say I'm brave, some say I'm anti-Israel... The point is to get discussion going."

Calls to Capet and the VPC by The CJN were not immediately returned.

Last Sunday, the choir played its third and last performance of the oratorio, but not without loads of controversy.

On its website, the VPC characterized the biblical story in this way, "The oratorio opens when Isrealite Samson has already been betrayed by the seductress Dalila... He has been captured by the Philistines, blinded and tortured. In revenge, as 3,000 Philistines feast and celebrate, he brings down the pillars of a temple, killing himself and everyone inside. In a sense, he was the Middle East's first suicide terrorist."

To emphasize this theme, instead of setting the scene in biblical times, Capet chose to situate the characters in Jerusalem of 1946 to draw comparisons with the Menachem Beginled Irgun bombing of the British headquarters at the King David Hotel that year.

In VPC's production, Samson blows himself up at the headquarters.

In a March 28, Times Colonist report, Capet said he did not mean for the changes in the oratorio to offend but that he wanted to "present the work as a simple morality tale" designed to reflect today's Middle East realities.

In the article, Capet also questioned whether there was any difference between "pulling down a pillar or blowing [up] a bomb," and added that in his opinion, because Samson "killed thousands of people... to show him in the traditional mythological sense does a disservice."

The VPC's decision to run the show in its rejigged format prompted heated responses on its website's commentary section and with local community members.

"Terrorism is the deliberate targeting of innocent civilians to achieve a political end. Samson's act was to directly punish the Philistines for their transgressions and was not designed to 'terrorize' anyone. Drawing any equivalence between the two is just ignorant and stupid," wrote one talk-backer.

"[VPC artists] should be ashamed of presenting such a bastardization of Samson. This is not the kind of 'talk' one wants or makes about music or, if it is, it is misguided and inflammatory. Philharmonic choir my left foot," wrote another.

> 'Promotes a shallow understanding of history'

Rabbi Itzchak Marmorstein, of Victoria's Mercaz Haraya, voiced similar concerns.

"It promotes a shallow understanding of history and is offensive… Israelis never supported Irgun or that kind of terrorism," Rabbi Marmorstein told the Times Colonist. "They weren't heroes… and Begin went into politics legitimately decades later. He wasn't some crazy terrorist."

In response to the negative criticism, on April 4, Capet posted his own rebuttal on the VPC website, explaining why he chose the controversial route.

"After the Second World War, many Jewish people were leaving Europe after the atrocities… Looking for a better life, they flocked to Palestine and found themselves back in camps, this time under the control and oppression of the British," Capet wrote. "Like the oppressed anywhere in the world, some rose up to fight against this. Irgun… did attack the British during that period."

Capet continued, "Depending on one's perspective, Menachem Begin was either a freedom fighter or a terrorist. He went on to become prime minister, but most importantly... he was able to leave his violent past behind and eventually extended the hand of friendship to [former Egyptian president] Anwar Sadat in the 1980s, forging the first fragile peace the area had seen in many years."

In summing up, Capet wrote he realized people would disagree with his interpretation but that he hoped for "civil, thoughtful discussion" instead of the "hate-fuelled language" that had popped up on the VPC website.

I have had the pleasure of serving you as a Bencher since 1995. I have been a Member of the LawPRO (LPIC) Board since 1995 and have been the Chairman of the Board of that entity since 2003.

LawPRO had a massive deficit of $154 million in 1995 and is now a financially sound company. We have seen our insurance premiums drop to $2,600 per year from the high of $5,600 in 1995.

LPIC (LawPRO) Insurance Premiums and Law Society Fee:
LPIC (LawPRO) fees have been significantly reduced, whereas the Law Society tariff is increasing. I am concerned about further Law Society increases, given the fact that we will now be regulating paralegals. Lawyers should not be bearing the financial brunt of regulating paralegals.

Legal Aid:
Although no longer within our mandate, funding of Legal Aid is woefully inadequate and results in harm to the public and also discourages our members from taking these cases.

Demographics of the Profession:
The age profile of sole practitioners is markedly different from that of small or large firm lawyers. In sole practices there is under-weighting in the under 36 demographic and over-weighting in the over 55 category. In non-urban areas, the number of lawyers has remained roughly stable over the past ten years, but this population is aging. 40% of non-urban lawyers are over age 55 (approximately twice that found in Toronto). Over half of our current new calls are women, yet only 27% of those women are in private practice. Something has to be done to address this situation.

Equity Issues:
Some progress has been made with respect to this issue but the Law Society needs to do more.

I will continue to work toward making further changes at the Law Society and to put forward your views.

I ask for your support.

Afterword celebates 10th anniversary

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Dave Gordon, the publisher of Afterword, "Canada's national paper for the young Jewish scene," is celebrating the 10th anniversary of the quarterly publication, which he describes as a "kind of post-modern bar-mitzvah lesson."

Since Gordon, 34, launched the paper in 1998, his mission has been to report on issues of interest to Jewish students and young professionals of all backgrounds and religious affiliations.

Dave Gordon

"It's things that they want to know and things that they should know. Our coverage on Israel, they might not have seen in campus newspapers and in many instances, they probably don't always go online to check out the local Israel news," Gordon said.

"It's presented to them in a way that other students speak to them."

In an attempt to reach out to the 18- to-30 demographic, Gordon said that over the years, Afterword has featured interviews with celebrities such as Larry King, Natalie Portman and Matisyahu.

He said they cover issues that would be of interest to image-conscious, smart and mature students who don't necessarily want to only read about campus life.

Gordon said that based on his interactions with university students for the past 10 years, he's learned that many Jewish students are involved in socially conscious activities, with Israel advocacy being a main issue.

"I know for a fact that the hundreds of students I've been in touch with over the past decade have found [Afterword to be] a means to inform themselves, a means to grow, a means to reach out to the Jewish community, and to see things that they may have not ordinarily seen," he said.

"Israel has become an important component. Whether you agree with what Israel is doing, whether you are on the right or the left, we try to ride a centre course… In general, we try to offset the bombardment of unwanted Israel criticism in a way that they might not have had access to, presented in their language, presented in a way that might give them what they are lacking."

On the other hand, Gordon recognizes the importance of making the publication edgy and cool enough to get Jewish students to pick up the free paper that can be found at Hillel houses across the country, at shuls, kosher and Jewish-style restaurants, and Jewish shops in major metropolitan centres such as Montreal, Toronto, Calgary, and Vancouver.

"In these days of [magazines such as] Heeb and Guilt and Pleasure, and [blogs like] Jewsweek, and those kinds of things, I've gotten feedback that we should try to keep up and be a little more edgy and hip," Gordon said.

For instance, he recalled getting an interview with Harvard law professor and Israel advocate Alan Dershowitz a couple years ago. He wanted to put a picture of Dershowitz on the cover, but his student editors vetoed the decision.

"They said, 'Who's this old guy on the cover?'"

Some past covers from Afterword

Instead, they opted to change the feature story to one about a young, pretty girl, and ran her picture on the cover to appeal more to the younger demographic.

"If that gets them to pick it up and then they read about Israel and Jewish stuff and they get connected and they identify more, at least culturally, if not Jewishly, then that's a job well done," he said, adding that the feature about the girl was a great story and the Dershowitz piece ran in the same issue.

"In that respect, I defer to my editors who are younger than me, who have their ears to the ground and they know their stuff."

Over the past decade, Gordon said that Afterword, which also has an online paper that can be found at www.afterword.ca, has evolved into a better paper.

"It benefits from mistakes, from more people having seen it, and it benefits from the different perspectives that every team of editors bring to it. We learned what layout works, what layout is most appealing, we've learned about what kinds of things people want to see and what is more attractive to the eye."

In celebration of the 10-year milestone, Gordon said he plans to organize an event in June that will feature a keynote speaker and bring young, up-and-coming local bands together in an attempt to market the 10th anniversary as well as celebrate the 40th anniversary of the unification of Jerusalem.

Syria pledges to mediate on soldiers's fate: report

By YOAV STERN
AND AMIRAM BARKAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Syrian officials promised visiting U.S. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi to assist in the mediation efforts between Israel, Hamas, and Hezbollah over the fate of captured Israel Defence Forces troops, the London-based Arabic-language newspaper Al-Hayat reported last week.

According to the newspaper, the officials promised to "exert the maximum effort" in order to help the sides reach a prisoner exchange agreement.

It was also agreed that U.S Congressman Nick Lahall, a West Virginia Democrat who is of Lebanese descent, would act as a mediator on the issue.

Meanwhile, the Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's office last week strongly denied that Israel relayed a message to Syria via Pelosi, accepting its calls to renew peace negotiations.

The office responded to questions raised April 3 by a statement Pelosi made following her meeting with Syrian President Bashar Assad. Pelosi said she had relayed a message from Olmert to the effect that Israel is ready for peace talks with Syria.

The prime minister's office was quick to issue a denial, stating that "what was discussed with the house speaker did not include any change in Israel's policy, as it has been presented to international parties involved in the matter."

In a special statement of clarification, the bureau stressed that Olmert had told Pelosi that Israel continued to regard Syria as "part of the axis of evil and a party encouraging terrorism in the entire Middle East."

According to sources in the prime minister's office, "Pelosi took part of the things that were said in the meeting and used what suited her."

The same sources explained that the decision to issue a statement of denial stemmed from questions from Israeli and foreign press regarding a change in Israel's official stance on negotiations with Syria.

The California Democrat, who headed a bipartisan delegation on a tour of the region, including Syria, came under strong criticism from U.S. President George W. Bush. Bush considers any high-level contacts with Syria as undermining the pressure on Damascus to cease support for terrorism and as undermining Lebanese sovereignty.

Pelosi's visit to Syria was the latest challenge to the White House by congressional Democrats, who are taking a more assertive role in influencing policy in the Middle East and the Iraq war.

The prime minister's office said: "We have not intervened in the internal debate in the United States and we did not harm anyone. We simply announced what had taken place in the [Olmert-Pelosi] meeting on the basis of notes that are identical to those Pelosi has."

Pelosi met with Assad on April 3 and said the Syrian leader is willing to resume peace talks with Israel.

"We were very pleased with the assurances we received from the president that he was ready to resume the peace process. He's ready to engage in negotiations for peace with Israel," Pelosi said.

Pelosi also said that she and other members of her congressional delegation raised with Assad their concern about militants crossing from Syria into Iraq, as well as the Israeli soldiers kidnapped by Hezbollah and Hamas.

The speaker said the delegation conveyed to Assad the importance of Syria's role with Hamas in promoting peace between the Palestinians and the Israelis.

She did not reveal how Assad responded to the delegation's message on Hamas and Hezbollah.

Meanwhile, Syrian sources on April 3 expressed their uncertainty that Olmert's statements were credible.

Syrian Information Minister Muhsen Bilal told reporters in Damascus on April 3 that Israel needs to prove its seriousness in pursuing peace.

"If Israel is really interested in renewing negotiations for peace, it must declare this in a clear manner," Bilal said.

Greetings from Israel

To Jewish community leaders

Dear Friend,

This year, Holocaust Martyrs and Heroes Remembrance Day will be dedicated to witnesses and testimonies, "so that the generations to come might know." (Psalms 78, 6)

The records and the testimonies have been collected from letters, diaries and drawings, and from scraps of paper hidden away during the Shoah that recorded the terrible pain and suffering. The survivors, the She'erit Hapleta, felt a compelling need to describe in prose and poetry what they had experienced during those terrible years in Europe, from a personal standpoint. These testimonies and documents provide an invaluable insight into those terrible years during which the Jewish People lost one-third of its number.

There are two principal lessons to be learned from the history of the Holocaust. The first is the vital need for a strong Jewish state. As the founders of the State of Israel noted in the Declaration of Independence, the Holocaust clearly proved the need to re-establish the Jewish People in an independent state in their homeland. Indeed, the State of Israel, which was established only 18 months after the end of the Holocaust, is the best guarantee that the Holocaust will never be repeated.

In the new State of Israel we raised up, together with the survivors, the fallen Sukkat David (the Tabernacle of David) as prophesied by Amos, and established a democratic Jewish state committed to human dignity and liberty. This is the second lesson to be learned from the Holocaust. We must provide everyone, whatever their race, religion or sex, the protection of the state and fundamental human rights, and must seek the total elimination of racism or anti-Semitism, in whatever form, throughout the world. All these principles are an integral part of the basic ideology of the State of Israel.

When we look back over what the Jewish state has achieved in its 59 years of existence, our hearts fill with pride. When we review the path we have travelled, a path that has been paved with wars and existential struggles ever since the Holocaust, we can draw strength and encouragement and perhaps even a tiny drop of comfort.

On Yom Hashoah, we shall remember, both in the State of Israel and in Jewish communities throughout the world, that "Unto every person there is a name." We shall remember that many of the victims died leaving no relative or friend to recall their memory.

It is our national and our personal duty to remember every single martyr.

Yehi zichram baruch – May their memory be for a blessing and may their memory continue for all eternity.

Dalia Itzik
Acting President of the State of Israel and Speaker of the Knesset

Latin congress shows solidarity with Venezuela's Jews

By HAL WEITZMAN
JTA

CARACAS — Venezuela's Jewish community faces the most difficult situation of any in the world other than Iran's, says the secretary general of the World Jewish Congress.

"Outside the Arab world, this is the most troubled place in the world for Jews," Stephen Herbits told JTA while visiting Caracas for a meeting of the Latin American Jewish Congress at the end of March. "I'd say it's just behind Iran in terms of how bad it is. The situation is not yet desperate here, but they certainly have to be very alert."

Herbits is one of some 70 Jewish leaders who attended the meeting, which was timed to coincide with the 40th anniversary of CAIV, the umbrella organization of the Venezuelan Jewish community.

Claudio Epelman, assistant director of the Latin American Jewish Congress, said the issue of Iran dominated a closed-door session during the meeting.

Biggest issue remains Iran

"Iran is the biggest issue for Latin American Jewry," he told JTA.

Hugo Chavez, the left-wing Venezuelan president, has moved increasingly closer to Tehran in the past year, and recently signed some $17 billion worth of bilateral trade and economic co-operation agreements, many in the oil sector.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad denies the Holocaust, has repeatedly called for Israel to be wiped off the map and is believed to be developing nuclear weapons. One of his closest allies is Chavez, who has also delivered vehement criticism of Israel in recent months and has made statements that some commentators interpreted as anti-Semitic.

"On the one hand, you have Iran strengthening its economic and political ties with countries in the region – primarily Venezuela, but also Ecuador and Nicaragua," Epelman said. "On the other hand, Argentina is still pursuing Iranian officials as part of its investigation into the AMIA bombing."

He was referring to the 1994 bombing of the main Jewish community centre in Argentina, which killed 85 people and injured some 300. Iran is widely believed to be behind the attack.

Many of the communal leaders who came to the meeting – from the United States, Canada, France, Spain, Israel and countries across Latin America – said an important reason for attending was to show solidarity with the Venezuelan Jewish community.

"We're here to show Venezuela and the rest of the world that Jewish ties remain stronger than ever," Epelman said.

Cartoonist overcomes fears about modern Germany

By TOBY AXELROD
JTA

BERLIN — In a panel of Jordan Gorfinkel's Everything's Relative comic strip, Holocaust survivor Zayds explains why he won't visit Germany.

"I'm trying not to remember vhut everyvun else must not forget," says Zayds, who appears larger than life on the walls of Munich's new Jewish Museum.

The cartoon Zayds eventually goes to Germany. But the person he's based on – Gorfinkel's father-in-law, Nathan Burzinski – can't do it.

"It's not the ribbon tied into the neat bow that, being a writer, I wanted," Gorfinkel said before leaving Cleveland to attend the museum's March 22 gala opening. "But it's revealing and truthful. In fiction, it's easy to take a Holocaust survivor back to Germany. I just draw it that way. Reality isn't so cushy."

UN CHIEF VISITS YAD VASHEM: The new United Nations Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial and Museum last month. He took a tour, accompanied by the director general of Yad Vashem, Avner Shalev. At the conclusion of the visit, he placed a memorial wreath in the Hall of Remembrance.

Gorfinkel knows how to roll with the punches, and to deliver punch lines: he's been doing it for more than 10 years. But recently he accepted a challenge that took him to the far reaches of his skills: to prepare 40 panels recounting the last 100 years of Jewish life in Munich.

The cartoons are silk-screened on the walls of the museum and can be read from 50 feet away, says Gorfinkel, who is more accustomed to seeing his work postage stamp-sized.

It was "a huge responsibility," Gorfinkel told JTA in a telephone interview. "I am trying my best to be constructive, positive and good for the Jews."

The new city museum, which officially opened March 23, is part of Munich's new Jewish community centre, with a synagogue, schools and café. The project is the brainchild of local Jewish leader Charlotte Knobloch, who is president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany.

Museum director Bernard Purin wants visitors to learn about local Jewish life, history and religion. He thought comic art would be a good form to deal with contemporary issues and approached Gorfinkel in 2005.

"Surely you mean Art Spiegelman," author of the Pulitzer Prize-winning Maus cartoon trilogy, Gorfinkel says he told Purin. "'I'll get you his number.' He said, 'No no, we want you.'"

Gorfinkel's wife, Amy, urged him to take advantage of "this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity… and she made me update my will."

He approached the challenge boldly.

"We Jewish people have always dealt with difficult subjects through humour. It is not always 'ha ha' humour. There is also irony, satire and vaudeville," he says.

Gorfinkel drew on his own convictions, "presuming that they would mirror those of other contemporary Jewish people like me."

Gorfinkel was born in Chicago in the 1960s. His parents split up, and he "moved something like a dozen times before the age of 18. My best friend was the comic book."

His talent developed surreptitiously.

"Instead of paying attention in class, one doodles," he says. His early inspirations were Charles Schulz of Peanuts fame, Gary Trudeau of Doonesbury and Will Eisner, a pioneer of the graphic novel.

Gorfinkel became a DC Comics editor in the 1990s. In 1996, Everything's Relative was launched in the New York Jewish Week and now runs in some 30 papers. Gorfinkel also is a musician and record producer.

His strip features "a cast of five twentysomethings who struggle with faith and tradition." They live in a building owned by two Holocaust survivors, "adoptive grandparents" whom they affectionately call Bubs and Zayds.

"They serve as the voice of reason and wisdom and chicken soup," Gorfinkel says.

The only superheroes here are "Sarah, Abraham, Moses, Deborah and Golda Meir," Gorfinkel says. And the arch villains? "Ignorance, intolerance and Passover ketchup, spelled c-a-t-s-u-p. Those are my top three."

Before sending his characters to Munich, Gorfinkel visited twice. He also consulted with the Simon Wiesenthal Center, Elie Wiesel and the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum.

At first, Gorfinkel "expected to hear goose-stepping coming around the corner every moment. And the second most prominent question on my mind – after looking at older Germans and asking, what were you doing during the war? – was looking at Jewish people and asking, what are you doing in Germany?"

To his surprise, he found Jews were choosing Germany over other European countries. Munich's Jewish population – 11,000 before the war and 2,800 afterward — is up to 9,200 today thanks to the influx of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

People in Munich "are multilingual and multicultural," Gorfinkel says. It's "quite a lovely city that I really rather like. And whenever I say that to people, they look at me absolutely aghast."

His new panels will be serialized in papers that already run the strip. He hopes others will pick it up.

True to form, Gorfinkel lets irony and sarcasm rip on the walls of the new museum. Zayds speaks for all those who, like Nathan Burzinski, cannot go to Germany for whatever reason. Zayds' ambivalence is palpable.

Against the looming backdrop of the Rathaus, or city hall, tour guide Josef Rabinovich, a Jew, asks, "What do you think of our city?"

"Very clean," Bernie the Idealist answers.

"You mean cleansed," Zayds the Traditionalist says. "Vhen do ve eat?"

Falash Mora aid compound reopens

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

JERUSALEM — Underscoring the vulnerability of the 7,000 or so Falash Mora waiting in Ethiopia to make aliyah, the main Jewish aid compound in the country was shut down for nearly two weeks after locals persuaded Ethiopian authorities that the compound was a public nuisance and operating illegally.

But after being closed for two weeks, the facility in Gondar – which provides schooling, Jewish education, some food aid and some employment assistance to the Falash Mora who live in adjacent neighbourhoods – was reopened March 30 following pressure on the Ethiopian government by American Jewish federation leaders.

In a letter sent to Ethiopia's ambassador to the United States, eight Jewish federation leaders wrote that local complainants constituted an illegally elected community leadership and that they essentially were troublemakers intent on disrupting the orderly aliyah process.

> Jewish groups pressured Ethiopian government to end closure

"The illegally elected new leadership is headed by individuals not eligible for emigration to Israel," the federation executives, led by Stephen Hoffman, president of the Jewish Community Federation of Cleveland, wrote. "If this illegally elected leadership remains, the compound's programs will not receive our funding, as we cannot trust our funds to people whose integrity and ability to handle money honestly is in grave doubt."

The multi-site Gondar aid compound is funded by the North American Conference on Ethiopian Jewry, or NACOEJ, but has been run by intermediaries since the New York-based group was barred from operating in Ethiopia following legal troubles two-and-a-half years ago.

Those legal problems and a dispute with the local community forced the closure of NACOEJ's other Ethiopian aid compound, in Addis Ababa, in late 2004. That compound remains closed.

NACOEJ does not sponsor any aid facilities in Ethiopia other than the multi-site Gondar compound.

The closure appears to have been prompted by a fight among locals interested in control over the substantial aid money being spent there – an estimated $1 million (US) per year in a desperately impoverished country where most people make about $1 per day – and greater say over who is and who is not eligible for aliyah.

This comes despite the fact that community leaders have no say in determining who is eligible to immigrate to Israel and that American Jewish groups have pledged not to fund any renegade communal leadership.

"It is my understanding that there are competing factions within the Ethiopian community itself who have called into question the leadership of the compounds," said Doron Krakow, the United Jewish Communities' senior vice-president for Israel and overseas affairs, who happened to be in Gondar on March 19, the day the compound was shuttered. "Those who are interested in impugning the local leadership of the compound are looking for any way possible to knock these guys out."

Until the compound was reopened, officials from Jewish groups in Ethiopia – including the Jewish Agency for Israel, which manages immigration to Israel; the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which provides the Falash Mora with medical care; and the UJC federation umbrella group, which sponsors aid operations for the Falash Mora – said they were monitoring the situation closely to respond quickly to any developing humanitarian needs.

This was not the first crisis for the Gondar facility. Last May, the compound's local director, Getu Zemene, was arrested after an internecine dispute over control of the compound, and the facility was shut down for a few days. Zemene was soon released and the compound was reopened.

Several weeks ago, however, Ethiopian authorities issued a formal order to close the Gondar compound, leaving 7,000 Falash Mora without aid services.

The Falash Mora are Ethiopians of Jewish ancestry whose progenitors converted to Christianity several generations ago to escape economic and social pressures. They and their families now are turning to Judaism in a bid to come to Israel, and they have been emigrating at a rate of 300 per month.

Since the 1990s, the prospect of immigration to Israel has prompted tens of thousands of Ethiopian farmers and craftsmen to leave their rural villages and relocate to Gondar, where Israel's Interior Ministry verifies their eligibility for aliyah.

Many of them have found the move to the city difficult and have availed themselves of local Jewish aid services. NACOEJ heralds these operations as a bulwark against penury and starvation.

Others, however, argue that the aid has fostered the development of a welfare-dependent population, encouraging the impoverishing move to the city and hindering the Falash Mora from developing independent sources of food and income in Gondar.

While the Israeli government estimates that some 7,000 Falash Mora remain in Ethiopia, some advocates of Ethiopian aliyah contend that the number is more than twice that.

In the past, locals have tried to wrest control of the Gondar compound through allegations of corruption, intimidation and violence, and armed guards had been stationed at some of the facilities' entrances.

Similar problems, along with a dispute between local employees and NACOEJ's directorship, led to the closure of NACOEJ's Addis Ababa aid compound.

Katsav accused of second rape

Evidence of a second rape reportedly came to light against Israeli President Moshe Katsav. Attorney General Menahem Mazuz added another charge April 1 to Katsav's indictment draft after a police investigation of the president, who has been suspended. The new charges allege Katsav raped an employee in the Tourism Ministry nine years ago when he held a ministerial position there. The alleged victim was hospitalized and had to undergo surgical procedures, Army Radio reported. The woman, who until now had revealed the incident only to two close friends, decided to show her medical documents to police investigators. Katsav's lawyer said it was inconceivable a rape victim would return to work in the same office with the person who raped her.

Shekel soars against U.S. dollar

The U.S. dollar hit a six-year low against the Israeli shekel, fetching 4.155 shekels for every dollar. The rate remained fixed until the end of Passover. Israeli traders were expecting a further boost for the shekel, given the dollar's overall weakness abroad and large-scale foreign investment in Israel. The shekel is also strong against the euro and British pound sterling.

Iran rearming Hezbollah, Israel says

Israel provided the United Nations with satellite photos that it says prove Iran's involvement in rearming Hezbollah. Citing an April 2 report in the Arab newspaper Dar Al Hayat, Israel Radio said the weapons are taken from Iran to Syria, where they are stored in a large warehouse. A Hezbollah-affiliated minister of the Lebanese parliament then supervises the loading of weapons and equipment on trucks that travel to Lebanon via the Syria-Lebanon border. As part of the resolution ending last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah, the UN demanded that Hezbollah disband and prohibited the organization from rearming.

Israelis believe in God

While half of Israeli Jews are secular, the majority believe in God, a new survey says. According to the poll of 1,000 respondents published April 3 in Yediot Achronot newspaper, 50 per cent of Israeli Jews are secular and 20 per cent are religious, while the rest profess a "traditional" approach to their heritage. But 85 per cent say they believe in God or a "higher power," while 12 per cent say they are atheists. The rest are undecided. Seventy per cent of Israeli Jews shun leavened bread during Passover, the survey found. Sixty-one per cent say Kiddush on Friday nights, and an equal number light Shabbat candles.

Olmert denies attack report

Ehud Olmert denied reports that Israel and the United States are planning a joint attack on Iran. After Tehran-based and other foreign media reported over the weekend that Jerusalem and Washington were talking about an imminent attack on Iranian nuclear sites, during which Israel also would strike against Syria and Hezbollah, the Israeli prime minister issued a denial, calling the reports "baseless rumours."

Soap star ventures into a singing career

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Although he'll probably always be associated with John Abbott, the character he played on the soap opera Young and the Restless for the past 25 years, Jerry Douglas is hoping to be recognized for another talent.

Douglas was in Toronto last week promoting his debut album, The Best is Yet to Come, which features classic tunes including Witchcraft, Fly me to the moon, and My Funny Valentine.

While Douglas, born Gerald Rubenstein to Jewish Eastern European immigrants in Massachusetts, has had a successful acting career, he said that singing was his first love.

Sipping tea in his suite at the Grand Hotel and Suites in Toronto, Douglas described his rocky climb to stardom and his devastating disappointment that led him into acting.

Douglas, 74, started out his life in the most conventional way.

After having graduated from Brandeis University – he was accepted on a football scholarship – with an economics degree, he decided to continue his education and go to law school.

"When I graduated, I didn't know what I wanted to do, like most kids," Douglas said.

He realized early on that being a lawyer wasn't in his future and dropped out in his first year.

His family at the time ran a successful foam and rubber business, and he began working there, but this didn't fulfil him either.

"It just hit me one day that I really wanted to sing," he said.

He said that while he felt he always had "the entrepreneurial spirit of Judaism," he didn't use it the way most of his peers did.

"The culture of Judaism and the entrepreneurial spirit of Judaism is one of the things I've always admired the most, because when you think about the Jewish race of people… when you think of what a small people we are, what we've accomplished is amazing," he said.

"That entrepreneurial spirit was in me all the time, and I didn't use it like most Jewish kids, who built big businesses and became multi-millionaires…but me, like an idiot, I said I wanted to sing."

In an attempt to figure out a way to get in the business, he found out who the local agents were at the time and called then up to ask for work.

He called John Sullivan and made up a sob story to get him to book him to sing at a few clubs.

"I said my mother was really sick, which wasn't true, and I said my father was gone, which wasn't true and I said I needed to work. I told him I had a great act. I only knew five songs. I never played a bar mitzvah, nevermind a [club]," he said with a laugh.

After months of performing in small clubs and improving on his act, his agent promised him that if he agreed to perform in two small mining towns north of Montreal, he'd get him a gig at the Bellview casino in Montreal, which was a big, popular club then.

"The towns were 250 miles north of Montreal, straight towards polar bears. There were two miners and polar bears," Douglas joked.

He said that soon after, he had a chance meeting with Frank Sinatra's secretary who he asked to come see his show in Montreal.

"I had probably the best night I ever had. I sounded vocally better than I ever sounded. Everything was great, the audience was great, I got an encore. I left thinking, 'I'm going to be the next Frank.'"

After the show, Douglas met with her to get some feedback.

"She said all these nice things… but she said, 'Jerry, you're an actor who sings and you should become an actor.' And I was devastated. It put a knife in me."

Nevertheless, about three months later, he went to an acting workshop in Boston and eventually studied acting with Uta Hagen, the late famous broadway actress in New York and the late actor Jeff Corey in Los Angeles.

Douglas eventually settled in California where he took acting classes at night, and sold insurance during the day to support his young family.

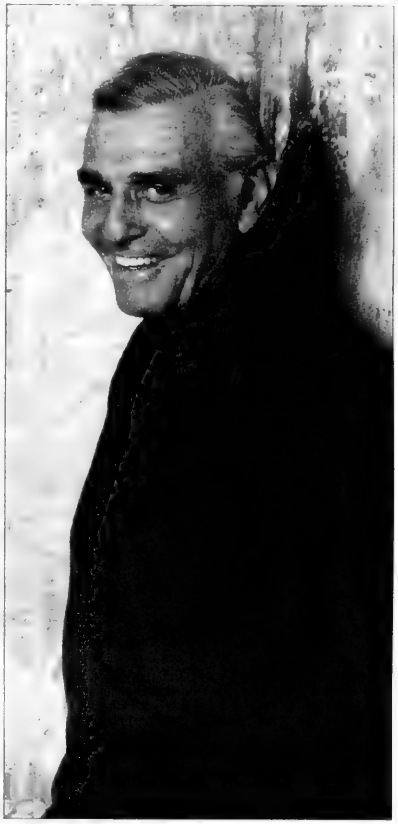
"I really started working well in my late 30s. I struggled as an actor for a long time… I started popping through on shows like The FBI and Mission: Impossible," he said, adding that after he divorced his first wife in the early 70s, the roles started to pour in.

But his big break came in 1982 when he was granted an audition for Young and the Restless, to play John Abbott, the wealthy chairman of Jabot Cosmetics and the moral fibre of the show.

Twenty-five years later, his stint on the successful soap opera came to an end – sort of – when he suffered a massive stroke and died.

However, he continues to make appearances on the show as John Abbott's ghost, and is on contract with the show for the next few months.

But Douglas said that while John Abbott has been a part of his life for a quarter century, it's hard to be upset about the end of a role that lasted as long as it did.



Jerry Douglas

Now, he simply has more time to focus on his true passion: singing.

With the help of his conductor Stevie Haverman and his composer and producer John Pratt, Douglas has come out with a collection of songs of which he is very proud.

"I was surprised because I had never been recorded on a professional level. I knew I had a good speaking voice, but singing is different. I love the flow of the album," Douglas said.

He spent a week in the Greater Toronto Area promoting his debut album. Aside from making television appearances on Global, Douglas made two appearances at two Wal-Marts and the Chapters-Indigo in downtown Toronto.

On Aug 30, Douglas will return to Toronto with his wife Kymberly Bankier, who is more than 20 years his senior.

While Douglas is set to perform at the Canadian National Exhibition, his wife will be promoting her book, The Black Book of Hollywood Beauty Secrets, and doing demonstrations to teach people about inexpensive alternatives to maintaining your looks.

The Last Days of Yasser Arafat coming to Hot Docs festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Sherine Salama, an Australian journalist of Palestinian descent, conducted the last known filmed interview with Yasser Arafat, the late president of the Palestinian Authority.

She spent almost a year trying to wangle that interview, and her tireless, frustrating quest is the subject of her lively 78-minute film, The Last Days of Yasser Arafat, which will be screened at the Hot Docs festival on April 24 at 7:15 p.m. and again on April 27 at 2:30 p.m.

Being convinced that his days on earth were numbered, Salama travelled to his compound in Ramallah in the hope of interviewing Arafat, whom she admired for his dedication to the Palestinian cause.

But after being kept waiting and forced to submit and resubmit a list of her questions to Arafat's advisers, she was not even granted the courtesy of an interview.

Still determined to interview Arafat, she returned to the West Bank 10 months later, and then waited patiently. Although a steady stream of visitors, including Israeli peace activists, trooped through Arafat's office during that period, she was not granted time with him.

Salama was subsequently invited to dine with Arafat, but was forbidden to film the encounter. Practically ready to give up at that point, she was finally assured that Arafat would see her, only to be fobbed off at the last moment.

In desperation, she sought out some of his associates. Among them was Bassam Abu Sharif, one of Arafat's closest friends. Thanks most probably to his intercession, she finally cornered Arafat in his office.

During the course of the brief interview, Arafat made the usual points: We are a steadfast people. We will win independence and our capital will be in Jerusalem. Palestine is our holy land. Fanatic groups rule Israel.

Several days later, Arafat fell ill, his lips trembling, his eyes vacant. Rumors then swept the West Bank that Arafat had collapsed and that his medical condition had sharply deteriorated.

Shortly afterward, Arafat was flown to Paris for further treatment, and that is where he died in November 2004.

The Last Days of Yasser Arafat comes close to being an insider's view of Arafat and his frazzled retinue, and that makes for interesting viewing, but ultimately, this documentary leaves the impression that persistence pays.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

Jerusalem's Bible Lands Museum is offering tours to major archeological sites.

'EDEN – EAST AND WEST' SHOWS EUROPEAN ARTISTS' VIEWS OF MIDDLE EAST AND LAND OF ISRAEL

One part of "Eden – East And West: Art In The 19th Century," an exhibition that opened recently at the Israel Museum, focuses on the Middle East and the Land of Israel in the 19th century as a focus of yearning, longing and curiosity. The exhibition consists of paintings, drawings, photographs, arts and crafts and ethnographic costumes, mostly drawn from the Museum's own collections.

European painters and photographers visited biblical sites and produced views of the East that were suffused with holiness, but also with yearning for the exotic and the fantastic, the colourful and the exciting, even the erotic. In other words, European artists visited the Orient and filled canvases with their own projected notions and fantasies.

A second part of the exhibition is "Out of North Africa: Photographs of Jewish Life from the Gerard Levy Collection." On display are some 300 ethnographic photos documenting Jewish life in North Africa between 1880 and 1910. Splendid clothing, head coverings and other accessories from Algeria, Morocco and Tunis supplement the photographs. Until June 18.

Ba'al tshuvah releases unadulterated pop album

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Coloured by the backdrop of rapid Latin percussion and passionate guitar riffs, the catchy refrain of We Will Survive is bound to launch Jordan Chaviv's music career into stardom.

The song is the first to be promoted from his inaugural album, Baal Teshuva, and also is the soundtrack for a video on his website JewishRnB.com, a montage of evocative photos of Israel.

The variety of themes, styles and moods Chaviv creates make this CD likely to do much more than keep people humming. Baal Teshuva is a wholly unique, unadulterated pop album, owing as much to Justin Timberlake-like influences as a ramped-up synth Shlomo Carlebach with a drumkit.

Also on the disc, the song When We Fall is an upbeat danceable track about keeping a positive attitude in the face of life's challenges: "Trust in HaShem and keep your head up/ Remember things aren't what they seem/ HaShem's got the keys to your dreams."

But make no mistake – the CD will resonate with Jews of all backgrounds, from secular to observant. While many of the songs are stuffed with religious phrases, he is deft at weaving words and music together so that the listener can appreciate the crafty hooks, word play and toe-tapping choruses.

Thus far, the CD is available in select stores in Montreal – Chaviv grew up in Montreal - and through his website.

Individual songs are available for purchase via www.jtunes.com, all in MP3 format.

Known professionally as Jordan Chaviv (his last name is Cohen), the 27-year-old is no stranger to the music scene. Over the course of a decade he has penned 200 tunes. His disc is a 13-track tour de force in which he takes the reins as composer, lyricist and producer, and it shows that he slaved over each detail.

Past concert performances of his have included gigs at the University of Connecticut, the New York Jewish Music and Heritage Festival, and opening for renowned Israeli singer Gad Elbaz at a show for the mayor of Miami at Miami's city hall.

In Quebec, his touring took him to the Metropolis in Montreal for the Sephardi festival La Quinzaine Sépharade. Gentile audiences have seen him perform with the multi-platinum-selling band Sky at Concordia Frosh Week and with famous French-Canadian singer Annie Major Matte, when they did an extensive tour of Quebec. It's only in the past three years that Chaviv's music has taken on a Jewish flavour.

His last performance of the tour was on Feb. 28 at Ohr Hachaim Synagogue in Montreal. El Hashoresh, a Jewish youth outreach organization in Montreal and France, organized the fundraising gala where he performed a short set.

Chaviv, who owes his own religious path to a Jewish outreach organization, pays homage to his spiritual journey – and others who have rediscovered Judaism – by titling his disc Baal Teshuva.

That journey began as a vacation to Israel but evolved into something more. Originally sponsored to go to Israel via Ohr Sameach Yeshiva in Jerusalem in summer 2004, he says his intent was simply to visit, learn some Jewish history and have a good time.

"Learning Torah was the furthest thing from my mind. But when I saw that the rabbis gave me the complete freedom to do anything I wanted, I became intrigued."

He became friends with another student there, also a ba'al tshuvah, and agreed to study Gemarah with him.

"He played a big part in my tshuvah, because I could really relate to him since we had similar traditional backgrounds," says Chaviv, adding that his learning partner went on to guide others, as the rabbi at Columbia University.

"If he is that passionate about Torah," Chaviv thought to himself at the time, "there must be more to it than meets the eye. After a couple of Gemarah sessions, I fell in love with it and everything else about the Torah."

He says he has been shomer Shabbat for almost three years and hasn't looked back. In the "thank yous" of his album, he acknowledges Ohr Sameach for saving his soul. Some of the tracks on the disc couldn't be named more aptly in tribute: Inside My Soul, Answer My Prayers, Shema Israel.

"In terms of the timing, it just kinda happened that way" he says of the disc's release last November. "It also happens that the door is slowly opening for acts like me thanks to Matisyahu – he has really paved the way, so that definitely does not hurt."

LESSONS FROM JACOB, A MOTHER'S ACCOUNT OF THE CHALLENGE OF RAISING A DISABLED CHILD

Ellen Schwartz, a Toronto school-teacher and mother of a severely handicapped boy who cannot speak, walk, see or eat, has written a book in which she recounts the challenges, fulfillment, lessons and love she has experienced in raising him with two other children.

Published by Key Porter Books, Lessons From Jacob: A Disabled Son Teaches His Mother About Courage, Hope, and the Joy of Living Each Day to the Fullest focuses on 10-year-old Jacob, who has Canavan disease, a fatal neurodegenerative disorder. Despite this, Jacob has thrived and grown from the love and encouragement of his family. He touches and inspires everyone who meets him.

A small, powerful and heartwarming book that is easily read in one sitting, Lessons From Jacob offers a glimpse into the Schwartz's family life and presents an intelligent and thoughtful account of parenting Jacob by a loving mother.

Part of the book's proceeds go to Jacob's Ladder, the Canadian Foundation for the Control of Neurodegenerative Disease, which the Schwartzes founded. www.jacobsladder.ca

Gershwin brought refinement to American music

George Gershwin: His Life and Work* by Howard Pollack, University of California Press

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

When I was a very young man and just starting my journey of musical appreciation, I heard a recording of Rhapsody in Blue, and fell hard for it. This brilliant classical piece for orchestra and piano was my introduction to the great American composer George Gershwin (1898-1937), whose untimely death brutally cut short a career in midstream.

Naturally, I sought out more of Gershwin's vinyl recordings, and was rarely disappointed. In the pantheon of American music, he was my man. I was captivated by his other orchestral works – such as An American in Paris – his folk opera, Porgy and Bess, and, of course, his unforgettable medley of songs, notably Fascinating Rhythm, Strike up the Band, Swanee and Summertime.

Howard Pollack

Gershwin, whose oeuvre ranged far and wide, was consistently so good that he can easily be compared to masters like Irving Berlin, Cole Porter and Jerome Kern, the three pillars of Broadway.

Although 70 years have elapsed since his death following surgery for a brain tumour, Gershwin is far from forgotten. Successive generations have grown to appreciate his musical genius, and I would not be going out on a limb if I said that his compositions and songs will endure.

Howard Pollack, a professor of music at the University of Houston and the author of a new biography on him, thinks so as well. His book, George Gershwin: His Life and Work (University of California Press), blends erudition with thoroughness, normally an irresistible combination. But because Pollack tends to be so professorial in analyzing his contributions, this volume might be a tad too academic and dry for the average reader. Nonetheless, it is well worth plowing through, even if you skim over some parts.

Born Jacob Gershovitz to Russian Jewish immigrants in Brooklyn, Gershwin was the second of four children sired by Moishe (Morris) and Rose Bruskin. The family was fairly prosperous, Morris having been a successful entrepreneur who had a succession of businesses. As a result, his parents could afford to buy a piano and give George and his brother, Ira – his future collaborator – lessons. Gershwin also studied harmony, orchestration, form and composition. As Pollack observes, he was anything but an untrained musician.

A high school droput, Gershwin became a song plugger, New York's youngest, in 1914 for the Tin Pan Alley music publisher Jerome H. Remick. During this period, he befriended fellow pluggers such as Milton Ager, who wrote Ain't She Sweet and Happy Days Are Here Again. As Pollack notes, Gershwin was an accomplished pianist whose talents were widely recognized. Much later, the conductor Serge Koussevitzky recalled, "The sweeping brilliance, virtuosity and rhythmic precision of his playing were incredible."

In 1916, Gershwin began recording and arranging piano rolls, and shortly afterward, he composed the novelty rag Rialto Ripples, his first hit. Swanee, which Al Jolson immortalized in blackface, brought fame and fortune.

After a stint as a rehearsal pianist, Gershwin was hired as a staff composer by the music publisher Max Dreyfus at $35 a week, and he essentially remained in Dreyfus' employ for the rest of his life.

As a Broadway composer, Gershwin cut his teeth on the Ziegfeld Follies of 1918, which starred Eddie Cantor, W. C. Fields and Will Rogers. By the mid-1920s, Gershwin was Broadway's "indispensably central composer," working in a charmed circle of composers like Harold Arlen, Hoagy Carmichael, Oscar Levant and Yip Harburg.

Gerswhin was a workaholic, but the going was tough. "I can think of no more nerve-racking, no more mentally arduous task than making music," Pollack quotes him as saying.

In Pollack's view, 1919 was a turning point in Gerswhin's career, the year he launched his first Broadway musical, La-La-Lucille, and his first revue, Morris Gest's Midnight Whirl, both of which were hits.

But in his judgment, Rhapsody in Blue (1924), arranged by Ferde Grofe and conducted by Paul Whiteman, established him as a serious composer. He wrote it, off and on, in three weeks. Gershwin himself described the creative process: "All at once I heard myself playing a theme that must have been haunting me inside, seeking outlet. No sooner had it oozed out of my fingers than I knew I had found it…"

Rhapsody in Blue, Pollack writes, evoked the sounds of New York – the hurdy-gurdies of the Lower East Side, the calliopes of Coney Island, the player pianos of Harlem, the chugging of trains leaving Grand Central Station and the noisy construction of Manhattan skyscrapers. The critics loved its power and beauty.

Gershwin's Concerto in F, though not as acclaimed, won plaudits, too. The musical comedy Strike up the Band was one of his biggest flops, but Funny Face was pronounced a "smash" by Variety.

After spending a week in France in 1926, he composed An American in Paris. "My purpose here is to portray the impressions of an American visitor in Paris as he strolls about the city, listens to the various street noises and absorbs the French atmosphere," he wrote.

On the eve of the stockmarket crash in 1929, he signed a contract to compose an opera based on The Dybbuk, written by the Yiddish playwright Szymon Ansky. But the project floundered when the backers discovered that the rights had already been granted to someone else.

Apart from The Dybbuk, Gershwin had little interest in explicitly Jewish themes or materials. "My people are Americans," he stated. Yet, as Pollack points out, Gershwin was steeped in his Jewishness. "I think that many of my themes are Jewish in feeling, although they are purely American in style," he said.

Pollack then quotes Robert Payne, a previous biographer, who commented, "Somewhere below the surface of all the music he ever wrote can be discerned a plaintive lament or a Jewish lullaby."

Pollack believes that Gershwin's greatest Broadway hit was Of Thee I Sing, which premiered at the nadir of the Depression, and was performed 441 times. Prior to this, following a two-week vacation in Havana, he composed the Cuban Overture, an orchestral piece inspired in particular by the music making of street musicians.

Gershwin had always wanted to write an opera for Afro-American singers. But not until he read DuBose Heyward's novel, Porgy, which unfolds in a black neighbourhood in Charleston, South Carolina, did he get around to realizing his ambition.

A beloved play, Porgy and Bess is regarded by some observers as the most important American opera of the 20th century. Certainly, its songs – I Got Plenty o 'Nuttin' and It Ain't Necessarily So, to cite but two – remain standards to this day.

In one of his last projects, Gershwin and his brother produced the score for the Hollywood movie A Damsel in Distress. Shooting began in late July 1937, a few weeks after his sudden death. He had been complaining of splitting headaches, during which he smelled the whiff of burning rubber. He fell into a coma, never again to regain consciousness. Surgeons who examined him found evdience of a brain tumour. Thousands gathered at a memorial concert in his honour in New York after his funeral.

Gershwin, Pollack concludes, "brought American popular theatre music to a remarkable level of refinement."

Gene identification may help in cancer treatment

A number of genes involved in the division of cancer cells have been identified and studied by researchers at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel.

The findings open up the possibility of developing personal genetic profiles, "which might be able to pinpoint the genetic defects responsible for each cancer and help doctors tailor a treatment fitted to each patient," a news release from the institute said.

The profile, the release goes on, might be able to predict the progression of the disease, identify the exact factors causing uncontrolled cell division in different cancers, and thus lead to the development of effective methods to prevent or even stop cancer growth.

Scientists from several Weizmann departments co-operated in the study, including Yosef Yarden, who specializes in biological regulation; Eytan Domany, physics of complex systems; Uri Alon, molecular cell biology; Eran Segal, computer science and applied mathematics; as well as Gideon Rechavi of the Sheba Medical Center in Tel Hashomer and researchers from the MD Anderson Cancer Center in Houston, Texas.

The findings appeared online in Nature Genetics.

The scientists mapped the network of genes activated in normal cells on receiving the order to divide. The signal comes from outside the cell, in the form of a chemical called a growth factor, which initiates a chain of events inside the cell.

The genes activated in this sequence produce proteins, some of which cause cell division, while others "put the brakes on that division."

The interdisciplinary collaboration produced what the release called "startling" results.

Following the receipt of the growth factor signal, cell activity takes place in a number of separate waves, in which genes are turned on and off for different periods of time. In the first wave, the activity of a few genes increases for 20 to 40 minutes. This causes the cell to divide. The next four waves, which range from 40 to 240 minutes, are comprised primarily of gene activity tied to halting cell division.

One of the characteristics of cancer cells, as opposed to normal cells, is that when they receive a signal to divide and then to stop, the division doesn't stop, and cancer can result from the uncontrolled cell division.

The study found that the behaviour of these genes is tied to certain types of cancer, as well as to the relative aggressiveness of the cancer.

Embryonic stem cell work permitted, Orthodox researcher says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The only question to leave Shulamit Levenberg speechless during a recent videoconference call from Haifa's Israel Institute of Technology, the Technion, was how one of the world's leading stem cell researchers manages to juggle her demanding career with raising five children under age 11.

Canadian Technion Society lay leaders, supporters and others interested in the topic who assembled for breakfast at the law firm of McMillan Binch Mendelsohn all chuckled as Levenberg sought an answer.

For most of the session, the 37-year-old was not at a loss for words. She spent almost an hour describing her work at the Technion's Department of Biomedical Engineering, where she is a senior lecturer.

Levenberg works in one of the most advanced – and controversial – areas of science: the use of embryonic stem cells to create, or "engineer," human tissue for potential use in a multitude of therapies.

The mere mention of "embryonic stem cells" is enough to instantly raise red flags among some individuals, especially those Christians who regard any human embryonic entity as a potential human being.

But Levenberg, who is Orthodox, was quick to point out that not only Judaism, but Islam and Buddhism, allow embryonic stem cells to be used for scientific and medical research.

"It is considered just a group of cells," she said during her PowerPoint presentation, "as long as they are used before implantation [in the uterus]."

Some of Levenberg's talk was too technical for the lay person, but enough was clear to leave her listeners in awe.

Levenberg, for example, works on creating actual three-dimensional samples of human tissue. She and her colleagues at the Technion most recently developed beating heart cells and are working on transplanting bio-engineered heart tissue in order to treat heart disease and damaged heart muscle.

As Levenberg explained it, one of the challenges to overcome – which she actually started working on while doing postdoctoral work at the Massachusetts Institute for Technology – was to turn generic embryonic stem cells into tissue-specific stem cells by using polymer "scaffolding." Once that was done, it became possible to develop the three-dimensional samples.

Levenberg recalled her excitement at gazing at beating heart tissue that only days earlier "had been in the incubator."

As is the case with organ transplants, Levenberg acknowledged in a question-and-answer session, there is the potential for tissue rejection, even with the use of miniscule amounts of bio-engineered tissue, but she added that stem cells are much less prone to be rejected because they are still immature.

That could be overcome, she offered, by setting up a "stem cell bank" to find the closest matches.

The potential is enormous, she said. The possibility of developing any cell type also means the possibility of developing any tissue type, right in the lab.

In answer to another question, Levenberg indicated that science is still light years away from developing an actual human organ starting from stem cells.

But nothing, she suggested, is beyond the realm of possibility.

Levenberg's talk was one of several periodic videoconferences between Montreal and the Technion being organized by the Canadian Technion Society in order to raise its profile, Quebec region director Mike Savatovsky said.

The events do not involve any fundraising but they do involve "friend-raising," he said.

Venezuelan Jews fear for future

By HAL WEITZMAN
JTA

CARACAS — The floor of the small synagogue in the centre of Coro, the oldest Jewish house of prayer in Venezuela, is covered in a thick layer of sand intended to recall the children of Israel's time in the Sinai Desert.

It is also, however, a symbol of the transience of Jewish settlement in South America.

Jewish settlers arrived in Coro, a small town in western Venezuela that was the county's first capital, from Curacao in 1827. In 1855, nearly the entire community left after a mob ransacked Jewish homes and shops.

Venezuelan Jews say that was the last time anti-Semitism flared up in the country. But in the past few years a community that had considered itself among the most well-established in South America has lost up to one-fifth of its members, prompted by an increasingly hostile environment under the government of President Hugo Chavez, a radical leftist who has been in power since 1999.

"People have left, but there hasn't been a massive exodus as some people have said," said Jacqueline Goldberg, editor of Nuevo Mundo Israelita, the community's weekly newspaper.

Goldberg was referring to rumours in Caracas that up to half of the city's Jews had moved out of Venezuela since Chavez took power. Accurate figures are hard to come by, but estimates suggest the community now numbers between 15,000 and 20,000. The vast majority are based in the capital, with small communities in the cities of Valencia and Maracaibo, and on the Caribbean island of Margarita.

A principal factor keeping them in Venezuela is quality of life. The community is mostly middle and upper class, and while it has suffered from living under a regime whose president routinely accuses the wealthy of undermining his "21st-century socialist revolution," the government's policy platform also allows business opportunities.

"When you have a president who's massively expanding public spending, there's a lot of money to be made," said a Jewish businessman who asked not to be named. "A lot of Jews are involved in construction, which is booming, what with the government building more schools, hospitals, housing and roads."

Another economic reason not to leave: The Chavez government introduced foreign exchange controls in 2003, making it difficult for Venezuelans to take their wealth out of the country.

Another attraction is the strength and cohesion of the community. Given its small size, the Jewish infrastructure in Caracas is impressive: There are five synagogues, and the community carries out its own kosher slaughter. The centrepiece is the Club Hebraica, a large complex in Los Chorros, an upmarket residential neighbourhood in the eastern part of the city.

The Hebraica comprises a well-equipped Jewish school and a sports and social club with a large swimming pool; tennis, basketball and squash courts; soccer pitches; and even a bowling alley.

Hebraica's tranquility feels a world away from the social and economic revolution gripping Venezuela, and symbolizes how the Caracas Jewish community has protected itself from some effects of that upheaval.

"If you're not involved in politics, you don't really feel the regime," said Rabbi Pynchas Brener, head of the Ashkenazi community.

Nevertheless, Venezuelan Jews feel a tangible discomfort.

"We've never had anti-Semitism here in Caracas, so this situation is something new," community member Moises Nessim said. "I would say there is worry and concern, but not yet fear – more uncertainty about what's going to happen."

Although Chavez – a former army officer and coup leader known for his fiery anti-American rhetoric – has never been much favoured by Venezuelan Jews, relations between his government and the community started to deteriorate in earnest in 2004.

In November of that year, the Club Hebraica was raided by police under a search warrant issued by a local pro-Chavez judge. The warrant, which came after the murder of public prosecutor Danilo Anderson, suggested that the Hebraica was being used to store weapons.

That accusation apparently sprung from rumours that Anderson had been killed with equipment from Israel's Mossad spy agency. After searching the school and the club, police left empty-handed.

Incredulous that authorities might think the Jewish community was storing weapons in its school, some observers concluded that the raid really was intended to intimidate the community.

"Chavez must have known about" the raid, one community member said.

"In this society, nothing happens without his permission," this member said. "There was a feeling that the government wanted to send a sign that no group was immune from its control."

The situation deteriorated further a month later, when Chavez said in a speech that "the descendants of those who killed Christ" and "the descendants of the same ones that kicked Bolivar out of here" had "taken possession of all the wealth in the world."

Though the Christ-killer comment clearly appeared anti-Semitic, some commentators said Chavez actually was referring to global capitalism. Indeed, when Jewish leaders soon afterward met with the president at Miraflores Palace, his official residence, he assured them that he had not been referring to the Jewish community.

That meeting in January 2006, brokered an uneasy peace, but the official reaction to Israel's war with Hezbollah in Lebanon last year unleashed what Freddy Pressner, head of CAIV, the Jewish community's umbrella organization, calls "an explosion of anti-Semitism in Venezuela."

Chavez repeatedly compared Israel's behaviour to that of the Nazis, a stance that locals say encouraged a wave of similar slanders. Sammy Eppel, a Jewish journalist in Caracas, catalogued a host of violently anti-Israel and anti-Semitic writing and cartoons in the local government and pro-government media.

In one article, which appeared last September in Diario de Caracas, a pro-government newspaper, journalist Tarek Muci Nasir wrote of the "Jewish race" that "the only resource they have left to stay united is to cause wars and genocide."

A cartoon that ran last year in Diario VEA, a state-owned newspaper, depicted Hitler saying, "How they've learned from me, these Israelis!"

One worrying trend is the extent to which these sentiments appear to be approved and encouraged by the government. The Ministry of Information last year organized a demonstration outside the main Sephardi synagogue in Caracas, an act that Pressner called "insensitive and imprudent."

After the demonstration, the wall outside the synagogue was daubed with "Jews, killers – leave" and "Zionist baby-killers." At other times, graffitti has appeared there with slogans such as "Jews go home" and "Here are the murderers of the Palestinians."

A more worrying development was the appearance of a Venezuela-based website claiming to be the local branch of Hezbollah. The site warned, "Hizbolla Latin America is analyzing placing explosives against a U.S. ally in Latin America. This would indicate the launch of Hizbolla Latin America."

Another concern is over Chavez's increasingly close economic and political ties to Iran. As the world has condemned Tehran's nuclear ambitions, Venezuela has emerged as one of Iran's few solid allies in the world.

At the same time, Chavez effectively cut all diplomatic ties with Israel last year by withdrawing his charge d'affaires. He had recalled his ambassador three years earlier.

Pressner said Chavez's comments could trigger more extreme activists to feel they "reacting with his blessing.

"We fear what he has sowed," he said. "We fear what could happen if there is another conflict. If there were a conflict with Iran, for example, we don't know what the consequences would be for our community."

Nevertheless, most Jews in Caracas do not feel that anti-Israel sentiment will provoke physical attacks.

"They're not burning synagogues or persecuting people on the streets, but there is officially sanctioned anti-Semitism," Eppel said. "The Venezuelan people aren't anti-Semitic. This is being directed by a few activists."

A more immediate concern is over the government's plans for education. Chavez's stated aim is to spread "21st century socialist values" via the school system, and to extend this through private schools as well. While it's not clear how this would work, many Jews find the proposal troubling.

"Their education plan is a big worry," said Guillermo Schmidmajer, whose daughter teaches Hebrew at the Jewish school. "Chavez is putting his brother in charge of education reform, and he might base it on the model in Cuba, where he was a student."

On a more positive note, the community can take heart not only from its own unity but from the solidarity and support it has received from across Latin America and the world. Last weekend, CAIV celebrated its 40th anniversary in a spirit of hopefulness and achievement.

To coincide with CAIV's anniversary, the Latin American Jewish Congress held a two-day meeting in Caracas attended by some 70 Jewish leaders from Latin America, the United States, Canada, Europe and Israel.

The highlight of the weekend was a commemoration at the Hebraica attended by some 1,200 people featuring Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner, first lady of Argentina and a senator there, as the keynote speaker.

In what seemed to be a swipe at Chavez, she told the meeting, "Each and every one of us who has the responsibility of being part of an elected institution in Latin America should not only raise our voices but act in a concrete way against any sign or glimpse of anti-Semitism."

The audience responded with spontaneous, wild applause. Fernandez is widely expected to launch a bid to succeed her husband, Nestor Kirchner, in Argentina's presidential elections in October.

At a time of great concern over the actions and attitudes of its own president, the Venezuelan Jewish community is happy to have such influential friends.

Bike 'Ride for Reform' aids charities in Israel and abroad

By MICHAEL LOFTUS
Special to The CJN

HAIFA — There are many ways to see Israel. Some people go on missions, others on bar mitzvah tours and many just go to visit family and friends. The newest addition to this list: charity biking tours.

Charity bike riding is relatively well known in North America but is just beginning to become popular in Israel. Israelis have taken to bike riding with a passion and one can see hundreds of riders on various routes on Friday morning (for the more religious) and Saturday morning (for those who don't want to deal with traffic).

Raising money through a bike ride is also catching on. One such ride is the "Ride for Reform," which is traditionally held in March and raises money for the Reform movement in Israel and abroad. The ride began four years ago with 15 bikers (one from Toronto) and has grown to 52 riders from five countries, including five from Toronto.

This year's mid-March event was called the "Three Seas Ride." The route began in Jerusalem, descended to the Dead Sea, made its way north to the Sea of Galilee, and then ended up in Haifa overlooking the Mediterranean. In total, the five-day route covered some 320 kilometres. It included stops in Qumran and the Horns of Hattin for organized excursions, plus plenty of impromptu touring along the way.

Also on the agenda were meetings with Reform congregants who described what it was like to keep a community going last summer while Katyusha rockets flew overhead, and a presentation by a representative from the Jewish National Fund about its work repairing the environmental damage caused during last summer's war in Lebanon.

One evening was given over to Mechina students – Israeli teenagers who defer their army service for a year in a program that provides leadership training. They get no army credit for the work and must still complete their full army service at the end of the program. The group who addressed the riders worked in an underprivileged neighbourhood in Jaffa.

But the main reason everyone was there was for the ride. The day began at 6:30 a.m., with many davening Shacharit before breakfast. Everyone then intoned a short rider's prayer and we were on the road by 8 a.m.

Riding was on a variety of on-road and off-road surfaces and, as it was at the end of the rainy season, there was some mud and the occasional river crossing. Throughout the ride, there was always a lead car in front, a small ambulance at the back, and a mechanic truck that accompanied the group. A mechanic rider was available to fix minor flat tires and more serious problems. In urban areas, riders enjoyed a police escort and, where necessary, army protection.

Riding in March meant that the weather was almost perfect – not nearly as hot as in the summer and not too windy or cold. Riding down to the Dead Sea and along the Be'ekah valley was a pleasure. Favourable winds even helped in the ascent from Tiberias (some 900 metres) and the even more challenging uphill portion to the top of the Carmel in Haifa. Riders averaged 60 to 100 kilometres per day.

Perhaps the most enjoyable aspect of the riding tour was meeting new and interesting people. There is something about shedding a suit and tie for spandex and sport socks that brings out the friendly side of a personality. Rabbis and student rabbis told jokes they wanted to test out before including them in their sermons. Cantorial students sang off key on purpose. People hailed from Israel, Canada, America, England, and Germany. Ages ranged from 17 to 60-somethings and everyone enjoyed themselves like little children seeing wonders and miracles for the first time.

By the end of the ride, everyone had seen and experienced Israel in a way they had never done before. Riding a bike gives just the right pace not only to see the country but also to feel it. Riding for charity meant that by the end of the week, every part of the body is engaged, from the eyes to the thighs, and, most importantly, the heart.

A star is born in Israeli soccer

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — A star was born recently as Ben Sahar scored two late goals to set alight the National Stadium and send Israel on the way to a 4-0 win over Estonia that kept alive its Euro 2008 qualification hopes.

The result left Israel even with Russia and England with 11 points each, while Croatia tops Group E with 13 points. Russia and Croatia have a game in hand.

Israel dominated the clash from the outset in what was perhaps the most one-sided encounter at Ramat Gan since a 7-0 rout of the same Estonia team eight years ago.

Bolton Wanderers' Idan Tal and Roberto Colautti of Maccabi Haifa, who both served a one-match suspension and missed an earlier 0-0 draw with England, celebrated their return to the starting lineup with the opening goals.

Tal scored the first after 20 minutes when he drilled a powerful low shot from the edge of the area right in front of goal, leaving outstretched Estonian goalkeeper Mart Poom with no chance as he dived to his left.

Colautti added the second goal when he rose high to head in at the far post from a cross from Beitar Jerusalem right-back Amit Ben Shushan.

Chelsea teenager Sahar, 17, who came on in the 64th minute as a substitute for Beitar's Toto Tamuz, made it 3-0 in the 77th minute when he pounced forward to tip the ball with his toe and lob the ball over Poom.

Three minutes later, he added another with a curling shot from the edge of the area.

"It was really important for me to make an early impact on the game and I'm glad that it ended with two goals for me," Sahar told reporters after the match. "I showed my ability just like I do for Chelsea, but I really hope that [Chelsea coach] Jose Mourinho was watching the game."

Beitar's Shimon Gershon, one of the veteran members of the team, spared no praise for Sahar.

"I had shivers when Sahar scored his first goal. "It's great that we have a young striker developing here who is already scoring goals at international level."

Israel coach Dror Kashtan noted the influence of Sahar and the other young players in his squad.

"We are in a process of integrating young players into the team," Kashtan said. "We have a very talented generation of youngsters and we need to nurture them so they can bring us even better results in the current campaign and in future campaigns. We put pressure on Estonia from the start and created a lot of opportunities. My only regret is that we turned down the pace in the second half."

Estonia coach Jelle Goes said the match had been his team's worst of the campaign.

"Just as our opening game in Tallinn was the best of our campaign, the match at Ramat Gan was our worst," Goes said. "Israel was without a doubt the better team and deserved to win. There is no shame in losing to Israel, but the result was exaggerated."

Captain Yossi Benayoun and defender Tal Ben Haim will miss Israel's next game against Macedonia after picking up their third yellow cards of the campaign.

Who will care for our growing seniors population?

By MICHAEL GORDON

"Will you still need me, will you still feed me, when I'm sixty-four?"

These lyrics, from that wonderful Beatles song When I'm Sixty-Four, were directed at some important friend, family, lover or child. Or maybe they were aimed at all of the people who become increasingly important as we age, even though nowadays, at least in the western world, 64 is far from old.

The Senior Side of Life

The possibility of losing the kind of support network that older people depend on, and knowing that we will still be acknowledged and cared for as we age, are vital concerns.

Even if we don't have loving family members to rely on, the assumption is that when things go wrong, we will still receive the care we need. Those of us who live in Canada – with its primarily publicly funded health-care system, despite its acknowledged flaws – expect that there will be caring health-care professionals to look after us in our old age.

But is that assumption valid?

Recently, CBC Radio's Sunday Edition highlighted a looming crisis in Canada that's due to shortages in the training of geriatric medicine specialists. The crisis may grow over the next decade as the number of older people in our society increases. The March 11 program focused on geriatric medicine specialists, but many of the issues it raised also apply to the training of family physicians who care for the elderly.

The program's critical point was that, for complex reasons, very few young medical trainees choose geriatrics as their specialty field – and the number is well short of the demographic imperative presented by Canada's rapidly growing seniors population. The implications are profound for the future of elder-directed health care.

The first specialty examinations in geriatrics were held in 1981. Some 25 years later, Canada has only about 200 certified geriatricians. According to a position paper by the Ontario Medical Association, there are .44 geriatricians for every 100,000 people in Canada, compared to 3.4 in the United States.

Compared to other western nations, we are severely short of the number of geriatricians needed to fill the necessary educational, administrative and medical consultative roles that are key to successful geriatric care programs.

Why is this the case?

Many factors are probably responsible. One reason that's often cited by geriatricians for their decision to work in the field has to do with having had an older person who helped care for them as a child.

In my case, it was my maternal bubbie, with whom my sister and I shared a bedroom in Brooklyn. She profoundly influenced me and helped nurture my historical and cultural awareness. I became conscious of her influence years later in Scotland, during my first medical school geriatric rotation. The experience was a positive one for me, so much so that when a job in geriatrics came up in Toronto, I took it. As a result, I ended up with a wonderfully satisfying career.

Many young physicians have no personal contact with older people during their formative years, and there is still inadequate exposure to eldercare during medical training. As well, the significantly lower potential income often acts as a disincentive for those who seriously consider the field.

Solutions are elusive. Good educational experiences, positive role models and financially competitive incomes might make a difference when it comes to career choices. Governments and medical schools must develop incentives to encourage young doctors to consider geriatrics, and those of us already in the field must endeavour to make it attractive to physicians during their training.

If we're not successful, the future for eldercare will be bleak.

4-5 cups vegetable (or chicken) broth

Preheat oven to 425°F. Cover a cookie sheet with parchment paper and spray with cooking spray. Place squash on parchment, add onions, garlic, apples; gently coat with oil. Season with salt and pepper. Roast until vegetables are tender (approx. 30 mins.) and lightly browned. When cooled, peel skin off squash.

Combine vegetables and ginger pieces with broth in large pot; puree in batches in food processor or in pot with hand immersion blender until smooth. If soup is too thick, thin with additional broth. Taste and adjust seasonings as desired.

Shoah education must be balanced

Epi on Education

At a recent UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event, French journalist-philosopher Bernard-Henri Levi told the audience that, as horrified and shocked as he was on a recent visit to the carnage in the Darfur region of Sudan, he refrained from calling it genocide. His restraint stems partly from his philosophical training in linguistic precision, but also from a tendency to preserve certain terms for the Holocaust.

Seymour Epstein

One could easily argue that Darfur is precisely a case of genocide, but what interests me is that all of us are reminded at this time of year (around Yom Hashoah) that Holocaust education is a complex issue that demands our careful and caring concern.

Of course, we want to ensure that upcoming generations never forget both the devastating loss and the lessons that we must learn from the Nazi genocide. But we also don't want the Shoah to become a major portal to Jewish identity, nor a sole means of identification. That would be falling prey to what Prof. Salo Baron termed "the lachrymose version of Jewish history."

Another important consideration is whether the Shoah is used to make Jews more particularistic and insular or more concerned with universal issues and world justice. Mainstream Judaism has always struck a healthy (but tense) balance between the two perspectives.

Look at the two paragraphs of the Aleinu prayer for a good illustration of that balance. The first speaks in the most chauvinistic terms of a people apart, with God as their king, while the second shows profound concern for the entire earth to be healed of its ills. Holistic Holocaust education strikes that balance, tense as it is.

Another issue to consider is the increase in Holocaust denial over the past few years and the fact our survivor witnesses are aging rapidly, soon to leave us. Our ancestors found a formula for perpetuating the memory of Egyptian slavery and the taste of freedom in the Pesach seder. We parents and educators must discover similar techniques to place the Shoah in its proper setting in our calendar, in our souls, and in the eyes of the world.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

On Yom Hashoah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

We lost more Holocaust survivors this year. Most of them went out quietly, their names mentioned in a newspaper obituary. Their passing was like ours, yet their time here was very different from ours if we did not directly experience the Holocaust.

URBAN WRITER

On Yom Hashoah, therefore, not only do we pause and focus on, consider and wonder at, question and mourn that horrific time in our history when six million of our family members were taken from us, we also eulogize the women and men living next door to us who have a number on their arm and memories that haunt them.

At the same time, we take these moments to honour those survivors who are still with us, who can join in the celebrations of their families and give to the community, Israel and the Jewish people.

To all of them, we must express our appreciation for showing us what it means to survive a place as brutal as Auschwitz, a time as wicked as the Holocaust.

How did you stand so firmly on the ground, fellow Jew? How did you go from being witness to the murder of your mother, your father, your child, and later travel the open seas to arrive at a new home – and then to muster up the bravery to have another family.

My God. What is it we can learn from our brothers and sisters we call survivors (perhaps more appropriately the heroic)?

Is it not the spirit of humankind that looks into the eye of evil, sees it clearly and later is somehow able to breastfeed a child, grow an orchid, love your neighbour?

Thank you, you who were taken from your home in Lodz, you who were pushed into cattle cars from Budapest and later arrived in Toronto to establish Landsmanshaften, mutual benefit societies for those from the same area; to build shuls and community centres; to help lead drives to ensure the safety of our homeland – Israel. Thank you for fighting for the Jewish people, even after you had been so brutally attacked.

How did you do it? I often wonder when I see you at your grandchild's bar or bat mitzvah, or in shul on the High Holy Days. How is it that you can pray to God, even believe in God, after what you have seen?

Tell us what lies at the core of your soul that allows you to cover your eyes while saying the Shema – "Hear oh Israel, the Lord is God, the Lord is one" – after having seen a place where God seemed to be absent, where no corner, no nook, harboured the Omnipotent spirit.

But you do, most of you, and for those who gave up your belief in God, some meaning still propelled you forward – enough so that you built a business, enough so that you were able to shovel your snow.

How? None of us know who were not there with you. Even your children – the second generation – are seeing the enigma in your fortitude.

We lost more survivors this year. But we are fortunate to still have a few as neighbours.

Let us remember all of them this Yom Hashoah, to ponder on those who passed through the gates of hell, suffered in unimaginable ways and then made flowers blossom where lava once flowed.

On Yom Hashoah, you kedoshim, holy souls, should know that we bear deep gratitude to you for showing us that the nishamah (the soul) and the body of sacred humankind are made up of some mysterious element, enough to help us survive the ambition of the wicked and depraved.

I wish I had written this 20 years ago.

Police lauded for firebombing arrests

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish community applauded Montreal police for the arrests last week of two men, Omar Bulphred, 24, and Azim Ibragimov, 22, reportedly Muslims, for the firebombing attacks on the YM-YWHA Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre in Snowdon on April 3 and on the chassidic Skver Toldos Yakov Yosef school in Outremont on Sept. 2.

Police described the arsons as motivated by hatred of Jewish people, and the men could therefore receive stiffer sentences if either is convicted. Police have not linked the two men to racist or terrorist groups, although the investigation continues.

Police also reportedly foiled the pair's planned kidnapping and confinement of an unidentified party and armed robbery.

Azim Ibragimov | Omar Bulphred

Another crime of which they are accused, that of setting a car on fire Sept. 12 in the east-end Mercier borough, provided an important lead in the police investigation.

Police found a letter at the scene of that crime that showed the author had a knowledge of the Molotov cocktail attack on the school. The handwriting was found to be that of the same person who left at the school another note, whose existence was not revealed at the time because police believed it would impede their investigation.

The specific content of the letters was not made public.

The car's owner was apparently not Jewish. Police also used wiretapping in their investigation.

Jewish hospitals' kashrut practices under review

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two publicly funded Jewish hospitals in Montreal had to make concessions last week in how they observe kashrut when their clientele and staff are mainly non-Jewish.

Response to complaints

After months of negotiation, the Jewish General Hospital Auxiliary agreed to pay $7,500 each to two Urgences Sante ambulance technicians who were expelled more than two years ago from the hospital when they refused to cease eating their non-kosher food in the Cafe de l'Atrium, a snack bar run by the Auxiliary.

The Quebec Human Rights Commission unanimously ruled in December that the JGH should pay $10,000 in damages each to Yvon Verreault and Ginette Gelesko, who were having lunch together in the Atrium in February 2005. The commission cited sections of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms prohibiting discrimination on the basis of religion and protecting access to public places and dignity.

It had not previously been made known that Gelesko had also complained to the commission and received the same favourable decision as Verreault.

Meanwhile, the Jewish Rehabilitation Hospital (JRH) announced that it would "review its dietary practices" following a highly publicized complaint during Passover by one of its doctors, and later a few other staff, patients and visitors. They objected not only to having to abide by the holiday observances, notably the ban on products containing flour, but also the year-round enforcement of kashrut, which includes restricting non-kosher consumption to a separate area and prohibiting non-kosher food in patients' rooms.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Claim Hearing Denied

OTTAWA — Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel has failed in his attempt to have the Supreme Court of Canada hear his claim that he was unlawfully detained for two years and then deported to Germany in 2005. As is usual in leave-to-appeal cases, the court gave no reasons for last week's ruling, Canadian Press reported. Zundel, who was seeking $10 million in damages, was convicted of Holocaust denial by a German court in February and sentenced to five years in jail. Zundel, 67, had been detained in Canada on a security certificate as a foreign national who was deemed a threat to national security. Lower courts upheld the certificate and rejected his claims for damages.

WORLD

Ginz Diaries Released

NEW YORK — The diary of a Czech boy killed in Auschwitz was released earlier this week. The Diary of Petr Ginz: 1941-1942, published by Atlantic Monthly Press, tells the story of the Nazi terror in Prague through the eyes of a 13-year-old boy. Ginz's sister, Chava Pressburger, 77, edited the diaries and wrote the book's introduction. Pressburger told the New York Times that the book is nearly journalistic in documenting the changes in the lives of Jews as they were gradually denied basic rights. Ginz became known after his drawings, made at the Terezin camp, were taken by Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon on the ill-fated Columbia space shuttle trip in 2003. A Prague man later contacted the Yad Vashem memorial in Israel and said he had discovered Ginz's diaries in his attic. Pressburger confirmed their authenticity.

Nazis Were On Drugs

JERUSALEM — Nazi officers regularly used drugs, a new Hebrew University study has found. The study says many of Adolf Hitler's top military brass were known to use narcotics, especially morphine. The study's author, Jonathan Levy of Hebrew U's Koebner Center for German History, said Nazi troops were sometimes sent out with Pervitin, a methamphetamine that stoked their battle lust.

Music Centre Opens

PRAGUE — The Terezin International Music Center is now open. The private institute is located in the Czech town of Terezin, site of a former Nazi concentration camp and ghetto, called Theresienstadt in German. The centre, which opened April 11, will offer concerts featuring the works of the many Jewish musicians murdered by the Nazis. It will also organize art exhibits and festivals urging tolerance among young people, and it will work closely with the state-funded Terezin Memorial. Some 155,000 European Jews were sent to Terezin. Most were sent to the Nazi death camp Auschwitz-Birkenau; others died of starvation or diseases.

Russian Teen Beaten

MOSCOW — Community leaders in a southern Russian city are pressing local authorities to protect a Jewish teen after an anti-Semitic attack. The 16-year-old was severely beaten by a neighbour in the village of Sulyaevsky. The unnamed youth was hospitalized with head injuries and a broken nose. Citing the possibility of further attacks, the youth and his family won't return to their village. Community activists in Volgograd have urged the regional prosecutor's office and the region's human rights ombudsman to expedite the investigation. The incident follows two anti-Semitic attacks last September in the region when vandals painted anti-Semitic slogans and severely hurt a guard at a school in Volgograd, and 30 gravestones in a Jewish cemetery were knocked over.

Canada-Palestine Friendship Group Founded

OTTAWA — A Canada-Palestine Friendship Association, comprising MPs from all parties in the House of Commons, is up and running, the group said earlier this month.

The group – which was formed in February by Bloc Québecois MP Réal Ménard, Liberal MP Omar Alghabra, NDP MP Libby Davies and Liberal Senator Lucie Pépin – held its first meeting in late March.

Ménard said it aims "to foster discussion between Palestinian and Canadian parliamentarians; to suggest initiatives to foster a better understanding of issues of interest to both countries; to ensure that Canada's foreign policy for the Middle East is in the best interests of the Palestinian people; to suggest measures contributing to fair and lasting peace in the Middle East; [and] to support all measures conducive to the establishment of a viable and sovereign Palestinian state."

The group has 37 members. Only two are from the ruling Conservatives, although one, Tory MP Ted Menzies, is on its executive. Groups with 50 or more members qualify for parliamentary funding, the newspaper Embassy reported.

A similar group was formed five years ago by MPs who had visited the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, but it had since disbanded. The new association was praised by Muslim and Arab groups, including the Canadian Islamic Congress, which has been highly critical of the current Tory and former Liberal governments' Mideast policies.

Former JF&CS head 'made countless lives better'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Gordon Wolfe, who died on April 7 at age 70 after a lengthy battle with cancer, will be remembered for his devotion to his family, his belief in the community, and his love of people.

Obituary

He retired in 2003 after spending 22 years as executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service.

An active volunteer, Wolfe was also a past president of Holy Blossom Temple and was involved with Mazon Canada, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Ashkenaz Festival, the Association of Jewish Family & Children's Agencies, and Legal Aid Ontario.

Born and raised in downtown Toronto, Wolfe received his master of social work degree at the University of Toronto and worked at Holy Blossom as director of youth activities – he celebrated his bar mitzvah there as well – as well as at JF&CS as supervisor of detached youth services and as executive director of Huntley Youth Services before he rejoined JF&CS in 1981.

He also spent a number of summers at camp, including Camp White Pine, and 10 years as co-owner of Camp Wabikon with his wife Linda, to whom he was married 47 years.

The Gordon Wolfe Children & Youth Fund, which in part is used to send needy kids to summer camp, was established with money raised from a tribute dinner held in honour of Wolfe's retirement.

This past fall, the JF&CS branch at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre was renamed the Gordon S. Wolfe branch.

In 1967, when he was JF&CS's supervisor of street youth services, Wolfe decided that in order to reach kids on the street, he would hire staff in their 20s who would work from a trailer on Yorkville Avenue, which was then "home" to hippies and a number of American draft dodgers.

In a eulogy given at the funeral service, Rabbi Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus of Holy Blossom, told the capacity crowd at the temple that Wolfe set up the trailer because as a social worker, "he knew the souls of the young, and he knew that behind their rebellion they needed guidance and leadership."

Gordon Wolfe

In Wolfe's paid and volunteer work, said Rabbi Marmur, he would frequently challenge people about the "scandal of poverty in our midst. He irritated many people who would have rather looked the other way, but he did what he could to diminish that scandal."

In a CJN column written in 2004, Wolfe said that "it is immoral that we live in a community in which there are haves and have nots. The rich are getting richer and the poor are getting poorer. We have created an entrenched underclass. In Jewish tradition, the widow, orphan and stranger must enjoy the same rights to food, clothing and shelter as the privileged class. It is the obligation of every Jew to perform acts of tzedakah, not out of a monetary whim or a sudden philanthropic impulse, but in fulfilment of a religious obligation."

Wolfe was an effective leader, Rabbi Marmur said, because he served others without putting himself in the centre. "He reached his goals by knowing what to do next. He was there for so many, and [even while he was ill] he

Championing the truth

From the editor's desk

Last month, on the eve of the Passover holiday, I dedicated two columns to the news that two internationally conducted marketing research polls revealed that Israel's reputation was very poor.

The unremitting propaganda campaign against the tiny Jewish state these past four decades, has, alas, substantially succeeded.

The opinion polls showed, however, that the negative views of the Jewish state were painted in very broad, all-encompassing brush strokes that included societal, industrial, economic and even tourism-related observations. They far exceeded any observations that might have reasonably been expected to arise from or be connected to the unresolved territorial conflict with the Palestinians alone.

The perception of Israel, it saddens one to write, is completely disconnected from the truth of Israel.

The only response to this situation, however, is for us to emphasize and re-emphasize the truth of the Jewish state. For the ultimate undoing of propaganda is through the championing of truth.

But to be able to champion truth we must first be informed of it.

There are countless sources for truthful information about Israel and the history of its struggle for existence and coexistence in the Middle East. The scholars, authors, writers, playwrights, filmmakers and documentarians who have written and worked in the field are many and widely known.

But, on the eve of Israel's 59th Yom Ha'atzmaut, in an age when the Internet and the blogosphere are increasingly the chief domains for purveying information, commentary and opinion, I wish to draw readers' attention to three reliable, electronic, non-governmental resources that purvey truthful information about the tiny Jewish state. They are excellent sources of information about Israel's unceasing, though to-date unsuccessful, efforts to achieve peace with its neighbours; the remarkable diversity of the people who live there; and the exciting, innovative, scientifically breathtaking society they have created.

The pre-eminent resource in Canada is the Canada-Israel Committee. Its website (www.cicweb.ca) is a rich trove of information covering a wide array of subjects. Of particular interest is the publication The Real Israel: What Canadians Would Like To Know.

As the website points out, the "pamphlet is designed to help answer some of the questions that Canadians frequently have about Israel and the conflict in the Middle East."

A second outstanding website is that of The Israel Project. It can be found at www.theisraelproject.org.

The website describes the Israel Project as "an international non-profit organization devoted to educating the press and the public about Israel while promoting security, freedom and peace. The Israel Project provides journalists, leaders and opinion-makers accurate information about Israel. The Israel Project is not related to any government or government agency."

The website contains information specially aimed at journalists and students. But one of its main strengths is the link titled Learn About Israel.

This link is an endlessly opening Russian doll, leading to links that offer indispensable information, maps and visual aids concerning Israel.

The third site is that of Eye 2 Israel. It is hosted on the ORT schools website, and I single this one out because it is aimed primarily at teenagers.

The home page describes the purpose of the site.

"NO to hatred and animosity; YES to peace, understanding and discussion" is the ethos of the Eye 2 Israel website, which Israeli teenagers from all over Israel are editing and writing in an attempt to share with the world their experiences of growing up in Israel.

"The students share their thoughts on everything from the Arab-Israeli conflict and coexistence to their favourite food and music.

"The Israeli students hope to show people the reality of their daily lives and aspirations as well as learn about the hopes and lifestyles of others."

In keeping with the site's target audience, one of the links on the site is called Fun Stuff. But one of its most eye-opening links deals with Israeli inventions and developments.

A sampling of the entries under this link includes: new Israeli scientific or medical developments on AIDS and diabetes; technology to detect bad driving; a science competition in memory of the Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon; a new flower called the Galanit that grows blue and ends its season white; an invention that provides early warning about earthquakes and so on.

What is most impressive about the entries, however, is the fact that they are written by ORT students.

The site is by students who are trying to reach out to other students.

Eye 2 Israel can be found at www.israel1.org. It is available in English, Russian, Arabic or Spanish.

The perception of Israel bears very little resemblance to the truth of Israel. We owe it to the people who live there – the only Jewish state on earth – to ourselves and to our children to become champions of that truth. The celebration of the state's 59th year of independence is a good occasion to enter the perception ring.

Canada gets an 'F' on Nazi file

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A change of government in Ottawa has made no appreciable difference in efforts to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, an Israel-based Nazi-hunter stated last week.

Efraim Zuroff, head of the Jerusalem office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, said Nazi collaborators continue to evade justice in Canada thanks to systemic problems and a lack of political will. As a result, Canada was given an "F" – a failing grade – in the Wiesenthal Center's seventh Annual Status Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals.

"Canada has not been able to deport eight Nazi collaborators who have been stripped of their citizenship," Zuroff said in a phone interview last week. "The entire process has broken down and it's an embarrassment."

The report, which covers the period from April 1, 2006, to March 31, 2007, found that the total number of Nazi criminals convicted worldwide rose to 19 from 16 in the year before. The United States, the only country given an "A," led the way and Italy, granted a "B," was next in Zuroff's estimation.

Noteworthy in the period studied was "the emergence of Italy as the second most successful country in the prosecution of Nazi war criminals. For the second year in a row, the Italians have succeeded in convicting at least 10 Nazi war criminals," a Wiesenthal Center news release stated.

The report cited "the abysmal failure of countries such as Austria, Germany, Poland, Lithuania and Canada... to achieve any progress whatsoever during the period under review."

Zuroff said Canada's new Conservative government "inherited a bad situation and to date has not done anything to change it."

He said the Canadian legal process for bringing World War II criminals to justice was flawed from the beginning. Suspects were given an inordinate number of avenues of appeal while the United States, which employs a similar process of citizenship removal and deportation, changed its laws early to reduce the number of possible appeals from seven to three.

Efraim Zuroff

In Canada, "the appeal process was not streamlined to prevent abuses by defendants."

In addition, there is less political will in Canada to address the issue. "My sense is that there's no one paying attention [in Ottawa]," he said.

Marina Wilson, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration Canada, said dealing with Nazi war crimes "is a long process with appeals and it is time consuming. We follow due process for appeals and people take advantage of that... At the end of the day, we want to be sure we follow due process."

Zuroff said Operation Last Chance, an effort by the Wiesenthal Center to offer financial rewards for information leading to removal of Nazi collaborators, has not provided any substantive leads in Canada.

In other jurisdictions, however, the results have been different. Operation Last Chance uncovered the presence of Milivoj Asner, a former Croatian police chief, in Austria, and of Karoly (Charles) Zentai, a onetime Hungarian officer, in Australia.

More recently, a former Hungarian Gendarmerie officer, who is alleged to have participated in the mass murder of more than 1,200 Jews in Novi Sad, was discovered living in Budapest – in a house across the street from a synagogue.

Sandor Kepiro was found inadvertently. Operation Last Chance had turned up a name of a Gendarmerie master sergeant, Istvan Bujdoso, in Scotland. To confirm his presence and his alleged wartime role aiding in the deportation of 14,000 civilians from the city of Miskolc to Auschwitz, the Wiesenthal Center asked a Scottish journalist to interview Bujdoso in his home. The journalist reported that Bujdoso possessed a treasured photograph of a superior officer, Kepiro, and was in regular contact with him.

The Wiesenthal Center learned that Kepiro had been convicted in 1944 by the Hungarian government – not for murdering innocent Jews but for violating the honour of the Gendarmerie by acting without authority.

The case was brought to the attention of Hungarian authorities, whose initial response was to announce that the conviction had been annulled when Nazi forces entered Hungary.

"Nazis are saving him again," a clearly exasperated Zuroff exclaimed.

Zuroff said the Hungarian government has agreed to take another look at the case. It opened an investigation last month.

Meanwhile, the case involving Zentai has become bogged down in technical legal wrangling over whether a court in West Australia has jurisdiction to order extradition. The Hungarian extradition request is 15 months old and counting.

Zuroff admits that the slow pace of developments can be frustrating.

"The results are not that great, but there are other influences that make it worthwhile," he said. "We publicize these issues, bring it to the public arena. It's helping societies face their complicity in Holocaust crime and educate them about the Holocaust."

Financier gives $10M to U of T nursing school

Lawrence Bloomberg

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Toronto financier Lawrence Bloomberg hopes that his $10-million gift to the University of Toronto's faculty of nursing – the largest-ever private gift to a Canadian nursing school – will help address this country's nursing shortage.

The money will go toward a 10-year plan to fund more scholarships, develop advanced clinical education, create an office of continuing nursing education, and recruit scholars to teach and do research at what has been renamed the Lawrence Bloomberg Faculty of Nursing, which becomes Canada's first nursing faculty to be named after someone.

Bloomberg, who is chair of Mount Sinai Hospital's board of directors and is a former member of Baycrest's board of directors, said the gift aims to address a prediction by the Canadian Nurses Association that there will be a national shortfall of 78,000 registered nurses by 2011 and 113,000 by 2016.

"There is a nursing shortage and I'm hoping that through this gift that I've brought to the university, that through scholarships and through changes to the curriculum that we will be able to educate more nurses," said Bloomberg, 65, who was born and educated in Montreal but now lives in Toronto as a director of the National Bank of Canada and an advisor to National Bank Financial Inc.

"If you focus on nurses, you focus on the quality of care, you focus on patient safety, you focus on patient access to health care. I think that is very important," he said.

"The nursing image is a bit undernourished. Nursing is the largest health profession in Canada, and probably in any country. Nurses don't get full recognition or support for their role that they play. I felt that this should change. Not only should it change, but the role of nurses in the future is going to get increasingly important."

Bloomberg added that the dean of U of T's nursing faculty, Sioban Nelson, is very progressive and entrepreneurial and has big plans for the department.

"We've talked about bringing internationally distinguished visiting professors to the school and have post-doctoral fellowships… She wants to create a centre for excellence and innovation in nursing education. She wants a bigger part of the program to be online so it can be brought to more people. We also want to create an office of continuing nursing education," he said.

Four million dollars of his gift will go to create 50 one-year scholarships, starting next fall. The 25 undergraduate scholarships and the 25 graduate scholarships will triple the faculty's award funding.

As well, funding for the new professorships and post-doctoral fellowships will allow the faculty to recruit experts who specialize in specific areas such as diabetes, pain management and oncology.

Bloomberg said that although he wasn't educated at U of T, he has made Toronto his home for more than 30 years and wanted to give back to the community.

"I wanted to do something in Toronto, and U of T has one of the most excellent, if not the best, nursing faculty in Canada. U of T was an obvious choice."

He said that he thinks the health care sector in Toronto will begin to feel the effects of the gift instantly.

"Most of the monies are not being put into an endowment. The monies are being put up to be spent now on bringing distinguished visiting professors, on changing the curriculum, so that is going to start happening immediately."

Yom Hazikaron v'Yom Ha'atzmaut

With sorrow pulling hard at our hearts we convey our condolences to the families and friends of the Canadian soldiers killed these past days and months in Afghanistan. The red maple leaf has draped the coffins of some 53 Canadian Armed Forces' soldiers and one diplomat. We have watched, cried and empathized as families received their loved ones not to embrace them but to bury them.

Well and deeply do we understand the families' – and our – loss.

All supporters of Israel do.

Well and deeply do we understand the commitment to duty and to the cause of freedom that placed the soldiers in harm's way.

All supporters of Israel do.

Well and deeply do we understand the heart's call to defend human life, even unto the ultimate sacrifice.

Last summer, the entire family of Israel grieved and then raged as 119 Israeli soldiers' bodies were laid to rest in the shrouded blue-and-white drape of their coffins. Since the founding of the Jewish state, 59 years ago next week on the 5th of Iyar (April 24 this year), families and friends have mourned more than 22,000 soldiers' lives.

From the very moment of its birth and to this very day Israel has had to defend its right to exist as a sovereign Jewish state among all other sovereign states on earth.

That the people of Israel have built a modern, free, democratic, caring society, conferring innovative and far-reaching scientific and medical advancements for the betterment of all humanity – despite the unbroken years of constant mourning – is a testament to the anchoring of their values in pursuit of a better world for themselves and for all mankind.

That they have not buckled under the unceasing pressure of constant fighting, lashing out wildly with mad contempt at neighbours who refuse to make peace and continue to plot death and destruction against the Jewish state – and its women, children, civilians, visitors and tourists – is a testament to their dedication to the sanctity of human life.

For 59 years and more, they have defended their homes and their lives tenaciously, bravely and without apology at the cost of so many of their young men and women. It is a testament to the promise that they and all Jews have made to Jewish history and to Jewish peoplehood: We shall not die, but live. Nor shall we abandon the hope that has carried us for thousands of years.

Canadians and Israelis understand with profound shared knowledge that celebrating freedom is always preceded by the uncompromising, moral prerequisite: recalling, honouring and cherishing the memories of our fallen defenders. We do both next week with reverence and humility for the Jewish state and those who fought and died for its freedom, and for freedom everywhere.

25 years ago in The CJN

Queen Elizabeth II and then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau signed the Constitution Act of 1982 into law. Irwin Cotler, president of Canadian Jewish Congress at the time, was among the dignitaries in attendance. Since it was Shabbat, he stayed in a hotel and walked to Parliament Hill to witness the ceremony.

Sudanese refugees in Israel

One appreciates the enormous pressure Israel faces to survive unremitting existential threats. Despite occasional miscalculations and misjudgments (like any other country) the Jewish state has acted with great moral clarity when faced with unpalatable "dilemmas."

However, is offering refuge to Sudanese refugees really such a dilemma ("Let them stay or send them away," CJN, April 5)? First of all, despite coming from an enemy country, they are all of African descent and have been mercilessly subjected to persecution, slavery, wide-scale rape and genocide at the hands of the Khartoum regime. Two-thirds of the refugees are Christians from the longer civil war in the south, where a tenuous peace barely holds. The rest, from Darfur, were fortunate to escape unspeakable atrocities that many are calling genocide. To suggest these refugees are a security risk is akin to inferring German Jews were likewise when they narrowly escaped their place of birth at the onset of World War II.

The assertion that providing asylum to non-Jews will open the floodgates to others flies in the face of history. During the 1970s, Israel was one of the first countries to open its doors to hundreds of Vietnamese boat people. Furthermore, Israel airlifted scores of vulnerable Muslims out of war-torn Bosnia in the 1990s. The proverbial floodgates did not open.

These desperate human beings sought asylum in Israel after further harassment, arbitrary arrest and eventual killing of 27 Sudanese by Egyptian authorities in a Cairo park in late December 2005. Certainly, Israel could work with other western countries to take in some of the 300 or so refugees.

As we reflect on the image of some refugees living in detention in Israel, let us invoke the memory of Holocaust survivors herded to internment camps in Cyprus. The legacy of Holocaust is indelibly etched in hearts and minds of all Jews and Israelis. This convinces me that Israel will, once again, act with great moral clarity and do the right thing.

Non-Jews at weekday seder meals

I was rather taken aback (to put it mildly) by Rabbi Wayne Allen's assertive opinion in "Ensure non-Jewish seder guests feel 'part of' the proceedings" (CJN, March 15) that when it comes to inviting non-Jews to weekday seder meals today, he is "left with no serious objections" and thus why not make all feel "part of the proceedings," for two main reasons:

1) It seems that the thrust of Rabbi Allen's analysis revolves around tangent issues (i.e., touching wine, not having non-Jews partake in the Paschal lamb, which we don't have to date), rather than the more serious and direct one, namely the problem of cooking for non-Jews on a weekday holiday. 2) Cooking extra food on behalf of non-Jews on a weekday holiday is not just a prohibition (as Rabbi Allen acknowledges), but rather this very concern that led the sages of the Talmud to make a formal enactment against inviting non-Jews to a weekday holiday meal. This enactment is not mentioned even once by Rabbi Allen.

In specific and extreme cases (i.e., an authentic convert learning about Judaism and the like), one can perhaps have non-Jews at one's holiday table if one adheres to very specific restrictions regarding the warming and serving of the food. But finding a heter (a lenient manner) to follow in a specific situation that may warrant it is a far cry from an outright declaration that when it comes to inviting non-Jews to a weekday seder, one is "left with no serious objections."

In our vitally needed attempt (which all Jews with a heart agree on) to outreach to the assimilated, intermarried, and so many others, let's make sure that we are bringing those closer to the Torah and not changing the Torah to bring it closer to them. Let's ensure that we influence Jews to change themselves into the "image" of the everlasting Torah and not, God forbid, the opposite.

More than a 'gap year'

In the article "'Gap year' offers youths experience outside the classroom" (Live and Learn, CJN, March 1), it is stated that taking a year off after high school is considered by some parents as a "deferment of responsibility."

As a 15-year-old Jewish student, I know students who took a year off after high school and returned to university. Many of them attended post-high school programs in Israel.

There are multiple advantages to attending such a program. They provide the student with continued Jewish religious education, the opportunity to extensively tour the country of their heritage and, perhaps most importantly, an environment in which new friendships are formed and in which independence and responsibility are developed. In such a circumstance, I believe that a year off after high school should not be referred to as a "gap year," but rather a year of experience, independence and learning.

Israeli heads massive food relief operation in Congo

As we prepare to celebrate Israel's 59th year of independence, this essay describes the type of work for which Israel and Israelis are known in Third World countries but which is little publicized in the West.

By DAVID BRINN

It seemed like Aya Shneerson was on the fast track to journalistic success. The Haifa-raised Israeli had finished a degree in journalism from Georgia Tech – where her father, a professor at the Technion, was taking part in a professors exchange program – and had joined the CNN team in Atlanta working on the international desk.

But a fortuitous journey to Sudan sent her down an entirely different career path. Today, as head of the United Nation's World Food Program in the war-torn Congo, her work has helped to save countless lives in the country's remote villages.

"Returning to Israel after deciding to leave CNN in 1998, I started to focus on still photography, and for my first story, I went to south Sudan on my own," Shneerson recounted to ISRAEL21c while on a brief vacation back home in Haifa. "Representatives from the World Food Program hosted me there, and I camped with them in the field."

The WFP is a United Nations humanitarian agency focusing on food relief. It was founded in 1963 as a three-year experimental program, but the need was so great that soon after it was turned into a permanent agency. Today, it distributes food to 97 million of the poorest people in the world

"The WFP people in Sudan said they were looking for a spokesperson and that I should apply. I thought it would be exciting to stay there for awhile and do a photo essay, so I applied and was immediately hired," Shneerson told ISRAEL21c.

For the next few years, Shneerson journeyed for the WFP to Sierre Leona, Burundi and Liberia, before arriving in the Congo, where she's now head of the World Food Program provincial office

"Our main mission is to give food aid – and when we talk about food aid, we're talking tons – up to 5,000 a month. We don't just come in and open a soup kitchen and provide food for a day," she said. "It's a massive amount of food we're talking about – we give food to last a month based on kilo calories per person – it's not one meal at a time."

'The native people know I'm from Israel, and to them it's a positive element'

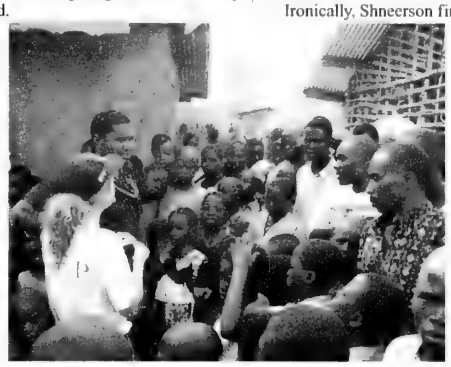
And more than any other country she worked in, the Congo was in dire need of that food aid. From 1997 to 1999, three outbursts of civil conflict led to large-scale looting and killings, which displaced more than 800,000 people and provoked an alarming deterioration of the living conditions of the Congolese people. A 2002 stabilization process was jeopardized by a resumption of the fighting between rebel groups and government forces in the southern region of the country, which continues sporadically.

"Congo is still suffering from a prolonged war, created mostly by the people themselves. If a village gets attacked, the villagers tend to run away into the jungle, or another village. This creates a big food shortage, and it's our mission to alleviate that shortage caused by the displacement," said Shneerson.

Just last year, some 50,000 families fled their homes in the east's North Kivu province due to fighting between the army and rebel militias, she said.

When she's not out in the field supervising the food distribution, an average day at the office for Shneerson involves computer work, e-mails, and managing five offices with more than 120 staff people.

"It's a massive logistic operation getting trucks to move food from the warehouses, loading, unloading. Everything has to be inspected, signed, approved – there's a lot of movement and co-ordination with other agencies and with peace-keeping missions," she said.



Aya Shneerson, head of the United Nation's World Food Program in the Congo, speaks to a group of children there.

In addition to immediate food relief, the WFP also provides long-term recovery programs that potentially will help the population in the Congo become more self-sufficient, Shneerson said.

"We run school feeding programs – in food insecure rural areas, we encourage kids to go to school by providing food incentives there. We also work with malnourished families in programs with other NGOs, supporting both the children and parents, trying to get them back on their feet."

For Shneerson, working with the WFP in the Congo has been a life-changing experience that has taught her many lessons about getting along in the world. She says it's not a job for everybody.

"You have to erase everything you considered to be behavioural norms, and you have to be able to live among extreme poverty. And in order to be able to continue to function, you can't get overwhelmed by everything," she said.

"And you have to handle being alone – there's not the entertainment leisure time you'd expect in a normal situation. You can spend days away in the jungle, and when you come back, there's not very much to do. So you have to learn to focus on the work."

Coming from Israel has proved advantageous for Shneerson among the local population, she said.

"The native people know I'm from Israel, and to them it's a positive element because of the religious context. The majority of the people are Christian, and they have a lot of respect and feel close to Israel, which they studied in church," she said.

Ironically, Shneerson finds her Arab UN colleagues to be the ones she has the most affinity for, and vice versa.

"I find that my closest colleagues are the Arab ones – culturally we're the most similar, especially the Sudanese. We're both warm cultures, family-oriented."

Shneerson's uncertain how long she can continue working in such an intense position in the volatile Congo. But she says she still receives immense satisfaction from it, even though the criteria have changed over the years.

"I used to say that if you save just one person, it's worth it – now I'm not so sure.

"The change you enact is going to be small, your small little part. You can't save the world, but you can save something on a given day. It can be overwhelming, though, and you can get depressed," she said.

"I know I can't stay in countries like this forever," she concluded, adding with a laugh, "My mom would be happy if I ended up back in Israel."

AID TO AFRICA

An Israeli social worker assists Darfurian women in a refugee camp in Chad through an IsraAid/Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society program that aims to help the refugees function psychologically and socially in the aftermath of extreme violence. Ultimately, the aid organizations hope the refugees will be able to assert control over their lives and find solutions to their displacement, whether by returning to their homes in Sudan, integrating with their hosts in Chad or being resettled elsewhere. IsraAid is a co-ordinating body of Israeli and Jewish NGOs.

Loyalty and shame

In his admirable memoir cum history, Five Germanys I Have Known, Fritz Stern cites the late Sir Isaiah Berlin – distinguished British thinker, committed Jew and ardent Zionist – that a sign of loyalty is to be able to feel ashamed of the actions of one's government.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

That is why Israelis and other Jews who are loyal to Israel express shame at times because of actions of the government of Israel. They do so out of commitment, not ambivalence; genuine love, not superficial indifference; and a desire to make Israel even better than it is. They feel alienated from Jews, many in positions of leadership, who insist uncritically, "my country right or wrong," often at the price of upholding Jewish values.

Of course, not all critics are loyal. There are Jews whose criticism is devoid of ahavat Yisrael, love of the Jewish people. The group in Britain that calls itself "Independent Jewish Voices" may be saying the same things as many Israelis, but whereas the latter usually say it to fellow Jews and with love, the former have made the British and international media their platform. Instead of urging Jews to adopt a critical and balanced stance, they are addressing an indifferent or hostile British public that may choose to misread the protest. Their shame may be real, but their loyalty is not in evidence.

The community leaders who have reacted against this rearguard action are adamant. Unlike the notorious Israel bashers among the dissenters, they represent the majority of Jews who out of genuine commitment to the Jewish people see it as their duty to defend the actions of the government of Israel, even if they disagree with them.

They say that though it may be legitimate for citizens of Israel to challenge their government, Jews who live elsewhere have no right to criticize it. They choose to ignore the Zionist affirmation that, as Israel is the land of the entire Jewish people, Jews everywhere should be encouraged to express views, including shame, even if they don't vote in elections. But the shame should be shared among committed supporters, not paraded in front of potential foes.

A second line of argument by the defenders of Israel, learned perhaps in the ghettoes of old, is that Jews should not be critical of other Jews, including Israeli politicians, "in front of the goyim." Ironically, critics who bypass the Jewish community in the name of universal values are also, in ghetto-like fashion, telling non-Jews that "we are different than other Jews. We are like you."

I for one celebrate the fact that Jews can be critical of Israel because they love it. But I try to speak only to like-minded people, not to those who may willfully misrepresent me.

Recalling sacrifices past and present

As thousands of Canadian teens crossed the Atlantic en masse to commemorate one of Canada's greatest military victories last week, I could not be prouder of my Canadian heritage.

The courageous actions of our soldiers at Vimy Ridge, many of which were my age, speak volumes to our noble military tradition. Fighting under the auspices of Canadian-led forces for the first time, the battle at Vimy was a crucial moment in World War I, but it signaled an even greater accomplishment: the effective birth of an autonomous Canadian nation.

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

Soon we will also commemorate the struggles for nationhood on the Israeli side of my heritage. Yom Hazikaron is a national day of remembrance in Israel, dedicated to soldiers lost in battle, as well as the victims of terror attacks. It might be surprising to outsiders that conscripted soldiers who die in combat missions in service to the nation are mourned along with civilians who die because they were in the wrong place at the wrong time. But this is the Israeli reality, one that Canadians thankfully do not have to endure.

In Canada, commemorating civilian and military death together does not exist. And after living in peace for so many years, Canadians can barely conceive of the sacrifices of previous wars. In fact, Canadians hardly even remember our own military record. According to a recent Dominion Institute poll, just 60 per cent of Canadians could identify the battle of Vimy Ridge as having occurred in World War I, less than half of Canadians recognized Billy Bishop as Canada's most decorated fighter pilot, and most distressingly, less than 40 per cent of Canadians could name John McCrae's iconic poem In Flanders Fields.

It seems that the history of the Great War will be re-written by the fleeting memories of time. But I'm sure Jerry Bruckheimer will make some epic Hollywood blockbuster like Pearl Harbour or Black Hawk Down to remind us how truly awesome special effects can make war look.

As a grandson of a World War II veteran on one side and a 1956 Sinai Campaign veteran on the other, I lament the slow passing of our audacious ancestors.

My paternal grandfather, a Canadian reconnaissance doctor who helped to liberate the Netherlands and Belgium, was lost in a downward spiral of age-induced dementia and Alzheimer's well before I was old enough to grasp the complexity of his war stories. It is with sadness that I can only hear second-hand accounts from my father. The realization that Canada's war heroes are dying seems to have spurred more proactive commemorations such as the field trip to Vimy.

My maternal grandfather, like the State of Israel, is alive and well. As a Canadian who made aliyah in 1949 to live on a kibbutz, my maternal grandfather was enlisted to help with the Sinai campaign, choosing to fight for the ideology of Zionism and for the spirit of the Jewish people.

The recent deaths of eight Canadian soldiers in Afghanistan and the fact that Israeli soldiers Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev are still being held hostage underscore the reality that war is not just history.

We should not forget that both Canada and Israel are currently engaged in military operations which, while not matching the scope of previous wars, still manage to take the lives of their soldiers each year.

It seems that we have become numb when it comes to remembering the almost 100,000 Canadian soldiers who died in two world wars and the roughly 13,000 soldiers who have died in Israel's wars. This could be because of the sheer magnitude of such losses.

However, the main reason for our numbness, I believe, has to do with the sad reality that these events have passed into the annals of history.

So this year, I will stand proudly for the fallen soldiers of Canada and Israel who have defended both facets of my Jewish-Canadian heritage.

Yet it would be a tragedy to honour soldiers of the past while forgetting the sacrifices of the present. Just ask the grieving families of the soldiers whose names appear on the news. For them, war isn't history, it's daily reality.

Maybe the rest of us should think the same way, too.

A different kind of Mideast discussion

On the eve of Pesach, I had the privilege of participating in a Middle East Café here in Halifax. This event was the brainchild of Ben Saifer, a Jewish alumnus of King's College, and his friend Ruba Moubarak, a graduate student of Palestinian descent.

In seeing how this event was constructed and executed, I was struck by how different it was from others in Halifax that attempt to broach the sensitive and impossibly complex topic of the Middle East. Such events usually fall under three categories: the lecture, the panel discussion or the rally. And while I appreciate the intent of these events to educate about or demonstrate support for a certain topic, inevitably each one seems to dissolve into a war of words, such that confrontation itself seems to be the goal rather than the specific issue at hand.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

The intention of the Middle East Café was to create a space that did not breed this type of confrontation, but at the same time, did not force the participants to tow the empty middle line of simple agreement and compromise. The organizers made a concerted effort to foster substantial conversation, while making each participant feel comfortable. A neutral location was chosen, and all the participants were in some way members of the university community.

The event began with informal chatting over tasty snacks and coffee, which set the tone for the overall relaxed (and Haligonian) feeling of the afternoon. The participants – half of them were Jewish, the other half Arab or Muslim – then came together for opening remarks from the facilitator, an adult with experience in conflict resolution.

After that, we paired off with a partner from the "other side," and each person was given time to explain his or her reasons for participating. We next formed small groups and the partner now had to share the other person's story.

Having to tell another's story and listening to one's own story being told were a little like playing an advanced and risky game of Broken Telephone. I realized how much gets lost in translation and how difficult it is both to make oneself understood and to truly understand where another is coming from. But it seems that this dilemma is representative of the conflict as a whole – so much is embedded in complex narratives that are hard to untangle.

This was a fascinating and important exercise to undertake and a necessary first step in trust-building. I found it encouraging to see people cautiously correct their partner if they felt they were not being properly represented. Given the risks involved with this type of exercise, there was remarkably little (if any) hostility in the air. It was also interesting to see that no two people came to the dialogue for exactly the same reason.

After a short break, we reconvened for small group discussions on topics of our choice. These included the role of identity in one's views on the conflict, and the question of entitlement to a piece of land.

In my group, we discussed what it means to feel a connection to a land one does not reside in and the importance of building strong neighbourly relations wherever one does reside. We talked about fears, anxieties, safety nets and feeling vulnerable.

Because of the friendly, comfortable atmosphere that was created, it seemed that people might have been a bit guarded in these discussions. I found that I could not express precisely what was on my mind and felt that others might be in the same boat. I found that the discussions themselves did not quite get to the heart of the matters at hand. This question occasionally crossed my mind: should a discussion on a topic as challenging as the Middle East really be this relaxed?

The conclusion that I and others reached was yes. As an initial step to further dialogue, this was precisely what needed to be done. The organizers themselves harboured no illusions that solutions could be achieved in one simple afternoon in Halifax. Still, this event demonstrated that there is both a need and a will for residents of this city to discuss these matters in an open setting. For myself and others, this event served as a powerful alternative to the common fare available in Halifax, and I hope it is not the last of its kind.

The Kirshner File

Foreign governments have meddled in Iraq's affairs

Less than six months before Iraq invaded Kuwait in August 1990, touching off a diplomatic firestorm and then a full-blown war, John Kelly, the U.S. assistant secretary of state, told the Iraqi president, Saddam Hussein, that he was "a force for moderation in the region."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Given what has happened in Iraq since, Kelly's fulsome words of praise now sound uninformed, maybe cynical and certainly overwrought.

But Barry Lando, a Canadian-born, Paris-based, American journalist who was once a producer for the CBS TV program 60 Minutes and has just written a book about Iraq, is hardly surprised by Kelly's flight of fancy.

Long before Saddam stupidly sealed his fate and that of his regime by invading neighbouring Kuwait, he was assiduously courted by world leaders from former U.S. president George Bush to French President Jacques Chirac, both of whom had an eye on Iraqi oil, regarded Iraq as a lucrative export market, and considered Iraq as a bulwark against the fast-rising Islamic fundamentalist regime in Iran.

As a result, they had a vested interest in preserving Saddam's Baathist government and overlooking his litany of appalling misdeeds and violations of human rights.

Viewed from this perspective, countries like the United States and France were complicit in his crimes, suggests Lando, the author of Web of Deceit: The History of Western Complicity in Iraq From Churchill to Kennedy to George W. Bush (Doubleday Canada).

A critic of current U.S. foreign policy and an opponent of the 2003 allied invasion of Iraq, he decided to write the book after American forces captured Saddam.

With Saddam locked in prison and set to be grilled in a show trial, Lando figured that certain heads of state and businessmen who had been implicated by their dealings with him and his regime would have been happier had he been summarily executed after being routed out of his "spider hole" on Dec. 13, 2003.

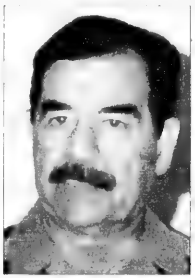
For Lando, a man who has participated in interviews with political figures ranging from former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat to former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, the capture of Saddam also brought into clearer focus a central issue: the invasion and occupation of Iraq by the United States was just the latest example of western intervention in the Middle East since World War I.

"The subject obsessed me," said Lando, who was a Time-Life correspondent in South America prior to joining 60 Minutes in 1971. "The complicity of foreigners in Iraqi affairs had been forgotten."

Having fastened on his topic, Lando read a succession of books and articles about the region and interviewed a parade of Americans, Arabs and Europeans who had first-hand knowledge of Iraq.

Although Web of Deceit is written by a reporter rather than a professional historian, it is an earnest work of scholarship brimming with fascinating revelations.

Britain was the first European power to intervene in Iraq, which he correctly describes as "an artificial creation of foreigners preoccupied with empire and oil."



Former Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein

The parallels between Britain and the United States' occupation are remarkable, he pointed out.

In conquering Iraq, Britain fielded 133,000 troops, roughly the same number as the United States committed many decades later. Similarly, the British and American armies faced costly rebellions. While Britain ruled Iraq through the minority Sunnis, the United States essentially sided with the majority Shiites.

Lando pointed out that George W. Bush was not the first U.S. president to try regime change in Baghdad, having been preceded by Dwight Eisenhower, John Kennedy and Lyndon Johnson. The Central Intelligence Agency was very much involved in a 1959 plot to unseat the then-Iraqi president, Abdel Karim Qasim, and in 1968, the United States played a role in the coup that brought the Baathists – and Saddam – to power.

Barry Lando

Throughout the Cold War, until the Six Day War, Washington maintained strong relations with Iraq. Lando claimed that the United States, having lost an ally in Tehran with the downfall of the Pahlavi monarchy, encouraged Iraq to invade Iran in 1980, in what would be the bloodiest Mideast war of the 20th century. The Reagan administration, while officially neutral, played a Machiavellian game as that interminable war dragged on. Washington's strategy hinged on the expectation that Iraq would topple Iran's Islamist regime without destroying Iran.

During that conflict, the United States provided Iraq with valuable intelligence about Iran, sold Iraq helicopter engines and computers, and funnelled agricultural credits to Baghdad. Meanwhile, Washington permitted Israel to sell military equipment to Iran. For Israel, Iraq was the lesser of evils.

With his invasion of Kuwait, Saddam alienated the United States. But Lando reminds readers that the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, April Glaspie, emboldened Saddam by stating that Washington had "no opinion" on his "border disagreement with Kuwait."

Explaining why the United States callously stopped short of actively supporting the postwar Shiite uprising in southern Iraq that it had encouraged, Lando cited U.S. fears of becoming embroiled in an internal conflict and sanctioning the breakup of Iraq.

In an aside, he observed that the pro-Israel lobby opposed a Shiite government in Iraq on the grounds that it would likely be more hostile to the Jewish state than Saddam.

Lando, a liberal, charged that Bush's primary justifications for invading Iraq – its armoury of weapons of mass destruction and its connection with Al Qaeda – were strongly challenged or contradicted by U.S. intelligence agencies.

But what ultimately drove him, and the neo-conservatives advising him, was the broader agenda of proving that the United States was still the pre-eminent power after the terrorist events of Sept. 11, 2001, in Manhattan and Washington, D.C.

Lando, who was here recently to promote Web of Deceit, said that the deadly insurgency currently confronting the United States was widely predicted by experts.

Saddam, too, feared that the invasion would touch off "a nationalistic reaction."

Lando believes that the U.S. occupation may have taken a different turn had there been sufficient troops to maintain law and order. Even so, he cannot justify the staggering expense of the war.

"This adventure will cost two to three trillion dollars."

In his book, Lando writes that American oil companies stood to profit from the invasion, believing that they would supplant Russian and French firms that had signed deals with Iraq.

U.S. President George W. Bush

But in an interview, he agreed that the United States really had no need to invade Iraq to ensure the flow of oil, since Saddam had willingly sold it to all comers.

He favours a phased U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, but not a precipitous pullout, and concurs with the conclusions of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that Iran and Syria should be brought into the process to help stabilize that strife-torn nation. Lando added that the U.S. may yet succeed in bringing stability to Iraq, but not Jeffersonian democracy.

The partition of Iraq into Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish national entities may be a solution if sectarian violence continues to tear it apart.

"But in the future, when the fires die down," he said, "the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds may join together in one unified state."

'Even the devil could not invent such a crime'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Thousands gathered at Earl Bales Park on Sunday to honour the millions murdered at the hands of the Nazis.

The Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah community commemoration, sponsored by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian society for Yad Vashem, featured an address by Herbert Goldstein, a Holocaust survivor who served in the Royal Navy, a candlelighting ceremony and a keynote address by Sibylle Niemoeller von Sell, a German-born baroness and a member of the German resistance.

Yom Hashoah

Both Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR) and Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, of the Vaad Harabonim, took part in the program, despite the controversy surrounding last year's Holocaust commemoration ceremony, when the TBR backed out of program.

Last year, the organizers decided that only the male members of the Renanim Youth Choir could take part in the event out of respect for the Vaad Harabonim, the umbrella for Orthodox rabbis, because of the prohibition against men hearing women sing.

This year, the children's choir of Netivot HaTorah Day School includes both boys and girls below the age of bar and bat mitzvah.

Ya'acov Brosh, the consul general of Israel to Toronto, greeted the overflow crowd.

"I always say there is no lesson of the Holocaust… because the human mind cannot accept what happened there and then say we should learn a lesson from this. Even the devil could not invent such a crime," Brosh said, adding that in order to exact revenge on those who wish to see the destruction of the Jewish people, we must survive and flourish.

Niemoeller, 83, who lost members of her family to the Nazi regime, said that we are all responsible for keeping the "flame of the memory burning in our hearts.

"I do not come from a Jewish family, but I was robbed of my father and many members of my family during the Nazi time and I just pretended my father's horrendous fate did not happen… Maybe it was just a nightmare. And had I not been released after 40 years from my self-imposed prison, by a man who became my mentor and my good friend, Elie Weisel, I would probably have suffocated," Niemoeller said.

In 1990, Niemoeller converted to Judaism and is now a noted Holocaust educator. At the ceremony, she shared her story of her family's involvement in an underground railroad in Berlin-Dahlem that hid Jews and participated in the failed plot to kill Adolf Hitler in 1944.

"The most important thing my parents taught me was that… no law was above your conscience, which meant that what your conscience told you, you do, and that included the responsibility for fending for those who could not fend for themselves," Niemoeller said.

She said that as a child she refused to join the Hitler Youth and, as a result, she wasn't allowed to graduate from high school. But this, she said, bothered her little because she went to train as an actress and dancer.

Meanwhile, her family was actively involved in the assassination attempt on Hitler. In fact, Niemoeller's cousin, who carried the bomb that was meant to kill Hitler, was shot, and his brother was hanged after the failure.

Niemoeller herself was arrested, interrogated and physically abused by the Gestapo, but was eventually released. Her father was held at a Nazi prison, where he was a prisoner until the end of the war, but he was kidnapped by the Soviet KBG soon thereafter and died in a former Nazi concentration camp, Jamlitz.

"What motivated the German nation… in the era of enlightenment, under the eyes of the world," to resort to these inhumane measures? she asked.

"A nature of culture had lost not only its shem tov, its good name, it lost its soul."

She said that even though the Temple was destroyed again and again, and the Holocaust was meant to be the end of the Jewish people, "out of the plagues out of the ashes, comes a commanding voice, 'Zachor, v'lo yishkach, Am Israel Chai.'"

'He showed his love of people by caring for them'

never lost his sense of humour, despite being in excruciating pain.

"He showed his love of people by caring for them, and he knew what his duty was."

As a "loving husband, caring father and doting grandfather, Gordon left his family a rich legacy of love, and a shining example of the rewards of being there for others."

Susan Davis, executive vice-president of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) served with Wolfe on the boards of both Holy Blossom and Mazon. "He always sought new volunteers, and tried to revive board structures. It all goes back to knowing what to do next. He knew the strength of an organization lay in its volunteer cadre," Davis told The CJN.

He also celebrated a diversity of opinions, Davis said. "He was always up for a fight for the sake of progress. [Without him], we all feel emptiness as well as sadness."

Florence Davis, who worked at JF&CS as Wolfe's executive assistant for 12 years, called him a mentor and a friend.

"He always challenged me to grow, and he was 2,000 per cent committed to the agency."

She said that Wolfe uncovered all the secrets in the Jewish community and brought them into the public eye. "He would not allow problems such as child abuse, poverty, domestic violence and addictions to be swept under the rug. The community can thank him for that."

Teri Kay, who was director of family and community services at JF&CS when she retired, worked with Wolfe for 20 years. "There are people who come into your life who truly make a difference, and he was one of those people," she said.

"He was a mentor and a teacher, and he taught me a lot about friendship and leadership. He was a role model because no one worked harder than him. He was hands on and knew everything there was to know about a large organization."

One thing he said that always stayed with her, Kay said, was that "there are no good or bad decisions, there are only decisions, so make one."

His youngest daughter Carrie said at the funeral that as a father and a community worker, "part of his magic was that he gave each of us a unique piece of himself. People loved him, and he made countless lives better."

When she asked her father what she should do with her life, "he said he didn't know, but that I should make my choices based on my own dream. There is no right or wrong decision. Just give it your best.

"That is the philosophy that kept him going. As long as he was still here, he gave it his best, if that meant being able to sit at the dinner table, or ensuring that an organization had what it needed.

"[Every day he could] he got up, got dressed, and did the best he possibly [could]."

Daughter Deborah said that her father touched so many lives, but he was most proud of his role as husband, father and grandfather.

When he was very ill, he went to Bialik Hebrew Day School – his last outing – in honour of his wife's retirement from the preschool, Deborah said. "There is so much of him in each of us."

His son Michael said that his father always spoke for those who had no voice, and was the champion of those who had no champion. "He lives on through the lives he enriched."

In addition to his wife and children, Wolfe leaves three grandchildren, triplets Samantha, Jake and Amanda.

Sderot is being added to the list of abandoned Israeli communities. Brave citizens and pioneers find themselves on the front lines of a war brought to their doorstep by a government that refuses to protect them. Why is Sderot under attack? Because the Israeli government withdrew from Gaza. And now there is no plan to protect its citizens near the border.

So the citizens of Sderot have to choose: Stay and face the daily terror and economic uncertainty of a city under fire, or abandon their homes. The choice is not an easy one — it's a choice that pits family and safety against patriotism and idealism. Those who choose to stay deserve our support. Without it, the city could crumble and the terrorists will eventually move on to their next targets: Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Sderot is the new front line in the struggle for a secure Israel. And a secure Israel means a secure world for the Jewish people — for us and our children.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Many acts of chesed performed at Pesach

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I believe that the vast amounts of chesed performed around the world during Pesach this season have had no precedent in past Jewish history.

Chesed – kindness – is a mitzvah, but more, it is one of the defining characteristics of God. Hence by practising chesed, one is emulating God, and indeed, being Godly.

The connection of Pesach and chesed is an old tradition, perhaps as old as the holiday itself. Kimcha di pischa is the talmudic name for the original Pesach food drive: kosher for Pesach flour was collected and distributed to those in need so that they could make their own matzah and not go hungry.

Because man does not live by bread alone (or in this case, matzah), today's Pesach drives involve much more. Our world today compared to that of yore is much more complex, and it is certainly much more affluent than it was in those simpler times. Hence, our acts of chesed, too, must advance accordingly from the very basics of Pesach flour, to reflect the levels of today's realities.

There were organizations, locally and across the world, that delivered truckloads of boxes of meat, poultry, eggs, potatoes, fruit, vegetables, juices and sweets along with regular Pesach matzah and matzah shmurah. Yeshiva boys volunteered, family heads and, in some cases, whole families joined in the packaging and distribution. For many, this was not their first time, but it is by now part of an annual tradition prior to the holiday.

There were organizations that co-ordinated teenage girls who had volunteered to help by being sent to babysit in some homes so that mothers could shop or clean. Some girls signed on ready to help with the cleaning effort itself.

There were families who could not prepare for the holiday like the rest of us, for they were blessed with the birth of a child in the days prior to the holiday. Or sadly, there were those who had a loss and were not able to prepare because they were sitting shivah. In these cases, the meals for entire holiday were brought to them by the community.

Vast amounts of money were dispersed with sensitivity and dignity to the truly needy.

There were organizations that provided vouchers to those qualifying – vouchers for shoes, suits, shirts, wigs, hats and dresses. Manufactures donated their wares outright or offered them below cost.

In Israel, one individual purchased an entire matzah shmurah factory. He did this so that he could "sell" these round, handmade matzot to the needy at a very heavily subsidized price.

Countless of homes opened during the holiday itself – for the lonely, for the uninitiated but interested, for Russians just beginning to experience Judaism, and for ba'alei tshuvah. In these homes, the words of the Haggadah – "let all who are hungry come and eat" – were put into practice with warmth and a smile.

The lists of chesed performed are endless and they continue to grow each year. Truly, there is no parallel to benevolence of such magnitude among other people. While the spiritual force of accomplishment in all this chesed cannot be measured, neither should it be underestimated.

May God Almighty protect us all in the merit of these awesome amounts of chesed this past Pesach season.

Homage to MAHAL, the foreign volunteers of 1948

By BARUCH COHEN

Guest Voice

As Israel celebrates its 59th Yom Ha'atzmaut (Independence Day), our thoughts are directed to the heroes of MAHAL – Mitnadvei Chutz La'Aretz – the military organization of foreign volunteers in Israel. We remember the volunteers from all parts of the world, Jews and non-Jews, who flocked to the gates of the as yet unborn State of Israel to offer their services as part of the newly formed Israel Defence Forces.

The story is dramatic and, in some ways, incredible. Five thousand volunteers were organized after the United Nations General Assembly, in November 1947, recommended the partition of Palestine. In some instances, the initiative was spontaneous and local.

This was the case in Canada, where Jewish ex-servicemen issued a call for volunteers to fight for the newly created Jewish state. In the United States and Scandinavia, ex-servicemen contacted shlichim, representatives of the Haganah who worked under cover. In South Africa, the movement was organized after the arrival of a Jewish Agency representative who contacted the South African Jewish servicemen's association.

By early 1948, volunteer organizations existed in most Jewish communities in the western world. Small numbers of volunteers with urgently needed military experience were smuggled into the Yishuv before the State of Israel was proclaimed.

The majority of the volunteers were channelled through training camps in France and Italy by the Haganah's European command, whose headquarters were in Paris. Most volunteers were World War II veterans, and some had been officers. The importance of their contribution was not in their numbers but in their quality and experience, badly needed in a new army whose brief fighting tradition was as an underground movement.

One of MAHAL's crucial contributions came from the veterans who were among the founders of Israel's fledgling air force.

Some 150 MAHAL volunteers were killed in action, the majority from the United States and Canada. Of the estimated 5,000 volunteers who came, close to 300 remained or returned to settle in Israel.

Leonard Salter, in his book The Pledge (Simon and Schuster, N.Y., 1970), writes: "Reb Kolman's [an ex-U.S. air force pilot officer] first mission, less than 12 hours after his arrival from Italy, would be to drop a life-saving load of supplies and arms to the beleaguered inhabitants of the Etzion Bloc.

"After the war, Reb Kolman served as a captain with El Al until the late 1970s. At times, Reb Kolman was the head El Al pilot, transporting [David] Ben-Gurion and Golda Meir during their visits to the United States. Today he lives happily with his family in Amherst [in New York State].

"Only after the 1948 Independence War did the American government learn the full extent of the underground's operations. An armed force was created from nothing by a handful of dedicated conspirators. They supplied every item that was requested, from tanks and rifles to Hebrew typewriters."

On this solemn Yom Ha'atzmaut on April 23, I call upon everyone to remember the MAHAL volunteers' unique contribution to our beloved and invincible State of Israel.

Succinct biography of Chagall

Marc Chagall* by Jonathon Wilson Schocken (the latest addition to the Jewish Encounter series of Schocken books).

Books
Bernard Baskin

When Marc Chagall died, aged 97, he was buried in a French Catholic cemetery.

A tall crucifix, later removed, shadowed his grave. There was no service, but as the coffin was lowered into the ground, an unknown young person stepped forward and recited Kaddish.

It seems that Valentina Brodsky, Chagall's third wife, who had secretly converted to Christianity years before, had insisted on the Christian burial.

Chagall's relationship to Judaism was complex and ambivalent. On the one hand, he was close to Jewish culture and tradition. Born into a poor, pious chassidic family in the small town of Vitebsk, Belarus, he was never truly comfortable in any language other than Yiddish. He visited Israel many times and often referred to it as "our country."

The religious symbols of his childhood became an ineradicable part of his artistic vision. Together with the Sabbath candles, the clock on the wall and the candelabra, he filled his universe with angels, flowers, lovers, goats, horses and roosters that play the violin – mingled recollections of both Jewish and Russian village life.

He was no stranger to anti-Semitic behavior. At one point, he commented, "It is amazing the way the French resent foreigners. You live here most of your life. You become a naturalized French citizen, give them 20 paintings for their museum of modern art, work for nothing decorating their cathedrals, and they still despise you. You are not one of them. It was always like that."

But Chagall was never a practising Jew and tended increasingly to stress the universality of his subject matter. In 1950, he received a commission to decorate the baptistery of a new Catholic church. He underwent a difficult and protracted period of self-doubt. He set up a meeting with the chief rabbi of France and other prominent Jews to discuss the matter. He finally turned to Chaim Weizmann, the president of Israel. In a letter, written in Yiddish, he emphasized the dilemma of a man "whose life had taken him from the Orthodox East, through war, revolution and the Holocaust, to the pinnacle of a secular career in the vastly modern West." Weizmann replied that Chagall should be guided by the dictates of his own conscience.

It took seven years before Chagall arrived at a decision to donate a number of murals to the Church on themes from the Hebrew scriptures. It is true to say he never quite came to terms with the anxieties that beset him as a Jewish artist in adorning Christian edifices.

His choice of the Crucifixion, as a powerful metaphor for modern Jewish suffering, became a source of controversy. Perhaps his most remarkable and controversial painting was the White Crucifixion, painted in 1938 after Kristallanacht. In it, a fire set by a Nazi rages through a synagogue with surrounding scenes of Jewish disaster and tragedy. At the still centre of this devastation and misery, dominating the canvas, is Jesus on the cross, his loincloth stripped and fringed like a tallit, his head bowed beneath Hebrew lettering that spells out, "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews."

Chagall was disappointed that his only "Jewish" commission was for the synagogue at the Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem. He was dismayed at the stunted and unappealing structure. Teddy Kollek, mayor of Jerusalem, acknowledged that the building "was a disgrace and a terrible demeaning setting for the stunning windows."

Undoubtedly, Chagall was the best known and appreciated Jewish artist of his time. The last years of his life were crowned with a rich harvest of international tributes and honours. His exuberant use of colour lent artistic magic to the wit and poetry of his prolific output.

Jonathon Wilson, novelist and critic, in this succinct and knowledgeable biography, covers all aspects of the artist's long and many-sided life against the background of 20th-century Jewish and world history.

Yom Ha'atzmaut online, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This coming Monday, the fifth day of the month of Iyar, Israelis will celebrate as their country begins its 60th year of independence. Even if you aren't lucky enough to be in Israel, you can feel just a bit closer thanks to the Internet. Here are six suggestions.

Eat like an Israeli.

"From Tel Aviv to Uhm el Fahm and from Jerusalem to Metulla, the great majority of local food writers and chefs agree that Israel has not developed a national cuisine." Those sound like fighting words coming from Daniel Rogov, one of the country's premier food writers. Actually the restaurant and wine critic for Ha'aretz is a passionate advocate of the country's cooking. He writes that Israelis are fortunate to be able to choose from foods from so many diverse ethnic origins. I particularly enjoyed his essays on Five Thousand Years of Culinary History and Dining on Street Food. [http://tinyurl.com/39rwpk]

Rogov also has a massive Israeli recipe section (The Wonder of Couscous, Dining with the Druze, Cactus as an Edible Fruit, etc.) that is definitely worth checking out. Note, though, that some of Rogov's recipes are not kosher. [http://tinyurl.com/383vqd]

If Rogov's recommendations haven't sated your inner gourmand, take a look at About.com's Israeli Recipe Collections. [http://tinyurl.com/2wl2ha]

Watch Israeli TV.

You can watch today's news from Jerusalem in English, courtesy the Israel Broadcasting Authority. The seven-minute bulletin is heavy on politics, as you might expect. [http://tinyurl.com/5bbvq] If you'd like to go beyond the news, try infolive.tv, a new Internet-only TV service, also based in Jerusalem. Broadcasting in English, French, Spanish and Arabic, you'll find plenty of professionally produced features about innovation, society, sport, tourism and culture – as well as the news. I was fascinated by a piece on an upcoming movie about the Jerusalem Syndrome, a psychological disorder in which pilgrims and visitors to the Israeli capital believe they are biblical characters. [www.infolive.tv]

To truly get a feel for the country, you really need to watch TV in Hebrew. Arutz 2's VideoMachine is a large repository of clips from the popular broadcaster. You can watch on-demand the hard-hitting consumer affairs show Kolbotek, the drama Miluim, the silly and funny Kachah Lo Mitnahagim, and much more. Informative, irreverent and occasionally racy fare. [http://tinyurl.com/2uf8uv]

However, if you aren't able to understand those clips, it's time to…

Learn Hebrew online.

There are several sites that will help you with the basics and beyond. Granted these won't replace an ulpan in Netanya, but some of these free resources are surprisingly good.

As you might expect, Hebrew Verbs concentrates on just that. Three hundred verbs are fully conjugated in all tenses, nekudot included. [www.hebrew-verbs.co.il] My Hebrew Dictionary [www.dictionary.co.il] and Learn Hebrew categorize vocabulary in dozens of categories, among them astronomy, business meetings and musical instruments. [www.learn-hebrew.co.il]

To get a real feel for a language, you have to understand its sayings and idioms. LearnHebrew has informative and amusing explanations of hundreds of them. You'll find classics like "Lo Nora" (literally: it's not so terrible; idiomatically: it could be worse) and "Yad Rochetzet Yad" (literally: one hand washes the other; idiomatically: partners in crime.) [www.learnhebrew.org.il/]

Here's one that was new to me. "Seret ra" literally means "a bad movie" but idiomatically it's closer to "a disaster." As the site explains, "When your son (or daughter) comes back from a date, flops into a chair in total dejection, and comments, 'Aizeh seret ra,' s/he is probably not referring to the movie."

Next week, more sites for Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Remembering is not enough, Harper says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper addressed hundreds of people gathered Sunday on Parliament Hill to mark Holocaust Memorial Day, and he urged the world to learn from history.

The Holocaust "stands alone in the annals of human evil," Harper said.

"Millions – including six million Jewish men, women and children – were murdered by the Nazis during the Holocaust."

But he said it's not enough to remember the past. "They [politicians] must stand up to those who advocate the destruction of Israel and its people today and they must be unequivocal in their condemnation of anti-Semitic despots, terrorists and fanatics."

Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker noted that the victims of the Shoah were all individuals.

"It is our personal, national and international duty to remember every single person, every single name that perished in the Shoah. They are not just names, but people," he said.

The ceremony on Parliament Hill was attended by senators, members of Parliament, the ambassadors of several countries and Holocaust survivors. In addition to members of the local Jewish community, there were also participants from Montreal and Toronto.

Yom Hashoah

Wreaths were laid at the Centennial Flame in front of the Parliament Buildings by Harper and other dignitaries, accompanied by survivors.

From Parliament Hill, participants walked to the nearby Congress Centre for the continuation of the ceremony. The master of ceremonies was former Liberal MP and cabinet minister Herb Gray.

Ottawa Mayor Larry O'Brien said that "as we reflect on this dark chapter in the history of mankind, let us pray for those who are suffering around the world today."

MP Irwin Cotler told the survivors in attendance that they are the true heroes of humanity, that they not only survived but lived to have families and build productive lives.

He said that "there are things in Jewish history that are too terrible to be believed, but they are not too terrible to have happened."

He said there are five lessons to be learned from the Holocaust:

• "The importance of zachor, of remembrance itself: unto each person there is a name, an identity."

• "The Holocaust of European Jewry occurred not only because of the Nazi industry of death, but because of the state-sanctioned incitement of genocide." Cotler warned that the world is now witnessing state-sanctioned incitement to genocide in President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran and must act to stop it.

Politicians must stand up to those who advocate the destruction of Israel, says Prime Minister

• "The Holocaust occurred not only because of the industry of death, but because of crimes of indifference, because of conspiracies of silence." He urged the international community to "put an end to the killing fields in [Sudan's Darfur region]."

• "The Shoah occurred because of what might be called the treason of the intellectuals, the treason of the elite."

• "It is our responsibility, as citizens of the world, to give voice to the voiceless and to empower the powerless whoever or wherever they may be," Cotler said.

A candlelighting ceremony was held in memory of the victims of the Holocaust, with candles being lit by survivors and representatives of various groups.

The Arie Van Mansum Educators Award was presented to Grade 6 teacher Patrick Mascoe from Ottawa Charles H. Hulse Public School.

Mascoe started a program about the Holocaust and tolerance by inviting survivors to speak to his class of mostly Muslim students. He then instituted a "friendship program" in which his students have engaged in an e-mail exchange with their counterparts from Ottawa's Hillel Academy. Students from both schools have also participated in several joint programs to get to know one another.

The award was presented to Mascoe by Ryan Euverman, the grandson of Arie Van Mansum, a Dutch man who risked his life to save Jews during World War II by hiding them with Christian families.

Question: My ex takes money off the monthly child support payments he makes for things like baseball for my son. This to me seems awfully cheap in that he has never helped with day care or taekwondo for the past few years. He recently told my daughter he couldn't afford her grad dress, as he was struggling.

The same week, he signed my son up for baseball and took money from my support cheque which is to pay for housing and food. Now the children will soon be out of day care. Is it too late to claim contribution for day care and taekwondo retroactively?

Answer: No. You have every right to claim for a contribution to day care retroactively to the day they started day care. Moreover, he has no right to deduct any of his own child-related expenses from your basic monthly payment. He may or may not be liable for extra-curricular activities like taekwondo, depending on his earnings and yours. Some judges will award it and others won't.

But, at the very least, his contribution for day care each year should be in proportion to your own gross yearly income as compared to his under section 7 of the Child Support Guidelines. You should consult with a competent family law lawyer to assist you in calculating the appropriate overall contributions he has missed over the years after obtaining from him his tax returns (and possibly other financial statements if he is self-employed) for each of those years.

Then, you or your lawyer should send him a letter of demand for those funds with appropriate receipts, and if his income increased, for the retroactive basic child support he should have paid.

If he fails to provide the financial disclosure or refuses to pay for retroactive child support and the monies he should have never deducted from your basic child support payments, then you should have no hesitation whatsoever making a court application.

You should also file your payment agreement with the government support enforcement agency, the Family Responsibility Office. As I mentioned in a recent article, the basic table amount for child support, without calculating these extraordinary or special expenses like daycare or taekwondo, has gone up effective May 1, 2006.

Some judges may or may not grant you the entire amount of retroactive day care because you waited too long to notify him of your claim in writing. But that doesn't mean you shouldn't obtain at least partial relief.

Peace: scant hope or no chance?

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Two recent columns on ending the Arab-Israeli conflict gave readers a choice between total pessimism and guarded optimism.

In "A War of Narratives" (New York Times, April 8), David Brooks writes dispiritedly about a conference he attended in Jordan: "It was co-sponsored by the Center for Strategic Studies at the University of Jordan and the American Enterprise Institute, and the idea was to get Americans and moderate Arab reformers together to talk about Iraq, Iran, and any remaining prospects for democracy in the Middle East."

But "the Arab speakers mainly wanted to talk about the Israel lobby."

Brooks describes the so-called moderate Arab intellectuals as being so consumed with conspiracy theories about the nefarious influence – even control – of American Mideast policy by the "Israel lobby," that they showed little interest in anything else: "The problems between America and the Arab world have nothing to do with religious fundamentalism or ideological extremism, several Arab speakers argued. They have to do with American policies toward Israel, and the forces controlling those policies.

"As for problems in the Middle East itself, these speakers added, they have a common source, Israel."

Brooks writes: "We Americans tried to press our Arab friends to talk more about the Sunni-Shiite split, the Iraqi civil war and the rise of Iran, but they seemed uninterested. They mimicked a speech King Abdullah of Jordan recently delivered before [the U.S.] Congress, in which he scarcely mentioned the Iraqi chaos on his border. It was all Israel, all the time."

Brooks explains that, in contrast, the Americans "argue that problems like Muslim fundamentalism, extremism and autocracy could not be blamed on Israel or Paul Wolfowitz, but had deeper historical roots. We tended to see the Israeli-Palestinian issue not as the root of all fundamentalism, but as a problem made intractable by fundamentalism" – a fundamentalism that is impeding the Arab world's progress economically, scientifically and technologically.

Brooks is pessimistic about overcoming the gulf that separates the American and Arab viewpoints: "[T]hey had their narrative and we had ours, and the two passed each other without touching."

Brooks writes: "[T]here was nothing defensive or introspective about the Arab speakers here. In response to Bernard Lewis's question, 'What Went Wrong?' their answer seemed to be: Nothing's wrong with us. What's wrong with you?"

Rather than look inward at their own problems, the Arabs have decided "to blame everything on [Israel and] the villainous Israeli network."

We are reminded here of Fouad Ajami's famous words after the 1991 Gulf War. The well-known American-Lebanese scholar wrote: "There is no way of knowing whether the Arabs would have fared brilliantly had they looked their troubles squarely in the eye. But the Arabs looked away. For there was always that great alibi of modern Arab politics: Israel and the Palestinians" (New York Times Magazine, March 3, 1991).

Brooks' conclusion is bleak: "And so we enter a more intractable phase in the conflict, which will not be a war over land or oil or even democratic institutions, but a war over narratives. The Arabs will nurture this Zionist-centric mythology, which is as self-flattering as it is self-destructive."

The somewhat optimistic view is provided by Shira Herzog in "Peace beckons, but will Israel's leaders respond?" (Globe and Mail, April 11).

Herzog argues that the recent Arab League peace plan has been accepted by a narrow majority of Israelis as a basis for negotiations, but Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, with dismally low public support, is incapable of acting on it.

Herzog does acknowledge – though very briefly – that "as for embarking on a peace agenda, battle-weary Israelis have little trust in Palestinian leaders." And why should they, with the rejectionist Hamas calling the shots in the Palestinian Authority? This is a subject that deserves further exploration.

In the meantime, we're left to choose between Brooks' argument that even moderate Arabs are incapable of the self-examination needed to make peace with Israel and Herzog's qualified optimism that peace is attainable if the Israelis (mainly, it seems) have effective enough leadership to pursue it.

New museum puts B.C. Jewish life on display

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — It was a history that, until recently, had been hidden in books published some 25 years ago and dusty boxes of artifacts that lay in various basements.

But late last month, that history was brought vividly to life when the Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia opened its doors to the public at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver in a space that takes up most of the centre's top floor. (The archives were previously housed in a much smaller space at the JCC.)

"The museum's goal is to preserve and interpret the history of the Jewish experience in B.C., from 1858 to the present day," says curator Ron Ulrich. In the process, it traces the growth of the community from 104 people in 1881 to some 30,000 today.

The museum offers an educational journey that's relevant to both Jews and non-Jews. For the latter, it tries to explain the essence of what it is to be a Jew, focusing on the Jewish life cycle, holidays, beliefs and traditions.

Then, the journey through the Jewish artifacts of B.C. begins, delivering a succinct and well-presented account of the first arrival of Jews in the province and the subsequent waves of immigration.

While many Jewish museums focus on the Holocaust and the devastation it brought to Jews worldwide, Vancouver's Jewish Museum emphasizes that life for Jews in this province has been a happier story.

"Know before Whom you stand" is the translation of the Hebrew inscription on the reader's desk belonging to B'nai Yehuda, the early congregation that later became Schara Tzedeck. This prized artifact in the Jewish Museum and Archives of British Columbia once stood in the first synagogue built in Vancouver in 1911.

Candlesticks, a kiddush cup and spice box belonging to the family of Bill Gruenthal, travelled from Germany to Palestine in 1933 and then to Mission, British Columbia, in 1947.

In the years that the Holocaust was in full force, for example, the museum notes that Mr. and Mrs. Harold Pollock celebrated their marriage in Kerrisdale.

One of the glass displays holds a Uniongram sent by their Aunt Rose Friedman of Montreal with her congratulations on their wedding. Such artifacts documenting Jewish family life in B.C. are peppered throughout the museum, a reminder that the life of this community was quite normal, even as hell broke loose in Europe.

Visitors can expect to see pictures of early Jewish celebrations in Vancouver; a reader's desk and pedestal made for the city's first synagogue, B'nai Yehuda; and the tools of a local mohel.

David Oppenheimer's elegant, wood-carved rocking chair sits in another display, a reminder of Vancouver's second mayor and the man at who preserved the land for Stanley Park, the city's huge urban oasis.

There are several interactive displays that add fun to the museum. In one corner, you can press a button and listen to one of four Jews with a long history in B.C. speak about their lives. There's also an area where you can test your knowledge of Yiddish, and another where younger visitors can do a craft.

The current Jewish community is featured in the museum, too.

Visitors are offered a snapshot of a young family that resides in Vancouver today, describing the reasons behind their decision to keep a kosher home. One display area focuses on "Esn Un Fresn," noting such culinary highlights as the story of Kaplan's Deli, which has served Jewish-style food since 1967, and paying tribute to various culinary mavens in the province.

The museum – which opened about a year before the 150th anniversary of the first arrival of a Jew to British Columbia – was assembled at a cost of $1.3 million, with significant donations from Rabbi Yosef Wosk and the Averbach family.

ישראל אביב 2007

אני, כמוכם, מדבר רבות עם ישראלים כאן על המצב בארץ. והתגובה הכללית היא של דאגה עמוקה מהמצב הקשה. או יש לי חדשות בשבילכם: אם עלה בדעתכם שהשחיתויות היום יימחו, המלחמה של הקיץ האחרון וחוסר הוודאות לגבי העתיד גרמו לאחידה קשה בישראל- אתם טועים בגדול. רק חזרתי אתמול ואיני זוכר את ישראל כל כך אופטימית כמו שמצאתי אותה עכשיו:
אנשים מאמינים שמצבם האישי ומצב הדברים הכללי הוא טוב.
בראש ובראשונה- ישראל ממשיכה להיות נס כלכלי, והדבר התברר בחוקה כאשר המלחמה בצפון לא השפיעה על הבורסה והתעסוקה כהוא זה. לאחרונה בִּקר בישראל נשיא בנק CIBC הקנדי, והוא אמר לכתבים כלכליים שלקהילה הכלכלית ממש לא אכפת מהפוליטיקה הפנימית בישראל, אלא דווקא מצב התעסוקה, הריבית, התוצר הגולמי לנפש- וכל אלה נמצאים במצב מצויין ואופטימי.
וברמה יותר אישית- סיפר לי בעל מפעל שהוא לא זוכר תקופה כל כך טובה של מחסור תשלומים- כאשר אין כמעט צ'קים שחוזרים, כי אנשים אתם נמצאים בחובות בלתי מבוקרים.
בשיחות קצת יותר עמוקות ניסיתי להבין איך זה שכל כך טוב אם יש כל כך הרבה קלקולים פוליטיים- רבים מתברר מהממשלה, כולל העומד בראשה, נמצאים בחקירות פלילית. עושה רושם שהישראלי הטיפוסי אינו מוכן להאמין כיום לשום פוליטיקאי, ומפריד בין מצב הממשל למצבו האישי.
שאלתי אנשים: אם המצב הכלכלי כל כך טוב- חוקה היא שהממשל מקבל גם הרבה החלטות נכונות...ללא הצלחה- בישראל לא מוכנים לפרגן כיום לפוליטיקאים כהוא זה. אבל שישאר ביניכם.

נדידת העגורים

והינה ישראל הִנָּפָה במיטבה: מידי שנה בפסח עורכים מסיבת פרידה לעגורים בשיר, זמר ויין, כמו שגם נהוג במקומות שונים בצפון אירופה. איזה רעיון מדליק ומחמם לב. בכלל- היחס של הישראלי לטבע שלו מחמם את הלב- אלפי טילים, פסטיבלים, צעדות. שווה בנסיעתכם הבאה לברר מראש, או כשאתם שם, ולהצטרף.

האינציקלופדיה הרפואית הישראלית

Obituary

Filmmaker Harry Rasky was a 'poet with a camera'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Known for his award-winning cinematic portraits of such iconic artists as Marc Chagall, Tennessee Williams, Leonard Cohen, Yousuf Karsh and Arthur Miller, Toronto-based documentary filmmaker Harry Rasky has died in Toronto at age 78.

A co-founder of the news-documentary department of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Rasky made more than 50 feature documentaries and hundreds of TV documentaries over a career that spanned half a century and began with a job as reporter for the Northern Daily News in Kirkland Lake, Ont.

Harry Rasky

In addition to two Oscar nominations, his films brought him a bouquet of Emmy, Genie, Peabody, and other awards and honours – so many that the Denver International Film Festival once called him "the world's most acclaimed non-fiction filmmaker."

Rasky remained good friends with many of the subjects of his films, several of whom pronounced that he had captured their genuine selves on celluloid. As he explained it, part of the artistic process for him involved an intense identification with each personality that he profiled.

"Somehow my own life became more and more reflected in the subject material" of his films, he wrote in Nobody Swings on Sunday, a 1980 autobiography. In The Three Harrys, a second memoir published in 1999, he added, "All the lives I have written about [or explored on film] are mine, as mine is theirs."

His 1977 film Homage to Chagall: The Colours of Love, an intimate portrait of the legendary artist that highlighted his magnificent art and his devotion to his Jewish heritage, received international acclaim and an invitation to Rasky to attend a screening of the film at the Moscow Film Festival.

In Moscow, the film received "a stunning standing ovation that went on for some minutes," he recalled. "I felt in a way that my work had been finally, really understood."

Many Soviet Jews who saw the film were so touched by its open portrayal of Chagall's attachment to Judaism that they wept, Rasky recalled. Chagall, too, was enthralled by the film, which he said "will help me live longer."

Although Rasky had travelled to some 50 countries, he regarded that trip to Russia as a sort of homecoming.

> 'Somehow my own life became more and more reflected in the subject material'

The Pobberegesky family had come from Desha, a village near Kiev, and had crossed the Atlantic on a steamship passage arranged by the well-known Dworkin Agency of Toronto: the name was shortened to Rasky soon after landing. Harry (Elchanan), one of five sons and three daughters of Leib and Pearl Rasky, was born in Toronto in 1928. The family lived on St. Clair Avenue West.

Back in the '30s, his father, Leib Rasky, sang in the small synagogue on MacKay Street and worked as a shoichet, purchasing live chickens in Kensington market for kosher slaughter and resale. As the children grew up, they routinely delivered chickens by wagon and bicycle.

"The community was mostly English and Irish, enormously Protestant, enormously proud and enormously prejudiced," Rasky recalled in Nobody Swings on Sunday, an autobiographical documentary (2003) that focused on his childhood neighbourhood and the straitlaced and often anti-Semitic society of prewar Toronto.

After graduating from Oakwood Collegiate and the University of Toronto, he left his old neighbourhood for good, and years later moved with his family into what he would call "the ultra-WASP bastion of Rosedale." But in his heart he never left the colourful streets of his childhood nor his Jewish heritage.

He returned often to Jewish subjects and themes in films like The Spies Who Never Were (1982), which told the story of Jewish refugees interned in Canada during wartime, and To Mend the World (1987), which presented a view of the Holocaust based on the work of artists such as Gershon Iskowitz.

Song of Leonard Cohen (1981) was applauded for capturing the remarkable rapport between Montreal poets Leonard Cohen and Irving Layton; while The Man Who Hid Anne Frank (1980) focused on Victor Kugler, and Prophecy (1994) spotlighted Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum, wartime chaplain on the River Kwai.

Described as a "poet with a camera," Rasky profiled many artistic personalities besides Chagall. They include Mikhail Baryshnikov, Edgar Degas, Raymond Massey, Henry Moore, Yousuf Karsh, William Hutt and Amedeo Modigliani.

His filmography also includes "literary" appreciations of George Bernard Shaw, Stephen Leacock, Tennessee Williams, Arthur Miller, Northrop Frye and Robertson Davies. His 1995 documentary The War Against the Indians: The Dispossessed, was one of several titles that probed into history.

"He was one of the two or three most important documentary filmmakers Canada ever produced," said Mark Starowicz, head of CBC-TV's documentary programming unit.

Rasky died April 9, leaving wife Arlene and children Holly and Adam.

Jewish theatre troupe gathers in Vienna

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the first time in its 20-year history, the Association for Jewish Theatre (AJT) held its annual conference outside North America. The venue this year was Vienna.

The annual conference, which ran from March 18 to 26, is hosted each year in a different city by one of its member theatres, explained Kayla Gordon, the AJT's executive director for the past three years.

Founded in 1987, the AJT is dedicated to the development and production of plays that are relevant to Jewish life and values. Gordon became involved with the AJT through her association with the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre, where she was artistic director for 11 years until about 18 months ago. Gordon served as president of the AJT for three years before assuming the role of executive director.

First conference held outside North America

"We chose Vienna this year. We felt that it was important to support Warren Rosenzweig in his effort to revive Jewish theatre and keep it alive in Austria," Gordon said.

Rosenzweig, a New York-born playwright, founded the Jewish Theatre of Vienna in 1999. It was the first professional theatre of its kind to open in Austria, and one of the first in Europe, in more than 60 years.

An additional reason for the AJT choosing Vienna this year was to lend its weight to Rosenzweig's campaign to relocate his company to the Nestroyhof, a building that once housed Vienna's principal Jewish theatre, which was disbanded in 1940.

The initiative to restore the building has the support of many prominent Austrians, including the archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Christoph Schonborn; Nobel Prize laureate playwright and novelist Elfriede Jelinek; and Georg Springer, Austria's director of federal theatres.

Gordon said she was pleasantly surprised by the number of people who attended the conference, which was held in conjunction with the International Jewish Theatre Festival.

"We were expecting maybe 30 to 40 members to attend the conference in Vienna," she says. "In fact, we had about 100 people from six continents. There were Jewish theatre companies and artists from North America, Israel, the European Union, Russia, Africa and Brazil. It was amazing."

Conference participants – playwrights, producers, performers and others – discussed numerous issues relating to Jewish theatre in meetings and workshops and heard from different speakers.

As well, a dozen playwrights (including Sharon Feder of Vancouver) read from their new plays, and there were tours of sites of Jewish interest in Vienna.

"It was invigorating and exhausting," Gordon said.

In addition to her duties with the AJT, Gordon teaches musical theatre and acting at the University of Winnipeg. She has produced some theatre work for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and has directed plays in Detroit and Phoenix.

She has also formed a new theatre company, called Winnipeg Studio Theatre, which has two projects currently on the go. One is a new musical that is in development.

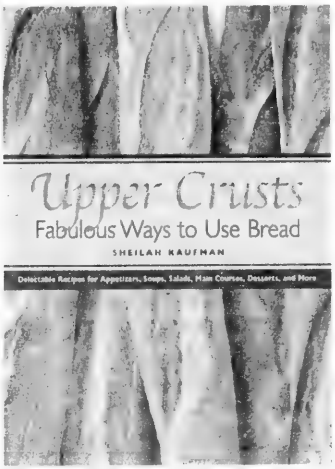
"Sharon Bajer is writing the script with original music by Sally Fingerett, a composer and musician from the States that I met through my AJT connections," Gordon said. "It's called Hersteria and we are planning a workshop performance in the early fall."

She also hopes to direct some Winnipeg Jewish Theatre productions in the future.

Creative culinary delights made with bread

By NORENE GILLETZ

As I write this article, it is Passover and I am desperately craving bread. At the top of my pile of cookbooks waiting to be reviewed is a copy of Upper Crusts: Fabulous Ways to Use Bread, by popular cookbook author and cooking teacher Sheilah Kaufman, of Potomac, Md. Temptation, temptation. I can hardly wait to start cooking from this wonderful cookbook, as I'm fed up with matzah and its many derivatives.



Upper Crusts
Fabulous Ways to Use Bread
SHEILAH KAUFMAN
Delectable Recipes for Appetizers, Soups, Salads, Main Courses, Desserts, and More

Upper Crusts is packed with scrumptious, easy-to-prepare recipes that use bread as an ingredient in everything from appetizers to desserts and all courses in between. You'll find timeless classics and comfort foods such as bread pudding and French toast – with daring new spins on these perennial crowd pleasers – as well as innovative entrees, soups, appetizers, salads and desserts, all made with bread, including many with an international flair.

Also featured are favourite bread recipes from nationally renowned chefs such as Patrick O'Connell of the Inn at Little Washington, Michel Richard of Washington D.C.'s Citronelle, Henry Haller of White House fame, and Aulie Bunyaratapha of Bangkok Joe's, to name a few.

Dust off your hands and put the flour away—this is not a bread-baking book. Most of these delectable recipes:

- use store-bought bread to create quick and delicious dishes for everyday dining or special occasions;
- can be assembled in less than 30 minutes;
- can be made ahead and frozen, a necessity for today's busy cooks;
- feature creative ways to use leftover and fresh bread;
- provide dozens of cooking tips, plus fun tidbits on the history of the world's "staff of life."

For more information about Sheilah Kaufman and her cookbooks, visit her website at www.cookingwithsheilah.com. The author of 24 cookbooks, Kaufman teaches cooking classes all over the United States and Canada. To order your copy of Upper Crusts, contact Kathleen Hughes at Capital Books, 703-661-1511, and mention code UC4157 for a 25 per cent discount.

If you were taught never to throw out bread, this book is for you. Here are some terrific dishes from Upper Crusts that you can make for your next brunch. Get ready to accept the compliments – there will be many. (Now if I can just convince Sheilah to write a cookbook on how to use up all the leftover matzah that I have from Passover…)

BAGEL AND CHEESE STRATA

Another quick and easy winner that is prepared the day or night before serving, this fabulous recipe is courtesy of Vegetarian Times magazine (April 2004). Besides being a fabulous brunch dish, the strata can be made lower in fat by using egg substitutes.

canola spray for greasing
7 large eggs (or 1¾ cups egg substitutes)
¼ tsp. salt
2 cups milk
½ tsp. paprika
freshly ground pepper
4 plain bagels, halved, cut into bite-size cubes
6 oz. Monterey Jack cheese, grated or Jack with pepper
6 oz. cheddar cheese, grated

Lightly grease a 2-quart baking dish. Beat together eggs, salt, milk, paprika and pepper in a mixing bowl. Set aside.

Place half of bagel cubes in the baking dish.

In a medium size bowl, mix the grated cheeses together. Sprinkle half of the cheese mixture on top of bagel cubes. Top with remaining bagel cubes and remaining cheese.

Carefully spoon the egg mixture over bagel-cheese layers, poking holes in the bagels with a fork or knife to ensure that egg mixture seeps in evenly. Cover dish with aluminum foil and refrigerate overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Bake strata for 1 hour, or until top is golden brown. Remove from oven and serve hot. Serves 6 to 8.

CHOCOLATE CHERRY CROISSANT BREAD PUDDING

What combination could be better than chocolate and cherries! This is a quick, easy and elegant dessert.

1 tsp. butter
3 stale croissants
⅓ cup semisweet chocolate chips
⅓ cup dried cherries
⅓ cup sugar
1 cup cream
2 large eggs
1 tbsp. cassis (or vanilla)

Generously butter a 9x9-inch baking dish. Cut croissants into ½-inch pieces (as best you can) and scatter cubes, chips and cherries into prepared baking dish.

In a large bowl whisk together sugar, cream, eggs and cassis until sugar dissolves. Pour sugar-cream mixture through a sieve into the prepared baking dish. Gently push down cubes so they absorb the egg mixture. Cover and refrigerate 30 minutes. (If in a rush, skip chilling. Instead, pour only half of egg mixture in, push down to absorb; wait five minutes before pouring on some more but not all, leaving tops of cubes just above liquid line.)

Preheat oven to 350. Bake for 40 minutes or until centre is puffy and golden. Serve hot. Serves 6.

Culture at Guelph comes alive at fashion show

By STEPHEN SWEET
Special to The CJN

The Jewish Students Organization of the University of Guelph recently hosted Fashion for Passion at the Palace nightclub in downtown Guelph.

More than 20 university students modelled some of the latest fashions from Israeli and local designers at the March 28 event.

Local rapping duo Aspektz got the crowd going as they provided an exciting opening. The show also included a performance by a local dance troupe and Aspektz closed the event.

Unlike many mainstream fashion shows, the models and MCs weren't afraid to smile and even interact with the crowd while onstage, creating an engaging performance.

The show was followed by an after party in the same nightclub complex.

More than 40 people, both students and volunteers from outside of the school, lent a hand at this event.

"It was incredible," said Elise Kayfetz, the Hillel director for southwestern Ontario campuses. "I'm extremely proud of my students from all four schools [University of Guelph, University of Waterloo, Wilfrid Laurier University and Brock University]."

Proceeds from Guelph's Fashion for Passion will support Save A Child's Heart, a charity providing pediatric heart surgery for children in the developing world, and the Red Cross Sudan Crisis Fund.

"As Jews we are responsible to help out in Sudan right now, especially knowing first hand what it is like to undergo a genocide," JSO president and Fashion for Passion co-chair Megan Wexler said. "This fashion show is an effort to do something on a larger scale for such worthy causes.

"It's also an opportunity to give the people of Guelph a chance to experience a taste of Israeli culture, since we are advertising these up-and-coming designers from the Holy Land."

With such worthy causes being supported for this event, it wasn't too difficult to get a lot people to help out. From designers and DJ's to students at the university, dozens of people gave their time to this event. Fashion for Passion has been held at various universities across Canada.

"This event has shown people that even though we don't have the largest Jewish community at this university, we are capable of large-scale programs that are educational and fun at the same time," said Wexler.

Correction

As the result of an editing error, the article "New York U arts building dedicated" (CJN, April 5) contained incorrect information both in the story and in the headline. It should have said that a large classroom in the new Accolade East Building at York University was dedicated as the Sterling Beckwith Studio. We regret any inconvenience that this has caused to those involved.

McGill students can now opt out of funding pro-Palestinian group

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish students at McGill University who object to part of their students fees going to an organization that they view as anti-Israel have won a concession.

Every semester every McGill undergraduate must contribute $3 to the Quebec Public Interest Research Group (QPIRG), a semi-autonomous, student-directed organization involved in social-action and environmental issues.

One of the groups it works with is the International Solidarity Movement, which according to its website is committed to resisting what it calls Israel's "overwhelming military occupation force" of Palestinian land through direct, but non-violent, action.

As a result of pressure from Hillel Montreal and other student groups, students will be able to opt out of paying that $3 online as of next September.

Students currently have the right to a refund of the $3, but they have to go to QPIRG's off-campus office each semester to receive a cheque, said Alex Halpern, vice-president (external) of Hillel Montreal.

Halpern said opting out online will be much easier than making a trip every semester to the QPIRG office and then having to cash a cheque.

When students opt out via computer, the $3 will be credited to their account.

There has been a QPIRG chapter at McGill since 1988. Every three years QPIRG's funding comes up for renewal.

During this month's elections for the Students Society of McGill University, the official representative body of undergraduates, the issue of whether to continue collecting money from students was put to a referendum. The initiative passed.

There are also QPIRG chapters at Concordia University and the Université du Québec à Montréal.

CJC, institutions have worked closely with police

Bulphred and Ibragimov face a total of nine counts each, including the kidnapping conspiracy, uttering threats of death, and property damage. They were arrested April 12, pled not guilty at a brief appearance in Quebec court the following day and were held in custody.

La Presse reported that Bulphred is of Algerian origin and Ibragimov is from Central Asia, and that they have been Canadian citizens for about 10 years. Bulphred is a student in a trade school and was sentenced to 30 days in jail in 2005 for robbery. Ibragimov works in a grocery store. Both live in Montreal's east end.

"We are relieved that it appears that they acted as individuals and not as members of an organized group," said Jeffrey Boro, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region. "We had every confidence that the perpetrators of these hate-motivated attacks would be caught and charged accordingly."

He said CJC and the targeted institutions have worked closely with the police throughout the investigation. "We are pleased to say that the police demonstrated to our community from the outset that the incidents were being treated very seriously. We are thankful to the police for all their efforts in these matters."

B'nai Brith Canada also commended the police.

"The repeated targeting of Jewish community property speaks to the undeniable fact that the safety of the entire Jewish community was put at risk by these dangerous acts of hate and violence," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights and co-chair of the Montreal Jewish Community Security Co-ordinating Committee.

A video surveillance camera caught a hooded man throwing a Molotov cocktail into the entrance of the chassidic school, causing a fire that was quickly contained. A group of students had vacated the school about a half-hour earlier after celebrating the conclusion of Shabbat.

In the Y attack, an explosive device consisting of two small propane canisters was ignited on the sidewalk in front of the entrance, but caused no damage. The building was empty except for cleaning staff, but a Russian-Jewish group had left only about an hour earlier after holding a Passover seder.

"The arrests are a clear indication that our society will not tolerate this kind of violent, racist behaviour," Boro also said. "We cannot concede even the smallest degree of success to the destructive ambitions of those who seek to promote hatred and contempt for others."

Police have asked anyone who may have any information related to the charges against Bulphred and Ibragimov to phone, in complete confidentiality, 514-393-1133.

Sleiman El-Merhebi, who is also Muslim, was convicted and sentenced to 40 months for the April 2004 firebombing of the St. Laurent United Talmud Torahs, which destroyed the library. The trial of his mother Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, who is charged with being an accessory after the fact in that arson, is scheduled to begin June 14.

Jewish public health-care institutions will be meeting

The people who are complaining have said that they don't understand how what they eat has anything to do with the practise of Jewish dietary laws.

Both the JGH and JRH are under the supervision of mashgichim from Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir.

Health Minister Philippe Couillard asked that the JRH undertake the review, and hospital officials spent more than four hours last Thursday in discussions with the Regional Health and Social Services Agency for Laval about what can be done.

JRH executive director Andre Ibghy stated afterward that the hospital's administration will shortly propose to the board of directors "a process by which solutions may be quickly found to satisfy patients and personnel. The [agency] will be updated relative to this process."

In an interview, Ibghy did not venture to suggest what modifications might be made. He said the JRH, which was founded 50 years ago, has not altered its kashrut practices and had previously received no complaints. He said the doctor who complained did so directly to the media.

However, Ibghy said the JRH recognizes that there is dissatisfaction among some patients and staff, among whom only 15 to 20 per cent are Jewish, about the current dietary practices.

"We will attempt to find an equilibrium between our mandate to offer an environment that respects Jewish laws and customs and the expectations of a changing clientele."

He noted that the JRH began as a small convalescent home whose patients were almost entirely Jewish, and has grown today into a 132-bed institution serving diverse patients, many of whom spend weeks or months there.

Ibghy stressed that the agency is "not forcing our hand. They're not imposing a solution on us… but there definitely is an obligation to review our dietary practices and keep it informed." He said it will be ultimately up to the board to decide what to do, but he said ceasing to be kosher is not a likely option.

At the JGH, spokesperson Glenn Nashen said the hospital decided to compensate the plaintiffs rather than go through the time and expense of a court trial. The settlement, which the JGH described as "amicable," did not include an admission of wrongdoing or an apology. The money comes from the auxiliary, a volunteer group that raises funds and provides services to patients.

In a statement, the JGH reiterated that its Cafe de l'Atrium is exclusively reserved for the consumption of food bought on the premises, and no outside food, kosher or not, is allowed to be eaten there.

Atrium manager Gregory Ginzburg testified at the commission hearings that he indicated to the two plaintiffs that there was a lounge in another hospital wing where they could eat, a claim that was disputed by them.

Last month, the JGH designated a section for eating any food, next to the Atrium, that is open to employees, patients and visitors. The Pavilion A lounge, the main non-kosher eating area, has also been enlarged and offers non-kosher vending machines.

JGH executive director Henri Elbaz stated that, over the years, "numerous" other areas where any food can be brought in have been added. Two-thirds of patients at the 637-bed JGH, which opened in 1934, are not Jewish.

Unlike the JRH, the JGH allows non-kosher food to be eaten in patients' rooms, as long as they do not use hospital plates or utensils.

"The JGH is an institution that is a part of our public health network," Elbaz stated. "[It] is attentive to the needs of its patients, its employees and its visitors, continually seeking solutions to improve the quality of care people receive and to accommodate them as best as possible…

"Its mission is to provide the highest possible quality of care to all patients. We prove on a daily basis that it is possible to respond to the needs of all our patients, regardless of their religious, linguistic or cultural backgrounds. We have the firm intention of continuing to pursue this policy of openness and respect for human rights for the benefit of all Montrealers and Quebecers."

All six of Montreal's Jewish public health-care institutions will be meeting in the coming days to discuss kashrut and the implications of the JGH's and JRH's recent experiences, said Federation CJA chief operating officer Bram Freedman. The others are the long-term care Jewish Eldercare Centre and Maimonides Geriatric Centre, the great majority of whose patients are Jewish; the mixed intermediate- and long-term and palliative care Mount Sinai Hospital, which also has a large Jewish clientele; and Miriam Home and Services, which serves a large number of non-Jews.

"Obviously, all Jewish public establishments are concerned about this issue," Freedman said.

He said, while practices needed to be examined, the community would never accept these institutions ceasing to be kosher.

Rabbi Saul Emanuel, the Vaad's executive-director, said the JRH had not yet approached him about making any changes to its dietary practices.

Generally speaking, he said, "it is intrinsically not a problem" if non-kosher food is eaten in a kosher institution if it does not come into contact with kosher food or kosher plates and utensils.

He acknowledges that it would be hard to enforce kashrut in patient rooms in a large place.

"We have to see exactly what the complaints are and what the hospital intends to do and if it's practical. It's really an open question at this early stage," he said.

Canadian Jewish Congress vice-president Joseph Gabay said the issue has to be seen in light of the ongoing and intense debate in Quebec over reasonable accommodation of the practices of religious minorities.

Gabay agrees Jewish institutions must look at how their practices affect the public. Nevertheless, he said he finds it objectionable that a doctor would go the media with a complaint about kashrut rather than try to solve it with the hospital.

"The hospital has been doing the same thing for 50 years and nobody complained," Gabay said.

Toronto loses its champion of the underdog

Gordy Wolfe was one of Canada's true community leaders

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Described among other things as a quietly confident leader, a loyal friend and a generous mentor, Toronto's Gordon Wolfe, z"l, who passed away earlier this month at age 70, was many things to many people. But no matter how his countless friends and co-workers choose to remember him, one thing is apparent; Wolfe loved people and they loved him back.

One of Toronto's – in fact, one of Canada's – true community leaders.

Gordy & Linda Wolfe with the mishpacha.

Wolfe, husband of Linda, a father of three and a grandfather of triplets, raised the bar to lofty heights when it came to that leadership and to social responsibility. As executive director of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) – a UJA Federation partner agency - from 1981 to 2003, Wolfe championed the most vulnerable members of the Jewish community and beyond. He worked tirelessly to better the lot of people living in poverty, abused and neglected children, and victims of domestic violence. As the consummate volunteer, he offered his great wealth of experience and knowledge, and his heart, to causes and projects large and small.

"Gordy's loss is felt widely and deeply," said Richard Cummings, executive director, JF&CS. "To have known Gordy is to have been enriched, inspired and challenged to do your part, and to do it well. Gordy was at once a powerful and humble man. He championed many causes and touched many hearts. His commitment to being there for the vulnerable in our community reflects the best essence of Jewish values, of human values. Gordy's friendship, his depth, his humour, his leadership, indeed his soaring example, will be held forever dear in many hearts. We will miss him so much."

Gordy Wolfe with Dr. Anne Golden, former president & CEO of United Way of Greater Toronto in 2003.

Special leadership abilities

"Few people are able to inspire both love and respect - it's a tough combination – but Gordy was able to do just that," said Dr. Anne Golden, who first met the young Wolfe at Camp White Pine, and later, worked with Gordy during her tenure as president of The United Way. "Even back then, as a young man at camp, you could see that Gordy had special leadership abilities. He was always very authoritative, but always in a quiet, confident manner where he never put people down; he only lifted them up. He was someone you would turn to when you needed someone to do the right thing for the right reason. His death is a great loss to all of us."

Summer camp was a lifelong passion of Wolfe's who, along with Linda, spent 10 years as co-owners of Camp Wabikon. Linda also worked at White Pine at the same time as Gordy, as a section head. They didn't meet there, but that's where their relationship flourished.

"In fact, there's still a cabin at the camp that was called Gordy's Cabin, but now it's being changed to Gordy and Linda's Cabin; they were always a great team," said Camp White Pine founder and director, Joe Kronick, who has been a close friend of Wolfe for decades. "Gordy was such a well organized, and capable man who, more than anything else, loved his family so much. He loved baby-sitting and going to all of the kids' hockey games. At the same time, he called a spade a spade, but always with a sense of humour. He meant so much to so many people."

Phillip Epstein, Q.C. a friend of Wolfe since they met at Camp White Pine 45 years ago, who succeeded him as youth director at Holy Blossom, remembers his buddy as a "control freak", but only in the best sense of the phrase.

Linda & Gordy Wolfe enjoy the 2006 renaming ceremony of the downtown branch of JF&CS now called The Gordon S. Wolfe Branch.

Looking out for the underdog

"He'd probably want to plan his funeral if he could; he'd want to direct the whole thing," said Epstein with obvious affection. "Gordy always looked out for the underdog, in his career and also in his personal life. He was also an avid Blue Jay fan, who treasured his first-row tickets on the third base line. It's ironic, but despite Gordy's complete lack of athletic ability, one of his favourite photos is of him making a great catch on a foul ball."

"Gordy Wolfe was a wonderful person with a heart as big as the world," said Rabbi Ronald Weiss, director of chaplaincy services, JF&CS. "He was a wonderful administrator who understood how agencies worked and how business should get done. One of his true gifts was in how he got people who worked for him to feel like they were working with him. He was a compassionate, loyal friend to many who always led with his heart."

Gordy Wolfe flanked by Richard Cummings, executive director, JF&CS and Janis Roth, executive director of JIAS Toronto.

Since his retirement from JF&CS, Wolfe worked as a consultant for UJA Federation on a number of initiatives including the redevelopment of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre downtown as part of the Tomorrow Campaign, and building a model for shared services by UJA Federation and its agencies.

In September 2006, the downtown branch of JF&CS - housed in the Nadal JCC - was officially renamed The Gordon S. Wolfe Branch.

"I had heard a great deal about Gordy and his outstanding reputation in the community for many years, before I had the opportunity to work with him on a committee for the redevelopment of the Nadal JCC," said UJA Federation chair David Engel. "He was a true partner to work with; always there to generously share his experience and his knowledge while maintaining his empathy for others. As I look back upon the highlights of my term as chair of the Federation, one of them will be my friendship with Gordy."

Born and raised in downtown Toronto, Wolfe received his Master of Social Work from the University of Toronto in 1961. Throughout his career, he was committed to bettering life in the Greater Toronto Area, particularly, but not exclusively, for Jewish Torontonians. From running the Jewish Family & Child Service trailer that reached out to young hippies in 1960s Yorkville, to his years as executive director of Huntley Youth Services, to the redevelopment of the Nadal JCC in recent years, he left an indelible mark on Toronto.

"Gordy Wolfe always represented to me what a true communal professional can be," said UJA Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "He was an inspiration to several generations of communal leaders - both lay and professional - and he inspired us all to do more and be more. Many people don't know that Gordy stepped into the brink on behalf of the community in support of our JCCs when they needed him most. At the request of UJA Federation, he was seconded to manage those centres over the years and piloted them through some very stormy seas. It was Gordy who helped create the Bathurst JCC and it was Gordy who oversaw the renaissance of the now incredibly successful Nadal JCC. And it was Gordy who worked with us to develop the working plans for the new Schwartz Reisman Centre at the Lebovic Campus and the new Prosserman JCC at Central Square. As a result, long past his official retirement, future generations will continue to benefit from his incredible vision and his profound leadership. I know I certainly will think of Gordy every time I enter those new centres and every day that I ride the elevator in the Lipa Green Building."

Unwavering pursuit of justice

"I was honoured to work with Gordy during his last four years at JF&CS," said Karen Paikin, the agency's manager of communications. "Gordy always demanded — and received — nothing short of our personal best. I was inspired by his unwavering pursuit of justice and his advocacy for the underdog, and always amazed at how many lives he touched. Our community has lost a man who truly made a difference."

"I've know Gordy for most of my life – almost 50 years," said Mark S. Anshan, UJA Federation's general counsel and director of public affairs. Anshan is a fellow member of Holy Blossom Temple where Wolfe worked as a youth program supervisor, and where he became a board member and a one-time president. "As a student at Holy Blossom, he was my youth advisor and his wife, Linda was my teacher," adds Anshan. "He was a generous mentor in teaching me to be a youth leader from a young age. His caring, sensitivity, sense of humour and commitment to the Jewish community served as a role model for all of us who knew him well."

"Gordy was one of the finest people I had the privilege to know," said Janis Roth, executive director, JIAS Toronto. "He was equal parts reserved and a giant presence, leader and learner, compelling influential speaker and wonderful listener, committed to community but never losing sight of the individual. He was first a colleague and then a friend. We connected quickly when I moved here and I will miss him terribly."

"Gordy was much more than a boss, he was also a mentor, confidante and friend; there was really no one else quite like him," said Wendy Wolfman who worked with Gordy for 17 years at JF&CS.

If man's true wealth is, as the old adage suggests, measured by the number of his friends, then it's obvious that Gordy Wolfe leaves this world a very rich man, and we are all that much poorer for his loss.

Gordy & Linda share a smile with grandchildren Amanda, Samantha and Jake.

Olmert eyes the big picture

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Is Ehud Olmert yielding on the Saudi proposal for Israeli-Arab peace?

That was the question Israel's pundits were asking Sunday as the prime minister held another round of talks with the Palestinians while signalling that he wanted to engage in big-picture diplomacy with the Arab League.

"Israel continues to make every effort to make the most of the chance for finding a comprehensive solution to the conflict between us and the Palestinians," Olmert told his cabinet before hosting Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas over lunch in Jerusalem. "We are willing to hold a dialogue with any grouping of Arab states about their ideas."

Olmert aides said he was referring to an Arab League working group set up to promote the Saudi proposal for comprehensive Israeli-Arab peace.

Jerusalem has cautiously welcomed the plan, first proposed in 2002 and reissued in Riyadh last month, while voicing misgivings about its call for a full Israeli withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Six Day War and an agreed-upon solution to the Palestinian refugee problem.

But Israeli sources say that Olmert, facing continued diplomatic deadlock with the dominant Palestinian faction Hamas and an ascendant nuclear threat from Iran, is coming around to the idea of dealing directly with moderate Arab regimes.

While his government lacks the power to enact major concessions, Olmert could well be hoping to edge toward a peace deal along the lines of the Saudi proposal that would decisively marginalize Hamas.

"Olmert would very much like to say a qualified yes to the Arab initiative at present," wrote Ma'ariv's political commentator, Ben Caspit. "Therefore, he is trying to create a delayed, challenged, censored agenda and to set this process in motion without calling things by their true name.

"Even if the chances of it ever maturing into something genuine are not high, that chance exists. And that too is something."

The Arab League may take the idea of direct contacts with Israel a step further when its foreign ministers convene Wednesday in Cairo. But Ahmed Aboul Gheit of Egypt dismissed the idea that such a channel of communication could replace direct talks between Israel and its declared enemies.

"These working groups are not mandated to negotiate, and I do not imagine that they will negotiate on behalf of anyone, whether the Palestinians, Syria or Lebanon," Aboul Gheit told reporters Saturday.

Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres was similarly circumspect, noting that direct diplomacy with the Arab League would be difficult, as it does not formally recognize the Jewish state.

"We will meet to create a common ground in order to reach an agreement," Peres told Israel Radio. "At this stage, I think all sides are looking for the right channels that will allow us to meet and tackle issues that are still disputed."

Caspit raised another possibility for Olmert's sudden interest in a dramatic breakthrough with the Arab world – a looming interim report by the Israeli commission of inquiry into his handling of last year's Lebanon war.

"Cynics perceive a transparent political initiative that is bereft of any point, lacking in all energy and which has a single goal: to precede the Winograd committee's interim report with some sort of political momentum that will stop the wave of publications, investigations and reports that are threatening to drown the prime minister," Caspit wrote.

Whatever the truth, Olmert remains saddled with a U.S. request for regular talks with Abbas – no matter what their peacemaking efficacy.

Like Olmert, Abbas is weak domestically, as Hamas holds sway over the Palestinian Authority government and has robust militias to oppose the armed forces of the moderate Fatah faction.

Both Israel and the Palestinians made clear that Sunday's summit, the first of a series of twice-monthly meetings requested by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, was a matter of co-ordinating matters of immediate concern to their peoples rather than a final-status deal.

Aides said Olmert pressed Abbas to arrange the release of Gilad Shalit, an Israeli soldier held hostage in the Gaza Strip, and halt Palestinian fire from Gaza into Israel.

Israel undertook in turn to expand the opening hours of Gaza border crossings in a bid to relieve Palestinian poverty.

While Olmert told his cabinet that the talks would deliberately avoid the "core issues" of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, he still spoke positively of his hopes to establish a Palestinian state alongside Israel.

The next Olmert-Abbas meeting could be held in the West Bank city of Jericho, both sides said.

Britain vows to act against increased anti-Semitism

By JONNY PAUL
JTA

LONDON — Responding to a parliamentary inquiry into the rising tide of anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom, the British government made 35 recommendations to combat what one official called "the absolute scourge of our society."

The recommendations include: improving the recording and reporting of anti-Semitic incidents, reviewing and strengthening the prosecution process, accelerating efforts to confront extremist groups that spread hate, promoting community cohesion through education about different faiths, and trying to prevent racial or religious intolerance on university campuses.

A report in February published by the Community Security Trust, which represents the Jewish community on matters of anti-Semitism, terrorism, policing and security, showed anti-Semitic incidents in the United Kingdom at record levels since documentation began in 1984.

Phil Woolas, minister for local government, strongly condemned the increase in the number of incidents and promised to step up action to eradicate anti-Semitism.

"We will not tolerate racially motivated crime of any kind," he said. "We share the concerns of Jewish communities and fully support the police and prosecuting authorities in taking a tough line to stamp out anti-Semitism."

Woolas said the government recognizes that anti-Semitism "has not been taken as seriously as other hate crimes in our society, and that is not acceptable. Whether anti-Semitism is coming from the far left, far right or Islamic extremists, it must be understood for what it is and condemned and dealt with promptly and effectively through the law," he said.

In its response to the All-Party Parliamentary Inquiry into Anti-Semitism, which was released last September, the British government recommended that law enforcement authorities investigate why there were so few prosecutions for racial hatred, and review cases to see what lessons could be learned.

The inquiry had recognized that violence, desecration of property and intimidation toward Jews was on the rise. It cited anti-Semitism on the Internet, among a minority of Islamic extremists, on campus among far right and far left groups, and in the media. Woolas said rhetoric on university campuses "with an undercurrent of hate and racism" is especially worrisome.

"There is increasing evidence of activities well beyond freedom of speech or normal youthful behaviour that cross the line into anti-Semitism," he said, "and it is not acceptable for Jewish students to be attacked in this way, and it is not acceptable for people to incite hatred in this way among students."

One measure suggested to tackle this problem was for the government's hate crime task force to look at the matter with urgency. Mitch Simmons, an official with the Union of Jewish Students, said the response "emphasizes the duty of universities to protect Jewish students, although we remain concerned at the lack of clarity regarding the statutory obligations of student unions under the Race Relations Act.

"Importantly, the response also acknowledges inconsistency in tackling anti-Semitism on campus, and we look forward to working with the government and universities to produce best-practice guidelines, so that students can feel safe and secure."

Secretary of State Ruth Kelly, who championed the report in government, said anti-Semitism is an issue for society.

Speaking to the Jewish community, she said, "I hope you feel that Britain is at the forefront of moves to combat what is the absolute scourge of our society."

Labour MP Dennis MacShane, chair of the parliamentary inquiry, said anti-Semitism is being accepted in some parts of British society instead of being condemned. He said he accepts the government's views that a minority of Islamic extremists incite hatred against Jews.

"We were in denial for too many years about the whole problem of 'Londonistan,'" he said.

One recommendation would have Jewish and Muslim communities and interfaith groups promote joint leadership programs for young Jews and Muslims. The government said it would provide more funding for projects that encourage respect and understanding among communities.

MacShane said the report "underlines the extent to which all of Parliament accepts that anti-Semitism has returned as an evil ideology in British politics."

He noted the opposition in Parliament, across all parties, to the idea of boycotting Israeli academic institutions. Two organizations of British university educators made such calls in 2005 and 2006, but no boycotts have taken place.

"We oppose any calls to boycott contacts with academics in Israel," MacShane said. "It's on the campuses in Israel that the best analysis and most coherent criticism of aspects of Israeli government policy takes place; thus the calls for boycott are completely counterproductive."

A statement by the Jewish community welcomed the "comprehensive" response and "robust determination to address the creeping acceptance of physical and discursive anti-Semitism."

Jon Benjamin, chief executive of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, said: "The report itself was an immensely important study of what we know to be a real and present problem in British society."

British journalists boycott Israel

JTA

LONDON — Britain's National Union of Journalists voted to boycott Israeli goods. The boycott, passed last Friday in a 66-54 vote at the union's annual meeting in Birmingham, was declared because of Israel's "aggression" in the Palestinian territories. It calls for the union to "condemn the savage, pre-planned attack on Lebanon" last summer and the "slaughter of civilians in Gaza" over the past few years.

The Lebanon conflict was sparked by Hezbollah's July 12 cross-border raid in which the Lebanese group's guerrillas killed eight Israeli soldiers and kidnapped two.

The boycott's text also demands that sanctions be imposed on Israel by the British government. Reaction on several journalist blogs condemned the boycott. One wanted to know why the union didn't boycott notorious human rights abusers Saudi Arabia or China. Union member Tony Harnden, the Telegraph's Washington correspondent, called the move "inane" and "insulting to the intelligence," adding "this kind of thing is what gives British trade unions their loony left image."

Israel Briefs

Sharon communicates

Ariel Sharon is reportedly communicating with his family. Israel's Channel 10 news last week quoted Omri Sharon, the former prime minister's son, as saying that Sharon has recently shown slight improvement: he communicates by squeezing his hand. Sharon also follows TV with his eyes and prefers National Geographic programs, the report said. Sharon suffered a stroke on Jan. 4, 2006 and is not expected to recover from the resultant coma.

Prisoner swap backed

Almost one in two Israelis would support the release of senior Palestinian terrorists from jail in exchange for a captive soldier, a survey found. According to poll results published last week in Ma'ariv, 45 per cent of Israelis favour freeing Palestinians "with blood on their hands" if that is the condition for retrieving Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was abducted and taken to the Gaza Strip in June. Thirty-six per cent would be opposed to such a trade, while the rest were undecided. Hamas, whose gunmen were involved in Shalit's capture, has demanded that Israel release 1,400 prisoners as ransom. The roster is believed to include several top terrorists sentenced to repeated life terms in prison. Their release has been nixed thus far by Israel.

Jail time for aiding bomber

Three Israelis were sentenced to 13 years in prison for driving a suicide bomber and his accomplice to a Netanya mall, where they killed five people. Tel Aviv District Court sentenced Kfir Levy, 26, of Ramat Gan; Sif Azam, 35, of Taiba; and Abed Abu Moch, 30, of Baka al-Gharbiya. The three had been convicted in March of charges including second-degree murder. Judge Oded Mudrik ruled that Moch had been aware of the terrorists' intent, and that the other two ignored their suspicions of the Palestinians, who gave them about $200 (US) for the ride.

Birthright breaks record

Taglit-birthright israel is bringing a record 23,500 participants to Israel this summer. The group received a record 32,500 applications from North America. Among the Jewish 18-to-26-year-olds taking the free, 10-day educational trip this summer are some 20,000 from North America – the largest birthright group from that continent. Some 12,000 young Jews made the birthright israel trip in the summer of 2006, and 10,000 participated in the winter of 2006-07. Registration has been closed for this summer's trip – a birthright spokesperson said the group encourages applicants who weren't accepted this year to try again for future programs.

MASA brings youth to Israel for long-term programs

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts and Travel Editor

JERUSALEM — If it wasn't for MASA, Matthew Coorsh, 29, would not be interning at the Israeli Knesset this spring. Nor would Chaim Cutler, 22, be studying classical Jewish texts at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.

Teenagers Aaron Rosenberg and Jordan Lass would not be volunteering and studying in Israel for a year with the Hadassah's Young Judea Year Course and 18-year-old Marlee Hershfield would not be spending a year away from home for the first time, attending Hebrew University and volunteering at an absorption centre in Be'er Sheva.

All these Canadian youths are on long-term programs in Israel subsidized by a relatively new program created by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency with the aim of fulfilling former prime minister Ariel Sharon's 2003 promise to the United Jewish Communities General Assembly that "every young Jew will live here for at least one year during his lifetime."

"If we bring people for a year, or eight months, then they'll go back home different Jews," Zeev Bielski, chairman of the Jewish Agency for Israel told a group of more than 20 visiting journalists from five countries in Jerusalem in March. "They'll go back able to speak Hebrew, they'll have Israeli friends and they'll understand the Israeli political situation."

Unlike the popular Taglit-birthright israel program, which brings young students to Israel for a 10-day stay, MASA ("journey" in Hebrew) was specifically created in 2004 for Jewish youths aged 18 to 30 to experience a long-term stay in Israel. And unlike birthright, MASA is primarily funded by the Jewish Agency and the government of Israel. This year the budget for the program was $36 million (divided between the two organizations).

"On average, the cost of this program is $13,500," Bielski said. "On average, we give $4,000 to each participant."

Starting this fall, Canadian post-secondary students are guaranteed $2,000 for a semester or year-long program. Post-college students (through to age 30) are guaranteed $3,000 for a semester-long program, $3,750 for a seven- to nine-month program, and $4,500 for a full-year program.

Teenagers share some dorm time at Haifa University. MASA participants are expected to contribute at least 20 hours of community service. The average age of participants is 20.

MASA also provides scholarships for participants who need financial aid. The amount is based on family size, income and the length and cost of the program.

In fact, most of the Canadians on the program whom I met with this past March have most of their costs covered by either MASA or scholarships offered by local federations and synagogues.

Each of the participants is expected to contribute a minimum of 20 hours community service in Israel.

This year the program brought in close to 8,000 participants from 50 countries. The average age is 20.

During MASA's first two years, there has been a 100 per cent increase in the number of educational and volunteering programs in Israel. Late last March Israel's Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced the program a success and said it is making a multi-year commitment to support the MASA project.

Plans are to increase the numbers attending to 20,000 a year and to emphasize programs in the periphery of Israeli society such as the Negev and the Galilee. The government and the Jewish Agency are committed to spend up to $50 million each on MASA.

"Israel programs are perceived to be one of the most effective tools for firming up a relationship with Israel," Ezrachi Elan, director general of MASA said.

"We decided to invest in such a program," Israel Maimon, government of Israel secretary and one of the co-chairs on the MASA steering committee, told The CJN at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. "Investing in this program is quite a change in the direction of the State of Israel. We looked for a program that would have an impact not on the next 30 years or 300 years but the next 3,000 years.

Aims to connect world Jewry with Jewish identity

"I'm very pleased with what we have achieved until now," he said. "We have set ambitious goals. I've learned from Sharon that if you want to achieve something, start working on it. Don't let bureaucracy weaken your hands."

MASA is not a specific program, rather it is an umbrella group that brings together more than 140 different programs under one roof.

"We thought we shouldn't invest in something new," Maimon said. "Before MASA was launched, there were about 3,500 people participating in various long-term programs. The goal is to bring 20,000 a year. It's a very ambitious goal, but if we give participants scholarships and incentives, we should achieve the goal that we set."

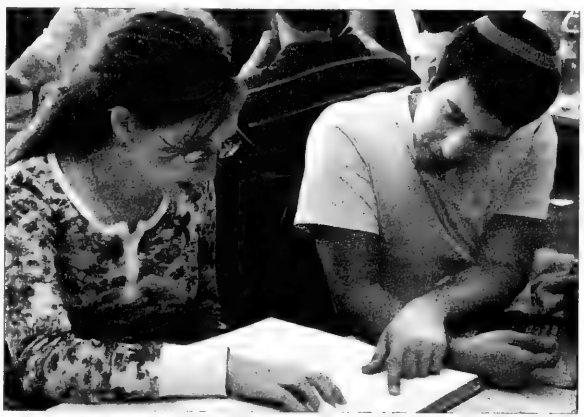
Maimon stressed this program is not in competition with birthright and even hinted there are talks of bringing the two programs together in the near future. "Birthright gives youngsters the taste of Israel. If you want to experience more, you need a longer stay," he said. "We talked about the chance of birthright working together with MASA. It's the natural thing to do. This way we can co-ordinate marketing, events and activities."

The goal is to expand on the success of birthright, which since its inception in 2000 has more than 100,000 alumni. Birthright is seen as an "appetizer," with MASA serving as a longer term followup for high school graduates. "We believe the most effective way of attracting young adults to long-term programs is through short-term programs such as birthright," Elan said.

Rabbi Michael Melchior, former minister of social and Diaspora affairs and one of the instigators of the program, was initially concerned with the lack of interest among Diaspora youths with visiting Israel.

"We live in a Jewish world where there is no common destiny, purpose and faith," he said at the Jewish Agency office in Jerusalem. "Interest is dwindling. Israel is not even in the top 10 travel places of interest to North American Jews. It is mind-boggling why a Jew would not want to see Jerusalem. My attempt was to change the tide. The purpose of MASA is to reconnect world Jewry with Jewish identity through an educational visit to Israel."

JA chairman Bielski said the Jewish Agency and the government sees MASA as an important investment in the future. "This is the first time the government is spending tax money to encourage people to come to Israel. The people on the MASA program might be future leaders of their communities. The best way to connect Jewish people to Israel is to bring them for one year. For years after, he'll be connected to Israel, there's no doubt. One year in Israel makes a big difference in people's lives."



Studying Jewish texts at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies.

The stated goals of MASA are to strengthen Jewish identity, for youths to make a vibrant connection to Israel, and to encourage future leaders in the Jewish community.

A somewhat hidden goal is to encourage aliyah.

"The percentage of those who make aliyah is greater for those on these programs than those who don't participate in long-term programs," Maimon said. However, he stressed aliyah is not one of MASA's main aims. "The aim is to shape the character of the youths and to strengthen the bonds between Israelis and the Diaspora. We're not trying to make them more religious, and if they do make aliyah, then that's a great by-product."

There are more than 140 programs youths can apply for from a broad range of recognized providers that offer educational experiences such as study in Israeli universities, gap-year programs, internships, kibbutz living, volunteering, teaching English and learning intensive Hebrew.

The programs include:

- The Otzma program, a service-based leadership development program designed to offer young Jewish adults an opportunity to live and volunteer in Israel for 10 months.
- The Pardes Program immerses students in the study of classical Jewish texts at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem.
- The Career Israel program, a five-month professional internship program open to college and university graduates.
- The Young Judea & FZY Year Course, designed for recent high school graduates as a gap-year program, offers participants volunteer and academic opportunities
- Ben-Gurion University of the Negev's Center for International Student Programs offers many programs for university students.
- Rimon Music Experience program in Ramat Hasharon, a music work-study program offering courses in songwriting, film scoring, music production and more.

A future article will focus on some of these programs and some of the current Canadian participants.

THE FORGOTTEN REFUGEES

. . . a film about the mass exodus of Jews from Arab countries and Iran in the 20th century.

Fully one thousand years before the advent of Islam, Jews in substantial numbers resided in what are today Arab countries. The situation for Jews fluctuated between limited religious, educational, professional and business opportunities and vicious persecution. Upon the declaration of the State of Israel in 1948, the situation for Jews in Arab countries became simply untenable. Thousands upon thousands of Jews fled in terror.

Little is heard about these Jewish refugees because rather than exploiting their suffering for political gain, Israel invested great expense into their resettlement.

This is their story.

AWARENESS OF DOMESTIC ABUSE IN THE JEWISH COMMUNITY SLOWLY CHANGING

Advocate reflects on bold awareness campaign one year later

Terrified, anxious and fearful for her life and the safety of her children, Sandy found the courage to leave an abusive relationship that was mentally, physically, and financially unbearable. After nine years of being silenced by threats and empty promises, she now shares her story in the hope of helping other women find their voices and escape the horrors of domestic violence.

It is women like Sandy that inspired Jewish Women International of Canada (JWIC), an organization dedicated to ending violence against women, to launch an aggressive communications campaign one year ago this month with the message 'There is a Jewish woman you know being abused'. JWIC is once again asking the community to think about the lives and lack of freedoms endured by abused women while the story of Passover is still fresh in their minds.

"Over the past year we have started to see a slight shift in attitudes," said Penny Krowitz, JWIC Executive Director. "When we began this campaign, discussing domestic abuse was considered taboo. Now, members of the community are asking to be educated about the issue of abuse and what they can do to help."

Statistics Canada reports that one in four women will experience abuse at some time in her life. "There is no reason to believe that the rate of abuse in our community is not equal to what exists in the broader one," said JWIC Executive Director, Penny Krowitz. "Despite many stereotypes, abuse affects all types of relationships, socio-economic classes, ages and spectrums of religious and cultural life. The time has come for the Jewish community to take responsibility and not sweep this problem under the carpet."

Studies indicate that a Jewish woman may stay in an abusive relationship five to seven years longer than her non-Jewish counterpart. This is attributed to several factors including the cultural importance of maintaining a peaceful home and preserving the family unit.

"Another strong misconception is that abuse is only physical," said Krowitz. "Abuse is about an unhealthy imbalance of power in a relationship whether sexual, financial, psychological, verbal or physical.

JWIC is a national organization dedicated to ending violence against women. It develops educational materials, sponsors public forums and operates culturally sensitive housing for abused women and their children. For more information on JWIC visit www.jwicanada.com or call (416) 630-9313 or toll free 1-866-333-5942.

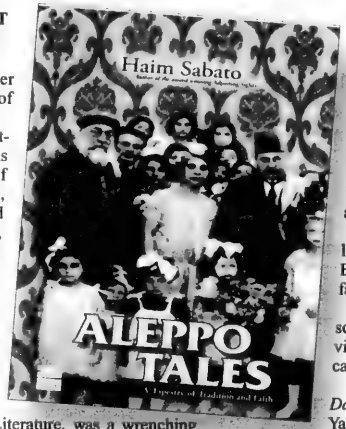
Observant and non-observant praise Haim Sabato's writing

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor



There is a great deal over which to marvel in the writing of Haim Sabato.

One of Israel's most thoughtful new authors, his prose works are elegant architectures of superb powers of observation, masterful weaving of myriad intricate detail, rolling cadence, humble voice and tightly told narrative tales.

Toby Press – with offices in Israel, the United States and England – has translated three of Sabato's works into English.

The first, Adjusting Sights (2003), for which the author won both the Sapir Prize and the Yitzchak Sadeh Prize for Literature, was a wrenching memoir of the Yom Kippur War as experienced by a soldier who was part of a tank crew on the Golan Heights. It received wide critical acclaim and quickly became a best-seller in Israel and was subsequently made into a feature-length movie.

The book, (reviewed in The CJN after it was published), resonated in almost hallowed heartbeats with a large sector of the Israeli reading public. Considering that Sabato is a rabbi and the head of the Yeshiva in Ma'aleh Adumim, a community gently to the east and north of Jerusalem and that the majority of Israel's reading public is non-observant, the response to Adjusting Sights was remarkable.

Sabato magically fuses the details of Jewish tradition with the details of modern Jewish life.

He tells stories of individuals whom many Israelis recognize in their own memories and in the eccentricities of their own families. But he forges the characters and their tales in the glowing foundry of common history, folkways, customs and songs.

Thus, Aleppo Tales, which appeared in Hebrew as Emet MiEretz Titzmach (Truth Shall Spring from the Earth) and was published in English in 2004, translated by Philip Simpson, is an anthology of three stories of a family of Jews in Aleppo, Syria.

Until relatively recently, the Jewish community of Aleppo was vibrant and alive with the pride that flowed from preserving a heritage dating back to the days of the Second Temple.

Sabato's stories are an interrelated weave of events and happenings in one family, based of course, upon the stored and restored tales of the author's family.

Sabato is the latest in a long rabbinic line that stems from Aleppo. Born in Egypt in 1952, he moved to Israel with his family when he was five years old.

He evokes the past and enthusiastically sculpts into full dimension the various individuals who populate the stories with delicate, soft-spoken respect.

Like Aleppo Tales, The Dawning of the Day, published in 2006 and translated by Yaacob Dweck, is also a paean of love to family, people, land and faith.

The emotion lifts from the pages like dew glistening toward heaven in the early sunrise hours from the leaves surrounding a Jerusalem flower.

Indeed, The Dawning of the Day is about Jerusalem. Specifically, it is about Ezra Siman Tov, a pious, humble man who works in a laundry and tries to live his life in the manner he understands to be ordained by God and mindful of his forebears.

Though Ezra's life is straightforward, it is not simple. He tells stories that describe the homes and delve into the hearts of the people with whom he shares the neighbourhood of Nachlaot, near the open-air market of Machane Yehuda in Jerusalem.

Sabato's works have been praised by both observant and non-observant readers.

Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of England, has described Sabato's writing as "wonderful, deeply moving, profoundly spiritual and technically accomplished."

Shimon Peres has written that Sabato's writing "leaves you changed forever."

There is no denying the force of Sabato's work. He is a unique breed of Israeli writer. Through his voice we hear reverence spoken for Jewish faith. We also hear the whimsy of a profound recondite love for the people – imperfect, flawed, humble and heroic – whom God has asked to embrace that faith.

27-year-old CEO has business in his blood

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

He acts like having started a successful business before he even reached bar mitzvah age is no big deal.

At 14, he was the chief technology officer of a company called Motion Works Group, and before it was even legal for him to drink alcohol in Ontario, at 18, he founded Klick Communications, an Internet solutions company.

Today, the 27-year-old president and CEO of Klick Communications, Leerom Segal, is heading one of Canada's fastest growing companies that provides educational programs and Internet solutions for the pharmaceutical industry, and offers corporate and brand portals, web-based application development and knowledge-management systems to other industries.

Klick Communications CEO, Leerom Segal

It also boasts a five-year revenue growth of about 1,800 per cent and continues to increase its revenue each year since its 1997 launch.

Segal was eight years old when he moved to Toronto from Israel with his parents who are both in the real estate industry.

With his childhood friend, Aaron Goldstein, who is Klick's chief technology officer – he predicts and develops new technical policies, guidelines and procedures – Segal developed a hobby.

"We had a lot of fun with computers. We were into a lot of different types of bulletin boards, we were into hacking competitions," Segal said.

"I guess I was a geek," he said with a laugh. "I liked it. I enjoyed it."

By the time Segal was 12, he started his first company called The Byte Doctors and built software applications for family and friends.

"We were basically doing some application development, primarily for real estate companies, and then we started building websites for real estate agents and real estate companies," he said.

Segal said that everything changed when he was visiting a family friend and overheard an investor talking about an "impossible" project.

At the time, Peter Cordy, who now manages Klick's day-to-day business, including the financial, creative and production management process, ran Davisville Communications.

"That company was one of the first companies to get into corporate web communications and they had sold a few jobs they couldn't deliver. I was at a family friend's house and overheard one of Peter's investors talking about this impossible project that couldn't be delivered in the few months that they had. And being a young little shmuck, I thought, 'That really doesn't sound so tough,'" Segal joked.

"We ended up coming in to see Peter and he sort of laughed. It was a Friday afternoon. I was 13. I was really only working for a year by that point."

He said that despite the fact that Cordy's development team had told him that the job was impossible to finish in the time allotted, Segal delivered on his promise.

"We ended up getting the sources on the Friday and by Monday, the job was done. Peter decided to replace his entire department with me."

The next thing he knew, Segal's company was acquired by Davisville Communications. Cordy's company was eventually acquired by Motion Works Group, a company that focused on entertainment projects, and by the age of 14, Segal was its CTO.

Leerom Segal, right, celebrates at the BDC Gala in 2005 with his father Joshua Segal and his girlfriend Bridget Adrian.

"Being a little arrogant kid, I was wondering how this company was ever going to make money because their most successful project still lost them money," said Segal, a York University drop-out.

He said he eventually discovered Health Links, a profitable company owned by Motion Works that provided solutions to the health care industry, and asked to be demoted to run it. His colleagues were reluctant, but Segal was determined.

"That was really the start of Klick... I formed Klick with no clients, no relationships," he said, adding that he soon developed working relationships with pharmaceutical companies such as Berlex, Schering and Pfizer. Soon after, both Cordy and Goldstein, 31, joined the Klick team, that today employs more than 60 people.

He said they first began in 1997 with Continuing Health Education, which provides physicians with the accredited courses they need to remain in good standing with various colleges.

"At the time, a lot of those were being delivered in exotic locations... so we thought there was a real opportunity to move some of the courses online so they could be done in correspondence," he said.

Today, Klick has clients in the pharmaceutical, retail, electronics and financial industries, with a list of clients including Pfizer, Home Depot, Shoppers Drug Mart, Sony, Bank of Montreal and Fidelity, just to name a few.

"Over time, we've added more services, with the goal of being a turnkey solution provider, to provide a single point of accountability to our clients, where everything gets delivered by one organization," said Segal, who won the Business Development Bank of Canada's 2005 Young Entrepreneur Award for Ontario and the Ernst & Young 2006 Entrepreneur of the Year award.

"Every time we reach and clear the goals we set for ourselves, we set the bar a little higher, and I'd be lying if I said I thought we could make it to here when we started in 1997, but we did and the bar keeps moving a little bit higher and I think we'll keep doing that."

Based on what Segal has managed to accomplish in his 27 years, there is no doubt that the blood of a businessman runs through his veins. Literally.

"I learned a lot from my dad and I was pretty fortunate to have such an amazing father," he said, adding that his father has a successful career in corporate real estate, while his mother is in the residential real estate industry.

"And I was also lucky to have Peter as a mentor. I met him very early on in my career and I also learned a lot from his experience."

But the best advice Segal can give to an aspiring entrepreneur is to be passionate about your work.

"I love what I do, and as long as I continue to love what I do, I'll keep doing it."

Non-perishable food best when travelling by air

Q. We often travel by air, and I am wondering if you can recommend the kind of food that is good to take on board now that meals are not served.

A. This is a question I am being asked more and more. I like to bring food with me when I travel too, especially when we're with our kids. I find the food in airports disappointingly poor and unhealthy.

The first thing to consider is that you should avoid food that requires refrigeration. I believe some people who want to eat on the plane don't think about about the length of time that passes from when they make that tuna or meat sandwich until their flight actually leaves. In order to avoid food spoilage or food poisoning, therefore, you should choose non-perishable foods.

Here are some of my suggestions: cheese and crackers, vegetable sushi, vegetarian pasta salads or other salads, a pita pocket with veggies and cheese or hummus and veggies, fresh fruit and vegetables (remember to wash them at home), a jam sandwich, muffins, healthy cup-o'-soups (you can get hot water on the plane), individual containers of cereal (you can usually get milk, granola or cereal bars on board).

While I am a big fan of nuts, and peanut butter would seem like an ideal choice, I would discourage you from bringing this, as it would pose a great risk to anyone on board who has a nut allergy. Often, if the allergic passenger has notified the flight crew of his or her allergy, the crew will ask everyone to refrain from eating nuts while on board, and you could be left unable to eat your food.

When travelling with kids, always pack a few extra portions for unexpected delays or food accidentally dropped or spilled on the floor. All the mothers out there are surely nodding their heads, having experienced this before. Bon voyage!

Q. Could you please give some tips for having a more eco-friendly kitchen. There seems to be a lot of buzz about this now.

A. There certainly is, and I think it's great. I have been trying to be environmentally friendly in my home for some time and I do have a few tips to offer. There are some things we all have in our pantry and cook with daily that can clean our home in a healthy way.

One of the trends I am glad to be seeing now is the increased availability of alternative portable cups. There has been much controversy about drinking from plastic and there continues to be a debate about which plastics – if any – are best. In Canada, I am now seeing more and more stainless steel water bottles in varying sizes, small ones with sippy lids geared to young kids, colourful larger bottles for older children and sleek steel for adults. I have to admit that for some time, I had my kids drinking from portable stainless steel coffee cups. I then tracked down a similar stainless drinking bottle in the United States. These bottles are not inexpensive, but they are very durable and will last a long time. There is also increased availability of glass bottles for both water and organic milk.

Another trend I am seeing more of is the growing availability of green cleaning products. I think this is important, especially around young kids. I have shuddered many a time to see people spray the tray of their child's high chair with some harsh antibacterial cleaner, wipe it dry with a paper towel and put the child's food directly on that surface. The good news is there are many inexpensive, natural cleaners. While I am not a cleaning expert, some of the pantry items I use for cleaning are baking soda as an abrasive cleaner for toilets and bathtubs; and vinegar as a natural fabric softener, to clean glass and mirrors, countertops and floors, and even as a natural bug repellent outside.

Many schools are encouraging students to bring litterless lunches, which is great. And I am seeing more and more green products for the kitchen like coffee filters, paper grocery bags and reusable cloth grocery bags. Go green!

Everyone knows that beautiful smiles and looking great go together. The very act of smiling can strengthen your confidence and sense of vitality... more so, if you have great looking teeth.

If you want healthy attractive teeth Cerec® CAD/CAM Restorations may be the answer.

Commonly tooth reconstruction, such as veneers, crowns or onlays require at least two or three appointments. This would involve impressions and having to return a second time for the insertion. With the Cerec CAD/CAM, your veneers, (as Dr. Slome recently demonstrated on Breakfast Television) crowns or onlays are made and bonded all in one visit, allowing the patient to walk away with a beautiful smile in less than two hours.

The tooth is prepared and then scanned with an electronic camera, which allows the patient to view the process in action, and no impression is required. The restoration is designed from a three dimensional scan, then precision milled from a porcelain block.

With Cerec® CAD/CAM the tooth coloured porcelain restoration is accurately fitted in just one visit.

The many faces of Aaron Berg

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

On the big screen, Aaron Berg plays a gun-toting ex-con, who rather incongruously sports a permanent smile and a Zen-like demeanour.

In real life, he's a nice Jewish boy in person, but a cursing comedian on the stage.

These conflicting personas are paving the way to making this 34-year-old a force to be reckoned with in show business.

"I'm doing everything I want to be doing," says Berg, who plays the role of Cork in The Lookout, a recently released dark thriller starring Jeff Daniels, Isla Fisher and Joseph Gordon-Levitt.

"I like doing stand-up because it's on my own terms, and I'd also like to get to the point where I'm doing leads in films."

Soon after perusing the script for The Lookout, Berg saw strong potential in the flick. "It's a great movie, totally character driven," he says.

Tapping into his creativity, Berg spruced up his audition with startling twists for his criminal character. "Originally, Cork was supposed to be a pumped-up hothead, but I went in and gave him a totally different twist," he says. "I found the humour in this guy and made him a reformed, very positive criminal."

Aaron Berg

The film has garnered positive reviews, and Berg got to walk the red carpet for the first time during its Los Angeles premiere.

Back home in Toronto, the comic is in the middle of a series of Yuk Yuk stand-up gigs across southern Ontario.

For years, Berg's shows have centred on his previous life in the underworld, including a stint as a stripper.

Based on his taboo adventures, his one-man show, Underbelly Diaries, has entertained sold-out audiences, and in 2005, Berg was nominated for the best newcomer prize at the Canadian Comedy Awards.

But times are changing and so is Berg.

He's looking to leave behind the dangerous liaisons of the past and delve into more "socially relevant" themes.

"I'm going to retire the old material," he says. "The new material will be much more socially relevant and I'll reflect that back to the audience in a funny way."

One central theme Berg hopes to explore is the impact the Internet is having on society.

"Things like Youtube and Myspace have affected the notion of fame and celebrity," he says. "The idea of 15 minutes of fame is coming true for everybody."

While fame is alluring for Berg, he takes his craft seriously and is always working to improve.

"Doing a one-man show is painstaking hard work," he offers. "But I want to try to constantly get better at the craft and to branch out to wider audiences."

If he keeps plying the trade with the vim and vigour that have taken him this far, the sky's the limit.

Find out more about Berg on his web site, www.aaronberg.com.

'You're a Jew, I hate you'

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

There will be no shortage of controversial documentaries at the forthcoming Hot Docs Canadian International Documentary Film Festival, which runs April 19 to 29, but Jamie Kastner's Kike Like Me is one of the few to announce itself as such from its provocative title alone.

Taking its inspiration partly from John Howard Griffin's 1961 book Black Like Me, wherein the author dyed his skin and posed as a black man in order to explore racism in the United States, but mostly from the groundbreaking 1947 film Gentleman's Agreement, which featured Gregory Peck playing a non-Jewish reporter who masquerades as a Jew to expose anti-Semitism in America, Kike Like Me highlights the disturbing issue of anti-Jewish prejudices in the present day.

Setting out with his camera crew, and intending to gauge the reaction of the people he meets when he says he's a Jew, the 35-year-old Toronto filmmaker, who is making his feature length documentary debut, encounters anti-Semitism both covert (in London, England) and overt (in Paris).

But he also comes across less obvious forms of exploitation and prejudice, such as a "Jewish" restaurant staffed entirely by Christian Poles in Krakow; a contentious Holocaust memorial set up by a non-Jewish German woman in Berlin; and even a surrealistic episode in Holland when rabid soccer fans identify themselves as "Jews" for reasons they're hard-pressed to explain.

By the time the film ends up in Auschwitz, complete with its souvenir museum and hot dog stand, Kike Like Me more than makes the point that not much has changed since the days of the virulent anti-Semitism that culminated in the Holocaust.

Or as Kastner wryly puts it, "I'm never called a kike in the film, but I may as well be."

Although it's been sold to 10 broadcasters – including TVO, the U.S. Sundance Channel and the BBC – Kike Like Me did raise eyebrows when Kastner first pitched the idea at the 2005 Hot Docs festival.

The strong reaction of Rudy Buttignol, TVO's then-creative head of network programming, who exclaimed, "I hate the title of this film but I love the project," was typical of the industry response, says Kastner.

He stood firm, however and "the happy ending [is that] Rudy and others felt that the final film justified the title."

Kastner, like most younger Canadian Jews, had experienced little if any anti-Semitism in his life, which is why making Kike Like Me was such an eye-opener for him.

He knew something of what he might face while shooting the film – "I ain't gonna feel like kibbitzing and joking much after I go to Auschwitz" – but the incident in France, when a group of Arabs shared their noxious views about Jews with the filmmaker, was particularly shocking.

Jamie Kastner at the Auschwitz Gates

"France, both in the film and in reality, is a definite turning point for my character – from the more aloof, what-does-this-have-to-do-with-me jokey guy to holy f--k, people are turning to me and right after I've just made friends with them and they've been playing to my camera [they will still] turn to me and say, 'You're a Jew, I hate you,' and no one's ever said that to me directly."

Despite its subject matter, Kastner insists that he "did not intend to make a film about anti-Semitism nor, believe it or not, do I even see it as a 'Jewish' film."

He hopes that audiences will receive it as "a film about identity. It's a film about the question of whether identity is yours to choose or whether it's something that is foisted upon you and often by your worst enemies, and they have as great if not greater authority to do so as you do to determine who you're going to be.

"That's really what I see as the overall take-home message of the film, and I think that's universal, or at least universal among non-WASP-majority folk."

And though Kastner points out in Kike Like Me that he's often been asked if he's Jewish, he never actually confirms whether he is a Jew, neither onscreen nor to this reporter.

"My answer to that [is], 'Why do you want to know?' I think it makes the film stronger if I don't [answer that question] and it increases, hopefully, the effect of making the audience really think of why they want to know. That really is the question. It shouldn't matter."

Kike Like Me will be screened on Tuesday April 24 at 9:15 p.m., Saturday, April 28 at 9 p.m., and Sunday May 13 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema.

A preview of the Hot Docs film festival

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of Hot Docs, the Canadian International Documentary Festival, runs from April 19 to 29 and features 129 films from 30 countries.

A tantalizing taste of what to expect can be found in three well-made documentaries – two from Canada (The Bodybuilder and I and Kike Like Me) and one from Israel (Hothouse).

Bryan Friedman's The Bodybuilder and I (April 20 at 9:30 p.m. at the Royal and April 22 at 1:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) seems at first glance like a profile of a strutting Toronto Jewish bodybuilder, his father Bill.

In fact, The Bodybuilder and I, Friedman's first feature-length movie, is a painful examination of his conflicted relationship with his dad, a vain, self-absorbed, short-tempered 59-year-old former lawyer who found solace in competitive bodybuilding after his second wife left him.

As this intriguing film opens, Bill, his body lean and hard, is training to regain a championship in the age 50-60 category. His chief competitors are also Jews, all of whom are fiercely focused and egotistical.

But as Bill obsessively works out with his personal trainer, Bryan interjects a jarring note. "I've never liked my father," he says flatly.

It seems that Bill was an "absent parent" who missed important family events and was just not around when his presence was required. Indeed, he went ice fishing when his wife was in hospital expecting a baby at any moment. As a result, Bryan feels a certain resentment toward him, as if they are separated by a high wall.

Bryan has a low opinion of bodybuilding, considering it a "bizarre hobby." But he wants to learn more about Bill's "muscle-bound world" and needs a distraction after his breakup with his girlfriend of six years.

The Bodybuilder And I, which turns on interrelated themes ranging from estrangement to resentment, unfolds in a series of seamlessly connected scenes. The camera pans on Bill as he bench presses, submits himself to artificial tans, shops for bikinis adorned with an S (Superman) at the crotch and furtively drags on a cigarette.

Bryan's mother makes an appearance, too, saying that there was no "family unity" during her marriage to Bill.

Mostly, The Bodybuilder and I revolves around Bryan's fraught relationship with Bill. Toward the close, after Bryan claims that he missed having a real father figure as a child, Bill admits that he was "too busy" to fulfil that role. But he points out that his participation in the film is evidence of his desire to make amends.

To this reviewer, Bill's statement is a sincere sign of contriteness. Against the backdrop of vain, preening and sweaty bodybuilders seeking glory, father and son may yet find a way to reconcile and leave the contentious past behind.

Jamie Kastner's Kike Like Me (April 24 at 9:15 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and April 28 at 9 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) is, in a word, idiosyncratic.

Kastner, a journalist and filmmaker, poses a question pregnant with meaning and resounding with history: Who's Jewish? His inquiry stems from the fact that he feels threatened when he is asked whether he is Jewish. In an attempt to come to grips with this issue, he travels to far-flung destinations.

Bryan and Bill Friedman in The Bodybuilder and I

Visiting a haredi neighbourhood in Brooklyn, the assimilated Kastner is invited into a yeshiva and introduced to an alien world.

In Washington, D.C., he meets the right-wing newspaper columnist and pundit Pat Buchanan at his home. Kastner eases the conversation into a discussion of Jewish neo-conservatives, whom Buchanan detests. Annoyed by Kastner's pointed questions, Buchanan politely asks him to leave. "Why don't we call it a day?"

Turning up in Israel, Kastner visits an absorption centre in Jerusalem where a Canadian new immigrant complains about his spartan quarters. Later, he rejects a famous Israeli novelist's link between Jewishness and nationalism.

Kastner encounters anti-Semitism in Holland and France among soccer fans and young Arabs. In Berlin, he meets a German man who plays klezmer music, and in Krakow, Poland, he expresses surprise at finding so many Jewish-style restaurants. As he drives toward Auschwitz, he feels "pretty creepy."

Kike Like Me, which tends to be sardonic, funny and frightening, is about identity, bigotry and self-realization. Kastner, to his credit, is fearless about tackling big, visceral issues.

Shimon Dotan's Hothouse (April 26 at 7 p.m. at the Royal and April 29 at 7:15 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema) zeroes in on Palestinians incarcerated by Israel. They refer to themselves as "freedom prisoners," while Israel calls them terrorists. Ten thousand languish in jails, having been convicted of committing security offences. They constitute an important issue for both the Israeli government and the Palestinian Authority.

Striking an impartial tone, Dotan talks to a variety of prisoners, most of whom are highly motivated, disciplined and speak Hebrew fluently.

They seem to be treated with respect, being permitted to watch Israeli television and read Israeli newspapers and allowed to take courses at the Hebrew University and the Open University. The warden maintains what seems like cordial relations with the prisoners' representatives.

Many of the prisoners are politically realistic. A Hamas member concedes that Israel and the Palestinians have no alternative but to negotiate and coexist. But a failed suicide bomber still dreams of blowing himself up for his people and killing Jews.

The ultimate point of Hothouse is that the prison experience has had the unintended effect of creating a new Palestinian leadership that Israel may have to deal with one of these days.

Veteran actor writes, performs the Kabbalah Kabbaret

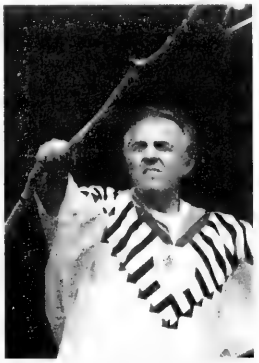
By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

It would be logical to assume that by creating the Kabbalah Kabbaret, a comedic musical revue centring around the meaning of mystical Judaism's teachings, that Howard Jerome would be following up on a lifelong interest in all things Jewish.

But the veteran 67-year-old American-born Toronto actor/performer was actually estranged from Judaism – and religion in general – for many years. "I left the faith for 40 years," he declares. "I turned my back on the faith when I was 14 years old. I perceived at that age, the Korean war was going on, my friends who came back from that war were coming back dreadfully wounded, psychologically, physically scarred, so I became anti-war very early on.



Howard Jerome in two different guises.

"Also, the Jews I saw around me in Brooklyn, I was not impressed. I saw robots and zombies – people go to shul to flirt, to do business, to demonstrate their stature – and I was not impressed with the level of spirituality that I saw around me, plus the world was in a terrible mess, as it is now, and I had no room for God in that."

Twenty years of full-blown atheism were followed by investigations of Buddhism and Hinduism, among other spiritual paths, before Jerome, who is probably best known for his role as Mr. Peikes in The Outside Chance of Maximilian Glick (both film and TV series) and as the voluble host of the biannual Toronto Ashkenaz klezmer music festival, found his way back to his original religion.

"I've been a Buddhist, been a nudist, been a yogi on pogey, a hippie, a wrestler – I've done all of these things for real. Now I'm a rapper, an old rapper, I'm a rappin' rebbe."

More seriously, he adds, "I've done a lot of these things and I did them deeply, and I believe now that they were all preparing me to come back to my faith but only through the study of Kabbalah. Without the Kabbalah, I wouldn't bother with it [Judaism] at all."

Studying the Kabbalah also fits in with Jerome's early pacifist leanings. "The basic teaching of the Kabbalah is we must change our basic nature from the desire to receive for the self alone to the desire to receive for the purpose of sharing. It's that desire on an egotistical basis, on an accumulative basis, on a material basis, that creates all of the havoc between people – and nations."

The cabaret is mostly Jerome – he calls himself Shalom Jerome – singing and rapping on stage, but "it also allows for others to step in and out of the show. For example, when I'm here in Toronto, before I go on tour [to the United States], my wife, this is my third wife, Alice, I did a song for her: 'When I first became a shiksa, married a Jewish boy, I didn't know a gatke from a kishka, I enjoy being a goy.'"

Other songs are less provocative, such as a tune Jerome wrote to celebrate his first Rosh Hashanah in 40 years and how he felt watching his rabbi's sons praying. It goes: "I wish I could daven like the rabbi's boys, they get into a groove, oy gevalt, can they move, they're bouncing up and down like one of those toys, I go into a trance, it's like watching them dance, they're bowing to the left and then they're bowing to the right."

The show, which is divided into two parts, "Fun and Games" and "Deeper, Higher," will hopefully, says Jerome, prompt audience members to study and learn more about Kabbalah for themselves. "It is not an airy-fairy mystical, voodoo-hoodoo thing. It is [a] very practical, fundamental knowledge of how the universe works."

Jerome, who has appeared in more than 70 films and television shows since 1985, as well in countless commercials – he plays the cabbie in the Cialis ads – done voice overs and performed in theatrical productions, is, not surprisingly, hard at work on several new projects, including a recently written musical on the life of actor Zero Mostel, ideally with Jerome in the title role.

"If I'm not working on a television show or a play or a cartoon or commercials, I'm writing and creating. I'm a compulsive creator," he says.

The Kabbalah Kabbaret takes place on Saturday, April 21, at 8 pm at the Centre for Conscious Living, 1311 Queen St. E. For more information, call 416 - 778 -5433.

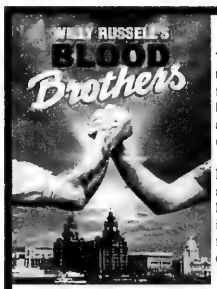
Passages: Kristine Bogyo, cellist and founder-conductor of the Mooredale Youth Orchestra, died on April 6 in Toronto after a long battle with cancer. She was 60.

Born in Budapest, Bogyo grew up in Montreal and spent most of her life in Toronto. She was married to pianist Anton Kuerti. The couple often performed together and released two successful CDs. Four years ago, they were featured in A Marriage in Music, an hour-long documentary on CBC television. According to the Montreal Star, Bogyo was "one of those rarities that the world of cellists produces from time to time – a player of strength and vigour who can make a long, warm lyrical line sing."

In 1986, Bogyo founded the Mooredale Youth Orchestra, in part to give her violin-playing son Julian (now assistant conductor of the Budapest Festival Orchestra and soon the Boston Symphony) and other young musicians (including her cello-playing son, Rafael) the opportunity to play together in a congenial environment. Today, more than 100 young musicians are enrolled in the orchestra.

She was also artistic director of Mooredale Concerts and co-founder of the Festival of the Sound in Parry Sound. She received a meritorious service medal from governor general Adrienne Clarkson two years ago.

Bogyo also leaves behind sisters Katalina MacDonald of Germany and Esther Bogyo of Toronto. A short memorial service took place on April 15 at Walter Hall, University of Toronto.



encore entertainment presents ...

This award-winning musical tells the captivating story of fraternal twins separated at birth who grow up living just a few streets apart, but on opposite sides of the tracks.

Powerful and moving, lively and sad, it will capture your heart and leave a lasting impression. This show is funny, deeply moving and full of memorable songs.

OPPOSED TO RELEASING TERRORISTS

The Almagor Terror Victims Association, established in 1986 to lobby against releasing terrorists convicted of killing Israelis, held a press conference last week to urge the Israeli government not to agree to a prisoner exchange for kidnapped Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit. The possible release of Palestinian terrorists imprisoned in Israel in exchange for Shalit has generated anger among families of terror victims. Since September 2000, some 171 Israelis have been killed by Palestinians who were released in prisoner exchange deals. Pictured are relatives of terror victims lighting memorial candles. Pressel becomes youngest major winner in LPGA history

RANCHO MIRAGE, Calif. — Morgan Pressel played bogey-free golf on her final 24 holes and climbed from three groups behind the leaders to become the youngest ever winner of a major championship in LPGA Tour history.

The Florida native celebrated by taking the traditional champion's plunge into Poppy's Pond along with her caddy, Jon Yarborough, and grandmother, Evelyn Krickstein.

Pressel, who won the event at 18 years, 10 months and nine days, captured the $300,000 US paycheque and trophy with a three-under-par 285 (74-72-70-69), to finish one stroke ahead of the trio of Catriona Matthew (70-73-72-71), Suzann Pettersen (72-69-71-74) and Brittany Lincicome (72-71-71-72).

"I got off to a little bit of a rough start with the two over on the first day. And I just said to myself, stay patient," said Pressel, who is now the season's second Rolex First-Time Winner and 29th player in tour history to make a major her first-career win. "This golf course is playing tough. The pins are going to get more difficult and the greens are going to get firmer. I managed to play better when the conditions got tougher. So it's just exciting. This is a dream come true," she said in a story on LPGA.com

The course played to 6,627 yards over the weekend just before Passover. Long rough and hard greens created tough conditions for the 101-player field. A second-round 67 (-5) by Paula Creamer was the low-round for the tournament, and the leaders were never more than four under par for the tournament. Norway's Pettersen actually climbed to a two-stroke final-round lead midway through the day, but a bogey, double-bogey, bogey string on holes 15 through 17 dropped her to two under par, where she finished tied for second.

"Yesterday, I said whoever made the least amount of mistakes would win," said Pettersen, who entered the final round tied for the lead with Se Ri Pak at four under par. "I did a few too many on the back. I am disappointed at finishing second, probably my personal best, when I was so happy last week for a second place. But this time, I felt like I lost the tournament."

Pak had been a quiet presence on the leaderboard as well, and in an ideal position to become the seventh LPGA Tour player to complete the career grand slam, in which a player wins all designated major championships at least once in her career. After remaining at four-under through her front nine, Pak carded only one birdie on the back nine against six bogeys, including four in a row on her final holes.

Pressel, however, started the day four-strokes back and tied for ninth. With key birdies on holes 2, 12 and 18, she made the jump to three under par. However, Pressel entered the scoring tent well ahead of the final group. With so many players in position to strike and join her at the top of the leaderboard, all she could do was wait on the driving range.

Morgan Pressel

"When you're out there and when you're playing, it's a lot easier to control what you do than to wait and see what somebody else does," said Pressel, who now owns three top-five finishes in her first four events this season. "I decided to go over to the range, where it was a little bit quieter. There was a lot going on. I was a little shaky. I was hitting balls to try to calm myself down.

"This is a dream to be out here and to win a major championship, and especially with my first win. I didn't play as well as I would have liked last year. I worked really hard in the off season, worked hard in the gym, worked hard on my swing. I got a lot of experience last year. I was certainly ready to compete and ready to win."

Pressel, who has confirmed she will compete at the 2007 CN Canadian Women's Open, Aug. 13-19 at the Royal Mayfair Golf Club in Edmonton, also became the first automatic qualifier in the LPGA Playoffs 2007 that culminates at the season-ending ADT Championship at Trump International Golf Club in West Palm Beach, Fla.

"We are delighted that Morgan will be returning to Canada to compete at the CN Canadian Women's Open," said Sean Van Kesteren, tournament director. "In a short time, Morgan has established herself as one of the most recognizable and charismatic stars on the LPGA Tour. She is a premier talent and has also quickly developed mass appeal with the fans. Morgan will certainly be one of the stars with a shot at capturing this year's title in Edmonton."

The 2006 season marked Pressel's rookie year on the LPGA Tour including an appearance at the 2006 CN Canadian Women's Open (tied for 37th). Prior to last season, the native of Tampa enjoyed a stellar amateur career, which was capped by winning the 2005 U.S. Women's Amateur and finishing runner-up at the 2005 U.S. Women's Open.

Pressel has an impressive family legacy in both sports and Judaism, freelancer Marvin Glassman reports. Pressel's great-grandfather was Conservative Rabbi Joseph Krickstein, who had a pulpit in Ann Arbor, Mich. Her grandfather, Herb Krickstein, excelled in baseball and was given a tryout by the Detroit Tigers, but he turned down the offer of a major league baseball contract to become a pre-medicine student.

Pressel's father, Mike, was a hockey player, and her late mother, Kathy, was a former Big Ten tennis champion at the University of Michigan. Younger sister Madison is becoming an excellent golfer herself. Her uncle, Aaron Krickstein, was a top 10 tennis player from 1983-94, ranked as high as sixth in the world in 1990.

A closed-door policy

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

I've never understood the talmudic passage in which the rabbis consider the correct protocol for someone who wants to convert to Judaism. The Talmud offers a rather specific initiation methodology that starts with a simple question for the potential convert: "Why do you want to be a Jew?"

That opening query is sensible enough. In talmudic times, I imagine, the community of converted and converting was a small group – the sort of crowd that would have seemed somewhat odd to the average Babylonian or Jew. Wondering what might motivate one to convert to Judaism would appear to be a natural expression of curiosity, given the peculiar circumstances.

New Views

But the next question from the rabbis signals a dramatic change in the tenor of the conversation. They ask the convert: "Don't you know that Jews are afflicted, oppressed, downtrodden and harassed nowadays?" Then they proceed to describe some of the more gruesome punishments – including stoning and excision – that await the convert should he fail to perform various biblical commandments correctly.

For some reason, the rabbis appear determined to discourage the convert – "You'll be part of a sorry bunch," they warn, "and there's a chance you'll meet a grisly end." Either the rabbis are doing their best to put off converts, or they have a terribly warped sense of what constitutes a successful marketing strategy.

At the end of that section, the Talmud confirms that converts are not particularly welcome in Judaism when Rabbi Chelbo pronounces that converts are as harmful to the nation of Israel as leprosy. Nice. Real nice. If the interrogations and warnings of stonings to come weren't enough to deter potential converts, surely comparing them to a skin disease would have sent them running from all things Jewish.

Today, Orthodox rabbinic leaders – the modern equivalent of the Talmud's rabbis – steadfastly maintain that iron fist when it comes to conversion.

In Israel – where there is constant need for an efficient, open-minded conversion system to accommodate the influx of immigrants who fit under Israel's "right of return" laws but aren't considered Jewish according to Halachah – the Orthodox practice of making the conversion process a protracted and cumbersome one has become a point of contention.

According to a recent article in the New York Jewish Week, nearly 50 per cent of Israeli Orthodox candidates are denied conversion on their first try. More astoundingly, only about 60 to 65 per cent of all applicants ever eventually succeed. In response to those distressing figures, the Institute for the Study of Judaism – conversion-central in Israel – recently decided to stop sending converts to study with Orthodox rabbis.

The problem lies in the long list of prerequisites – including requiring proof of attendance at Orthodox synagogue and regular Torah study – that Orthodox rabbis demand from converts. It's no secret why Orthodox leaders are making life so difficult: they consider their practices to be the pure form of Judaism. For them, any other Jewish method is simply wrong or misguided.

Never mind that these new immigrants serve in the Israel Defence Forces (something few of these rabbis deem suitable for themselves and their disciples) and genuinely wish to join Jewish tradition and culture. The rabbis refuse to budge from their hardline terms, just as their talmudic predecessors terrorized anyone who was interested in joining the club.

The conversion policy is an insult to converts and to the vast majority of Jews who are happy to help anyone who wants to become Jewish. The Orthodox demands must be relaxed.

There is no purer expression of loyalty for one's fellow Jew than Ruth's eloquent statement as she confirms her desire to become Jewish: "Where you go, I will go, where you lodge, I will lodge, your people are my people, and your God is my God."

Ruth captures the essence of what the conversion ritual should be about: a declaration of solidarity and unity with all Jews. The other details aren't nearly as important.

Rabbi Chelbo missed that point some 1,700 years ago. Today's Orthodox rabbis would be wise to avoid making the same mistake.

2 1/2 cups lemon juice
Coarse kosher salt
Freshly ground black pepper
1/2 cup honey

Place each chicken in heavy-duty resealable plastic bag. Add 1 1/4 c lemon juice to each. Seal bags; turn chickens to coat. Refrigerate at least 6 hrs. up to 1 day, turning bags occasionally.

Preheat oven to 450°F. Drain chickens; pat dry. Sprinkle each with salt and pepper. Place chickens side by side, breast side down, on racks in large roasting pan. Roast 15 min. Reduce oven temperature to 375°F. Roast 45 min. Turn chickens breast side up. Brush all over with honey. Continue to roast until cooked through and deep brown, basting with any juices in pan and brushing with honey occasionally, about 55 min. longer. Transfer chickens to platter and let rest. Pour pan juices into small saucepan. Spoon off fat. Rewarm pan juices. Season with salt and pepper. Serve chickens with pan juices.

REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

By BILL GLADSTONE

Rabbi David Monson, right, served as a Jewish chaplain with the Canadian Armed Forces during World War II, and is shown with Dr. Joseph H. Hertz, England's distinguished former chief rabbi, in the early 1940s. Upon his return from Europe to Toronto, Rabbi Monson founded the Beth Sholom Synagogue with 13 local families in 1947. Still a major presence on Eglinton Avenue West, the conservative congregation marks its 60th anniversary this year. The building was erected in stages, recalls Beth Sholom's rabbi emeritus, who also commemorated an important anniversary – his 90th birthday – this month. Shown is an artist's depiction of the synagogue with the adjoining Mildred Arnoff Memorial School at left.

Yom Ha'atzmaut: an omelette at 2 a.m.

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I've made friends with three Israelis – two guys and a girl – visiting Canada. They are on a trek around the world, one many Israelis make following their army service.

Through my time spent with them I discovered something about Israelis, or perhaps these three Israelis, which made me feel safe, opened my eyes to those who steward and guard the Land of Israel, and compelled me to look long and hard at my weaknesses and strengths.

URBAN WRITER

The Israelis I speak of display astonishing creativity. They are doing complex work on my friend's cottage with great professionalism. Where did they learn this skill? "I learned from my brother-in-law. I watched him work."

Their apartment is furnished decently, with two sofas in the living room, a computer table and some funky artwork on the walls. How did they furnish their abode with little money? They drove the streets of Toronto and found our garbage, which they turned into treasures, along with an almost brand-new dishwasher. "You throw out a lot," these venturesome Israelis told me.

The two guys can be guarded about their feelings. "We keep them inside."

Even from your girlfriends?

"Yes."

Yet an acute sensitivity exists within both of them. It showed itself when we talked about their army service. "You see things nobody should see," one of them said. It also showed itself in their love for their parents and their love of animals (One of my friends will open a pet store in Israel. We don't think about Israelis that way, eh?).

They are tough, though. "I'm not afraid of people." I saw it when they told me about their homes in neighbourhoods that are equivalent to our Regent Park; when they discussed the challenges of coexistence; the terrible tribulations they were faced with, with guns in hand. But their toughness made me feel safe. We are in good hands with Israelis. They are in charge of our safety. I would be a weak soldier. You?

"Do you know how Diaspora Jews look at you," I asked them.

"No, how?"

"We see you as courageous, creative, strong and very rude. "

They weren't surprised by the "rude," but were silent at the "brave." Surprised and proud. They hadn't known we feel this way. But truth be told, do we know how they see us? No. This is part of the Diaspora-Israeli dilemma. We play up the image we have of each other, but much of it is twaddle.

I apologized to the Israelis for putting all the responsibilities on their shoulders for physically protecting the Jewish people. They were in Lebanon. They co-ordinated the process of informing families that their boys were killed in action. I told them, we're sorry they are the ones on the front lines; are shot at while we study philosophy in university and drink beer at our campus pub.

They processed my words and thanked me back. I questioned my Jewishness, love of Israel and my masculinity.

My Israeli friends were constantly active. They said they never get bored. They made me an omelette and cup of tea at two in the morning. They took an 1½-hour hike across a frozen lake (at the cottage), all the while snapping magnificent pictures of the cracks in the ice and their hands holding a pile of frozen sticks.

On Yom Hazikaron, we pray for the souls of those Israelis lost in war and for their families' peace of mind. On Yom Ha'azmut we celebrate the vigour, gallantry, heroism, inventiveness, strength and delicate spirit of our Israeli brothers and sisters who ensure our safety and security, and add great character to the Jewish personality.

Remembering through pain

Some 22,305 fallen soldiers were remembered Monday in private and public ceremonies in 43 military cemeteries throughout Israel. Of this year's fallen soldiers, 119 were killed during the Second Lebanon War, which lasted for 33 days last summer. Yom Hazikaron (Memorial Day) ended Monday night with the traditional torch-lighting ceremony on Mount Herzl in Jerusalem and was followed immediately by festivities for Israel's 59th Independence Day.

Virginia Tech hero buried with honours

RA'ANANA — A representative of Romanian President Traian Basescu gave a national medal in Israel on April 20 to the family of a Romanian-born Virginia Tech professor who saved his students from a rampaging gunman last week.

The presidential representative attended Liviu Librescu's funeral in Ra'anana and bestowed on his widow and children the Order of the Star of Romania for his bravery and his contributions to science, Israel Radio reported.

Liviu Librescu

Librescu, an internationally respected aeronautics engineer and lecturer, was an engineering professor and Holocaust survivor who left Romania for Israel and then the United States.

Witnesses to the Virginia Tech shooting said Librescu blocked the door to his classroom with his body so students could escape the assailant by jumping out windows. The 76-year-old professor was shot to death in the deadliest shooting rampage in U.S. history, which coincided with Holocaust Remembrance Day, and he became one of 32 victims of gunman Cho Seung-Hui.

"He gave his life for his students," Dov Hikind, a New York State assemblyman, told mourners at a Brooklyn, N.Y., funeral home during a memorial service last week. "It is the ultimate sacrifice, and the ultimate goodness, after all that he went through in his life."

The neighbourhood's Jewish community volunteered to hold the service before Librescu's remains were flown to Israel for burial.

The professor's wife, Marlena Librescu, arrived with Israeli consular officials. She was greeted with bear hugs from strangers who praised her husband's bravery.

The News in Brief

Canada

SWC Gets Grant

TORONTO — The Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies got a one-year, $59,000 grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation last week to set up interactive multimedia workshops featuring books, computers and software at the Friends' centre for Holocaust studies in Toronto. They will help educate young people about racism, combating hatred and becoming engaged in democracy, the foundation, an agency of Ontario's Ministry of Culture, said last week.

Cdn. Shuls Honoured

TORONTO — Three Canadian shuls were among 29 Reform congregations who won awards last week for their social action programming at the Union for Reform Judaism's Consultation on Conscience policy conference in Washington. Am Shalom Congregation, a shul of less than 100 members in Barrie, Ont., received the Irving J. Fain Award for Outstanding Synagogue Social Action Programming for visits to Jewish inmates at Penetanguishene's Central North Correctional Centre. Temple Sinai in Toronto won the same award for funding a breakfast program for 80 poor children at a local school, and Montreal's Temple Emanu-El-Beth Shalom won for a program to raise awareness in the shul and the wider community about human trafficking.

It's Shabbat! Let's Eat!

TORONTO — Thirteen shuls and Jewish organizations across Canada, from Congregation Tiferes Israel in Moncton, N.B., to Richmond Jewish Day School in Richmond, B.C., will take part in the National Jewish Outreach Program's 11th annual Shabbat Across America/Canada. The May 4 event begins with an abridged Friday night beginners shul service, followed by a meal and explanations of Friday night Shabbat rituals.

Protesters Scuffle With Right-Wing Extremist

TORONTO — Two protesters from the Jewish Defence League (JDL) were arrested and charged with assault last week after scuffling with a former teacher when he arrived at a disciplinary hearing looking into his association with white supremacists.

Paul Fromm

Paul Fromm, a former teacher with the Toronto-area Peel District School Board, arrived April 19 at the site of the Ontario College of Teachers hearing in downtown Toronto and entered an elevator with people attending a protest against him organized by the JDL, the Globe and Mail reported.

After a scuffle – protesters said Fromm pushed them and he said they lunged at him – two demonstrators were arrested and charged, one with assault and the other with obstructing and assaulting police, the Globe reported.

Fromm is a longtime activist in extreme-right causes and an associate of Ernst Zundel, who is in jail in Germany for Holocaust denial after being deported from Canada.

Fromm was fired by the Peel Board in 1997. Among other allegations, the college says he engaged in conduct unbecoming a member and practising the profession while in a conflict of interest.

World

Rocker Praises Nazis

LONDON — Responding to outrage from Jewish groups, British rock singer Bryan Ferry apologized last week for praising the esthetics of Nazi Germany. In an interview in a German newspaper, Ferry, lead singer of Roxy Music, marvelled at the "really beautiful" iconography and staging of Nazi events. "I, like every right-minded individual, find the Nazi regime, and all it stood for, evil and abhorrent," Ferry, 61, said in a statement.

Shoah Teaching Stays

LONDON — Britain's Holocaust Educational Trust and the American Jewish Committee refuted reports that the British government would scrap Holocaust education for fear of offending Muslim students. After a story in several British newspapers on a recent government report titled Teaching Emotive and Controversial History, the Simon Wiesenthal Center wrote to Education Secretary Alan Johnson that it was "horrified" to learn of a reluctance by U.K. teachers to educate children about the Shoah because of political correctness. "We want to make it clear that our understanding is the Holocaust is and will continue to be on the national curriculum and therefore continue to be taught in all U.K. schools," the trust said.

French Rabbi Attacked

PARIS — The chief rabbi of Nord-Pas-de-Calais in northern France was attacked April 19 at Paris' Gare du Nord train station. Elie Dahan was walking alone at the station around 11 a.m. when a man about 20 years old, accompanied by a woman, started shouting, "Don't look at me like this, dirty Jew. I'll knock you, dirty Jew." He punched the rabbi in the face and ran away. "My glasses were broken and my eye started bleeding. Several people tried to catch the aggressor, but he escaped," said Rabbi Cahan, who was treated in hospital.

U.S. Rabbis Arrested

NEW YORK — New York City police arrested 22 rabbis protesting Iran's threats against Israel in front of the United Nations. Led by Rabbi Avi Weiss, president of Amcha-The Coalition for Jewish Concerns and dean of Yeshivat Chovevei Torah, the rabbis held a rally April 17 across from the UN. He called for Iran to be expelled from the United Nations for its threats to destroy a fellow member state. The group was arrested when it blocked pedestrian traffic. The rabbis, most wearing tallits and representing the denominational spectrum, were held for several hours before being released. They are slated to appear in court May 15.

Praise or Slur?

WASHINGTON — Making money is part of the Jewish tradition, a U.S. Republican presidential candidate said in an April 16 speech to the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism. "I'm in the private sector and for the first time in my life I'm earning money," former Wisconsin governor Tommy Thompson said. "You know that's sort of part of the Jewish tradition."After being told his remarks were problematic, he told his several hundred listeners that he "didn't in any means want to infer or imply anything about Jews and finances and things.What I was referring to… is the accomplishments of the Jewish religion and the Jewish people. You have been outstanding business people and I compliment you for that."

Funding for faith-based schools addressed at forum

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The group Jewish Parents for Equal Education Funding (JPEEF) organized a parents' forum last week to address what longtime funding activist Ira Walfish calls "the most important issue facing the Jewish community."

Walfish – who made the comment at Toronto Botanical Garden to about 100 concerned parents, most with children enrolled in private schools, including Jewish, Muslim, Sikh and Christian institutions – was referring to Ontario's policy of providing funding for Catholic schools, but not for those of other faiths.

"[Ontario Premier Dalton] McGuinty is obviously against funding and is quite resolute in his opposition to funding faith-based schools," Walfish told the forum, which was titled "Real solutions to solve the tuition crisis in Jewish education" and held six months before a provincial election scheduled for Oct. 10.

"This is obviously a serious inequity that is really harming faith-based communities. The bottom line is that our children are simply not receiving the education they should be getting because of a blatant discriminatory policy on behalf of the government," Walfish said.

He added that McGuinty doesn't want to change this policy because it isn't a popular issue and he believes that his constituency is against funding non-Catholic faith-based schools.

Walfish chairs a group called the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools, which hosted a school funding symposium earlier the same day, on April 16.

The coalition has presented reports to Ontario politicians, but its case has "fallen on deaf ears," Walfish said.

"The government is supposed to protect minority rights. In fact, the government is trampling on minority rights. Our families suffer financially, our schools suffer financially, our entire communities suffer, period."

Walfish added that politicians understand the unfairness of the issue, but they need to be prodded into action.

"What we need are activists," he said.

He suggested that people write letters, help put together reports, organize rallies, inform the media about the issue, and meet with politicians.

Maureen Harquail, the federal Conservative candidate for Willowdale, and Peter Kent, the federal Conservative candidate for Thornhill, attended the forum, but Joe Oliver, the federal Conservative candidate for Eglinton-Lawrence, was the only politician to address the crowd.

"We Canadians pride ourselves in our respect for diversity, and we want to be a country that treats its minorities fairly… It is really troubling that the United Nations Human Rights Committee has twice, in 1999 and 2005, found Canada in violation of a covenant on civil and political rights," Oliver said.

A fact sheet distributed at the forum said that Ontario is the only jurisdiction in the western world that fully funds the schools of one religion – in this case, Catholicism – to the exclusion of all others.

The handout also noted that the Atlantic provinces and Ontario are the only ones in Canada that don't fund all faith-based schools.

"I am here because this is not just an education matter. It is a matter of human rights," Oliver said.

Barbara Bierman, spokesperson for Parents for Educational Choice and a representative of the Ontario Alliance of Christian Schools, spoke about how parents can make politicians change their thinking on faith-based funding.

She said that in addition to sending letters, writing op-ed pieces and organizing rallies, there are fun ways to keep this issue from falling by the wayside.

"Every year after I get my children's school pictures, I pop two in the mail to Dalton McGuinty and I remind him of these two children who he is not taking care of and that he is obligated to as premier of this province… So, he must have a collection as nice as my parents' by now," Bierman said, eliciting laughter from the audience.

During a question-and-answer period, two women with children who attend Associated Hebrew Schools said they were surprised that despite an invitation to the forum that went home with every Associated student, only a handful of Jewish parents showed up to the meeting.

A tale of two men

The respective behaviours of these two men last week could not have been more contrasting.

From the editor's desk

The sad, poignant irony was much noted. Liviu Librescu, a professor at Virginia Tech, 76 years old, and himself a survivor of the Shoah, was killed on the day that the Jewish world stopped to commemorate Yom Hashoah.

"He blocked the door with his body so the killer wouldn't be able to get into the class," one of the Virginia Tech students said.

"I saw your husband still standing there," another student wrote Librescu's wife. "He was holding the door closed and looking over his shoulder to make sure everybody else was safe. It was the bravest thing I have ever seen, and I will always remember his courage."

The killer shot through the door, murdering the professor. But before he fell onto the floor, the blood spilling from his body and with it, the life he loved so very much, Librescu saved most of his students' lives.

By the time the murderer was able to get past Librescu and penetrate into the room, almost all of the professor's students had escaped to safety.

It is clearly true to say that Librescu knew with fateful certainty he was giving up his life so that his students would live.

In his typically powerful and incisive commentary in last Saturday's Globe and Mail titled "Virginia's generous hero," Rex Murphy observed that "the choice to give one's life to save another… never presents itself as inexplicable or irrational… It strikes us instantly as a noble and ultimately sensible thing to do. Good doesn't pose a mystery."

Murphy is correct. We are more perplexed at the choice of evil than we are at the choice of good. The doing of evil is unfathomable to the mind when conscience is more than a whisper. But in how many minds these days is conscience even a whisper? We must worry.

Husband. Father. Survivor. Israeli. Jew. Teacher. Liviu Librescu was all of these. But he was also self-sacrificing, the ultimate altruist and a true hero.

May his memory be for blessing.

Two days after the slaughter at Virginia Tech, former U.S. president Jimmy Carter was at the University of Iowa in Iowa City peddling his vile book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.

His audience was a large one. On a night when the shock waves from Virginia were still being felt, some 6,000 people turned out to hear this fuzzy Georgia peach promote his book. This must have pleased Carter's publisher as much as it appealed to his falsely modest vanity.

But it wasn't only the lies in his book that the former president came to sell. It was also the lies of his prejudice-laden political program that he was peddling to the good folks of Iowa City.

As reported by the JTA, Carter urged Iowa voters to screen out presidential candidates who don't take a "balanced" position between Israel and the Palestinians.

The former president told the large gathering that he chose the Iowa venue because of the state's special role in choosing presidential candidates due to the holding of early primaries there.

"The main reason I came to Iowa," JTA reported "is to make sure you knew you could shape an outcome in the 2008 presidential election. At least you can screen out candidates."

And which candidates did Carter urge his audience to screen out? He pleaded with them to reject candidates who did not take "a balanced position between Israel and Palestinians."

No special knowledge or sophisticated cipher is required to understand Carter's meaning. To the expert and lay person alike, a "balanced" position between Israel and the Palestinians is transparent code for bashing Israel.

As a great many other people have pointed out over the years, including the government of Canada quite recently, "balance" between a government that is dedicated to destroying its neighbour and one that is dedicated to finding a way of living side by side serves only the one intent on destruction.

Balance between a government that supports terrorism and one that supports the rule of law serves only the one intent on terror.

Carter has defamed the Jewish state with the most hateful and harmful of modern calumnies. He is now attacking Israel again, but in a different, more sinister way.

He is trying to incline American voters toward the Palestinians and thus away from Israel. But let us be clear. Toward the Palestinians means toward Ismail Haniyeh and Khaled Meshal's governing Hamas establishment and their publicly avowed purpose to "end the Zionist occupation."

This, of course, is more coded language, part of the rich lexicon of doublespeak and falsehood that includes "balance between the Palestinians and Israelis."

Jimmy Carter knows this as well. Then why, we ask, does he persist in his personal campaign?

CJC to choose new leader

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

With his term as president winding down, Ed Morgan will have to get used to living without his Secret Service detail, limousine travel, flights on board Air Force 1, dining with celebrities…

Oh wait, that's a different president.

As national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Morgan will have to give up countless meetings, long hours and being confused with others with the same title. Still, for the first time since 1995 in what is a fairly uncommon occurrence, two candidates will vie for the title of president of the Jewish advocacy organization.

Montrealer Sylvain Abitbol, former FEDERATION CJA president, and Ottawa Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka will contend for the position being vacated by Morgan after a three-year term. While the two longtime community volunteers will trawl for votes at the upcoming 28th Triennial Plenary Assembly, set for June 17 at the Agudath Israel Synagogue in Ottawa, two other heavyweights will do the same in another contested race for the proposed position of vice-president. Toronto economist Jack Mintz, president of the C.D. Howe Institute, and Pacific Region chair Mark Weintraub, who heads Congress' Darfur committee, are going head to head in the bid for the number two position at Congress.

In another race that should make the upcoming plenary a nail-biter, three candidates have put their names in the hat for the proposed position of secretary treasurer. Elizabeth Wolfe, a member of the president's advisory committee (that's the Congress president, not the one in Washington) will compete with Toronto lawyer Hershel Sahian and Toronto accountant Harold Brief.

Yet another race will see lawyer Igor Ellyn and historian Frank Bialystok vie for the position of chair of the Ontario region.

Morgan was elected by acclamation three years ago, and he acknowledged "there have been a lot of times" when officers faced no electoral opposition. The contested races this time "are part of the onward and upward path of the organization. It's glory days are in the present and future."

The elections are part of a changing of the guard that will also see substantial organizational alterations at Congress should proposed amendments to the bylaws pass. If implemented, the changes will see Congress adopt a structure akin to that governing corporations, with officers appointed by a board of directors. Until now, Congress has had a "complicated structure," Morgan said, with regional councils, a national executive and a national officers committee.

The proposal would see regional Congress representatives and delegates from Jewish federations indirectly elect the board. The 26-member board, in turn, would name officers.

Congress CEO Bernie Farber said if adopted, the new bylaw will give Congress "a more streamlined way to operate." It would also bring Congress' organizational structure in line with that of other North American Jewish organizations.

Farber said Congress would continue to be a democratic organization. "It is not a closed shop," he said. "There is a process for nominating from the outside to the board itself," while officers in Congress' regions would continue to be elected.

Looking back on his tenure as chief executive, Morgan said Congress has made strides in forging new relationships with other minority communities and reaching out to people on the political left.

"One program I set early in my tenure was to work more closely with aboriginal communities in Canada, and I think we made progress on that front," he said.

Improving the relationship not only broadens the number of allies the Jewish community can call on, but it involves Congress in a worthy cause, he said.

Working in conjunction with the Canada-Israel Committee, the community's pro-Israel lobby arm, Congress arranged a mission to Israel of national aboriginal chiefs. Other high-profile missions during Morgan's administration saw a group of Ontario mayors and Ontario police chiefs visit Israel.

A second key focus for Congress during his tenure was to improve relations with the left and labour unions. Some of the harshest critics of Israel come from the left. "We've made some headway there but we have a long way to go," Morgan said.

Congress has found "good support with the Auto Workers," but relations with the Ontario wing of the Canadian Union of Public Employees (CUPE) are problematic. Relations with the national CUPE organization are friendlier, he said.

Congress has been in regular dialogue with a number of churches and can boast a good relationship with evangelicals, Morgan said.

Referring to the United Church (UC), Morgan said, "I made a point to increase the depth of our relationship with the more left-leaning churches due to their pro-Palestinian stance." That paid some dividends at the UC's annual meeting, when a resolution calling for a boycott of Israel was defeated.

Farber noted that during Morgan's tenure, Congress joined with Hindus, gays and lesbians and moderate Muslims to call on the federal government to bar Riyadh ul Haq, a controversial British imam, from visiting Canada to address a conference.

Being invited to address the prestigious Canadian Telecom Summit, which brings together the world's largest telecom companies, on Internet hate and terrorism was another step taken under Morgan.

"We're trying to put together a committee of Internet service providers to develop protocols to address hate and terrorism that is promulgated on the Internet," Farber said.

Congress continues to lobby government on fighting terrorism, countering anti-Semitism and bringing Nazi war criminals to justice.

While the new president will no doubt set his own priorities, Morgan predicted that issues concerning "reasonable accommodation" of minorities, which are hot topics in Quebec right now, will become national in scope.

Legacy of Nuremberg leads to Iranian threat

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Holocaust Memorial Day event was billed as a panel discussion examining how the legacy of Nuremberg could be used to prevent future genocide, so the discussion naturally turned to Iran.

None of the speakers dissented from the premise that the Islamic Republic poses a danger to Israel and its Jewish inhabitants. As human right lawyer David Matas noted, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is an "active and aggressive" Holocaust denier; he has employed anti-Semitic rhetoric, threatened Israel with annihilation and embarked on a program to develop nuclear weapons while embracing an apocalyptic world view in which confrontation with enemies is cast in religious terms.

Taken together with the attack on the Jewish community centre in Argentina, the conclusion that Iran intends to inflict genocide on the Jewish people follows. As a result, as senior lawyer for B'nai Brith Canada, he has drawn up an indictment of Ahmadinejad charging him with incitement to genocide and has called on the government of Canada to implement it.

The document was available on a table outside the Donald Lamont Learning Centre at the Law Society of Upper Canada. The Law Society co-sponsored the discussion along with the League for Human Rights of B'nai Brith Canada.

Joining Matas as panelists were Payam Akhavan, associate professor in the Faculty of Law at McGill University and Jillian Siskind, senior policy advisor to the Ontario Minister of Community Safety and Correctional Services. The event was moderated by Adam Dodek, former chief of staff of the Attorney General of Ontario, and Holocaust survivor Faige Liebman presented closing remarks.

Panel discussion held on Holocaust Memorial Day

Akhavan noted several failures to prevent mass killings since the Holocaust and suggested that since genocide was a deliberate state-sponsored policy and an instrument of power, it would be more effective to develop a "culture of prevention" than calling for intervention to stop it. The killings in both Bosnia and Rwanda were preceded by incitement and "the Holocaust did not begin in gas chambers, but with the spreading of hatred against people," he said.

A Baha'i exile from Iran, Akhavan said "we are all part of the equation. We can't give responsibility only to our leaders. We must make this a political issue." He asked why people were more interested in reading about Monica Lewinsky's capers with former U.S. president Bill Clinton than in events unfolding in Rwanda. He also criticized Clinton for intoning "never again" while doing nothing to prevent the Rwanda slaughter.

Akhavan said the mass killings in Bosnia, Rwanda and Darfur "reflect the failure for what we stand for even while affirming our liberal virtues by paying lip service to human rights."

Turning to his homeland, he said Iran presents a central challenge to the rest of the world. Ahmadinejad is a danger not only to Israel, but to his own people. He suggested Ahmadinejad is promoting hatred of Israel to divert Iranians' attention from their own dire circumstances. His remarks "are a dying gasp of a regime that has lost all legitimacy with its people."

The average Iranian is not interested in confronting Tel Aviv or in funding Hezbollah, he said. "They want to be part of the world and all the government has on offer is anti-Israel and [anti-] U.S. propaganda."

He suggested Ahamdinejad should invite more ridicule than condemnation as condemnation cements his reputation as an Islamic warrior.

Instead of confronting Iran, or appeasing it as European states have done even while 300 Iranian dissidents were killed on their soil by Iranian agents, he called for a "third way." He suggested economic sanctions, travel bans, prosecution of Iranian killers and for Canada to champion individual freedom in Iran. He argued in favour of aligning with the many Iranian opponents of the regime, for indicting the Iranian prosecutor responsible for the murder of Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi, and for supporting women's and labour groups.

Matas said the indictment of Ahmadinejad was prepared because, "in my view, he has committed incitement to genocide against the Jewish people and we should do something about it."

Not only is the Iranian president guilty, but his discourse is likely to convince others to commit genocide, he asserted.

He dismissed critiques of the indictment – that it would be impossible to enforce, that Ahmadinejad's incitement is directed at Israel and not the Jewish people and that it would complicate negotiations to end the country's nuclear program – saying, "It would be a form of pressure on Iran."

Genocide has to be stopped at the incitement stage, so if the indictment influences Ahamdinejad to change his discourse, that in itself would be an accomplishment, he said.

Darfur, now

"Why do we have to be so negative?" Vitaly I. Churkin, the Russian ambassador to the United Nations, asked last week in spurning the call by U.S. President George W. Bush, scores of human rights advocates and countless concerned individuals around the world to proceed urgently with strong sanctions against the government of Sudan, in an effort to stop the genocide in Darfur.

And in that nugget of a throwaway comment, we see why the United Nations has been utterly ineffectual these past three years in coming to the rescue of the murderously persecuted Darfurians. Neither Churkin, his government nor other governments care enough. We can well imagine the irritation in the ambassador's voice as he tried to fend off the constant carping about Darfur – primarily from the West.

Churkin's comments came a day after Bush warned Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, that the time for "[Sudanese] promises is over." Choosing very deliberately to deliver his message at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, the U.S. president was referring to the disclosures in a new UN report that detailed the Sudanese leader's prevarication and lying. The report exposed how Sudan had disguised one of its own airplanes carrying bombs for use against the Darfur refugees to look like a UN plane.

At the request of UN Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon, Bush stopped short of proposing immediate sanctions. But he said they will soon be on the way. He also suggested that a no-fly-zone over Darfur might be imposed to prevent Sudanese aircraft from bombing and strafing villages. Ban apparently wants to give Bashir another – perhaps a last – opportunity to honour his past commitments to the UN to stop the killing. In any event, immediate UN sanctions against the Sudanese regime were not on the table because China, South Africa and Russia, not surprisingly, opposed them.

Over the past three years, more than 250,000 have been killed in Darfur, 2.5 million have been displaced from their homes and 3.5 million are at risk of starvation. It is to the everlasting disgrace and shame of the United Nations that the killing has not yet been stopped.

In the hope of saving the lives of the beleaguered people of Darfur, a number of human rights activists and NGOs have designated this week, April 23 to April 30, as Global Days for Darfur.

This past Shabbat, congregations in a number of synagogues across North America uttered prayers of hope and conviction on behalf of the people of Darfur. "We must act now, before it is too late," the various congregations cried out. Other faith communities have joined the effort.

Though our pleas may irritate the Russian ambassador to the UN and seem to him, perhaps, overly negative, let our voices ring out this week – and next – loudly, urgently, insistently.

The genocide of the people of Darfur must be stopped.

Completing the first phase of the Camp David Accords, Israel pulled out of the Sinai Peninsula after having razed the town of Yamit. Egypt regained control of the territory, which it had lost to Israel in the Six Day War in 1967. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak assured Israelis that his pursuit of peace was not a tactical ploy to get Israel out of Egyptian territory.

Democracy and the community

The gradual decline of Canadian Jewish Congress began in the 1970s (Perspectives, "Organized Canadian Jewry: 'CJC's glory days are long past,'" CJN, March 15). In Manitoba, there was a merger, in 1973, of the Winnipeg offices of CJC and the Welfare Fund into the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (now the Federation/Combined Jewish Appeal). While Federation/CJA has carried on certain Congress work, CJC in Winnipeg has become little more than a nameplate on the federation office door.

Nationally, Congress held three-day triennial plenary assemblies right through the 1990s. In the 21st century, however, the plenary assembly has been cut to a one-day event – a symbol of the reduced significance of CJC.

How did this come about? It is primarily due to the work of the "ad hoc group… of wealthy Jewish businesspeople" (CJN, March 15), who created the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy and took control of the Jewish community structure from the top to do increased advocacy for Israel. The long-held notion of CJC as the parliament of Canadian Jewry is no longer tenable, and democracy in the Jewish community has been replaced by a top-heavy corporate structure.

Judging from "The evolution of Canadian Jewish advocacy: CIJA shifts the focus" (Perspectives, CJN, March 22), the objective of the new bureaucratic community structure is to exert greater influence on the Canadian government regarding its policy toward Israel. With this end in mind, CIJA places great stress on the idea that a united Jewish community should speak with "one voice," especially regarding Israel.

Would anyone expect the Jews of Israel to speak with "one voice" or become a one-party state? Then why should the Jews in Canada be expected to become a one-voice or one-party community? If we live in a democracy, we should be able to maintain the democratic tradition within our community by recognizing the importance of diversity and acknowledging the right to dissent.

Faith, belief and 'Joe Religious'

In "On tradition" (CJN, March 22), Yoni Goldstein paints a disturbing portrait of the average religious Jew, named "Joe Religious," who remains tied to his religion based on practice rather than faith. His attempt to generalize his theory onto the masses of Torah-observant Jews is misleading. Faith and belief plays a far more important role in the life of a religious Jew than he would like to admit.

Certainly, the challenges to which Goldstein alludes are legitimate. There are times when prayers are recited by rote, although the Jewish calendar adds enough variety during the annual cycle to keep one invigorated. All human beings, let alone all Jews, have to contend with the challenges and ups and downs of life. "Joe Religious" will struggle with these challenges, but does not use them as an excuse to discard faith.

Throughout life, the religious Jew will talk to God, plead with God, and even argue with God. Hopefully, the religious person will also find ample opportunity to thank God for good things, and to recognize God's hand in the world. While traditional practice may very well be the grounding point, the life of "Joe Religious" is an encounter with the Divine.

Remembering June Callwood

Those who were privileged to know June Callwood, even through fleeting encounters, became instantly sensitized to her compassion, her generosity of spirit and her empathy for human suffering.

Callwood's intolerance of the abuse of human rights made her an ideal spokesperson for the Soviet Jewry advocacy campaign, the global struggle for Jewish emigration from the USSR. In April 1983, Callwood was selected by the Ontario Legislature Committee for Soviet Jewry to receive the Ida Nudel Humanitarian Award, which was created to promote the plight of Nudel, a prominent Moscow refusenik, exiled to Siberia for advocating for an exit visa and the liberation of Soviet Jewry.

June Callwood was a remarkable human being for whom there must be a distinct place in heaven.

For northern Israel, independence requires ongoing commitment

By ZEEV BIELSKI

Each year, Jews around the world mark our own special season of freedom and sovereignty that is ushered in by the Passover holiday and culminates two weeks after its finish in the celebration of Israel's Independence Day. With Israel's 59th anniversary this week, our ancient journey from Egypt is realized in the continued existence of the modern Jewish state.

But as we learn from these great holidays, freedom is not easily attained: The road is long and often filled with treacherous twists and turns. Still, it is a road that must be travelled, in every generation, individually and as a nation.

Zeev Bielski

Nearly 3,500 years ago, our ancestors embarked upon the journey to freedom that began when they left Egypt and ended when they finally crossed the Jordan River and entered Israel.

And again, in our own lifetimes, our parents and grandparents took the long path from exile to statehood. From scattered lands throughout the Diaspora, they made their way to the beacon of hope and promise that was the fledgling state created in 1948.

As we say during the Passover seder, "In every generation…" The challenge of freedom, the responsibility and the gift of freedom is again upon us in our own generation.

Israel's 58th year was not an easy one – the Second Lebanon War, the terrorizing threat of a nuclear Iran, unabated anti-Semitism abroad and the widening of socioeconomic gaps within Israeli society – all of these things took a toll on the hearts and minds of Jews.

Yet we are encouraged and inspired by the fact that when Israel was in danger, when our freedom was threatened, Jews around the world immediately came together to take action. The North American Jewish community should take pride in the magnificent way it galvanized, uniting in support for Israel when last summer's war in Lebanon broke out.

The result was one of the most successful emergency campaigns in modern history. Within a few weeks, more than $300 million (US) was raised to help Israelis under attack in the North.

We in Israel owe a deep debt of gratitude to the United Jewish Communities, Keren Hayesod and federations across the United States and Canada. The money they raised for the Israel Emergency Campaign allowed us to bring critical emergency support services directly to those citizens who were suddenly on the terrifying front line of the war zone. Within days of the war's outbreak, tens of thousands of northern Israelis received the support and assistance they so desperately needed.

More than 40,000 children from the north were brought to safety at sleep-away camps set up especially for them in the centre of the country.

Jewish Agency-supported teams, at risk to their own lives, went to public bomb shelters, providing first aid and sanitary supplies, and installing air conditioning units for these crowded, stifling underground shelters. They also brought in televisions and water and sanitation filtration systems.

Heavy rocket fire was mostly limited to the daytime, so our teams went out each night, reaching more than 2,000 shelters in communities and cities across northern Israel. Immediately following the ceasefire, the Jewish Agency mobilized its resources to rebuild the devastated north. Thousands of small businesses, bankrupt from the month-long war, were saved by Jewish Agency immediate emergency grants. More than 40,000 children are participating in after-school enrichment activities, moving from the trauma of war to recovery.

We sponsored scholarships for students drafted during the war to offset the summer jobs they lost: more than 9,000 students each received a $1,000 grant. To counter the alarming trend of plummeting student enrolment in northern colleges, we offered scholarships as an incentive to register and prevented severe social and economic shortfall.

A young boy sits in a bomb shelter in Kiryat Shmonah last summer. [Isranet photos]

As our rehabilitation of the north gained momentum, we also turned our attention south to Sderot and the Gaza perimeter communities, which are still being hit incessantly by Qassam rockets. Our grants to small businesses, scholarships to students studying in the regional colleges, after-school activities and summer camp alternatives for children are providing renewed hope and strength to the region.

Our work in the north is not complete. The Jewish Agency's efforts to revitalize the region's social and psychological fabric continue. We want to build schools, sports facilities and cultural centres. In order to strengthen the north, in order to return the spirit of resilience and purpose to its communities, education must be improved and business and high-tech entrepreneurship encouraged.

Over Passover, the Jewish Agency underwrote free admission to all nature reserves and national parks in the North. More than 20,000 people visited these sites per day. This is just the first of many steps we are taking to encourage tourism, thereby strengthening the economy of the region.

Israeli businessmen and entrepreneurs are joining the effort to revitalize the north. In January, the Jewish Agency secured its largest ever corporate pledge from the IDB group, Israel's largest holding company – 100 million shekels, or almost $25 million (US). The company, which holds assets of approximately $3 billion (US) and owns several Israeli Nasdaq-traded companies, committed to underwrite many of our projects in the north.

IDB's pledge is conditional upon a matching pledge from world Jewry. The company is ready to stand up, to invest in Israel's future and to pave a new road together with our North American partners. Redemption comes only by our own commitment, resolution and readiness. The challenge lies before us, but so does the opportunity, the chance to create a brighter future for those living in Israel's priority regions.

As we celebrate another year of Israel's independence, my message to you is this: propel forward the energy of unity and activism that gripped you in the midst of the Second Lebanon War. Bring that same dedication and determination with you as we continue to build Israel and forge an enduring path of freedom.

Zeev Bielski is chairman of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel.

The wisdom of 400 funerals

A new DVD and self-help book phenomenon has arrived: the Secret (www.thesecret.tv).

What is the Secret? It's the "Law of Attraction." "Based" on quantum physics, it asserts that our thoughts change the actual energy of the universe, reshaping reality. In other words, what you think physically changes the world. The "Law of Attraction" is "the secret to unlimited joy… everything you have ever wanted."

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

This is solipsistic superstition that only a narcissistic coward could love. It appeals to people who are afraid to accept how dangerous the world can be and are so self-absorbed that they think they can change the world with their own daydreams.

In real life, puppies die. Car accidents happen. Hurricanes occur. All the visualization in the world will not change this.

I know this because I'm a rabbi, and I've officiated at more than 400 funerals.

But I have a "secret" of my own. My excessive funeral attendance has actually left me with a renewed sense of purpose.

Every life is too short. I once attended the funeral of a 103-year-old woman and watched her daughter cry at the cemetery. Most people would accept 103 as a ripe old age. So why did the daughter cry? Anticipating my question, she said to me: "It doesn't matter when they go… it's always too soon."

Life is often bitter as well. As I prepare for the funeral with a deceased person's family, I often hear about struggles with bankruptcy, tragedy and illness. Indeed, personal difficulties are so ubiquitous one is inclined to agree with Buddha that "life is suffering."

But at these 400 funerals, I discovered something else: life is wonderful.

Eulogies are the core of a Jewish funeral. They come to honour the dead by explaining how the deceased made a difference. And sometimes, they do it with little things. Like how they hugged their grandchildren, or the corny jokes they used to tell that somehow brought smiles to everyone's faces. Even the shortest, toughest lives are filled with meaningful moments.

More inspiring are anecdotes of struggle. A father weakened by chemotherapy who takes his young son to the movies. A mother who makes a family dinner right after undergoing surgery. A grandfather who spends his final day writing a letter to his grandchildren.

At one such funeral, I came to a realization: The awareness that life is tough is a prerequisite to finding happiness.

Expecting everything to be alright sets you up for disappointment. If you truly want happiness, you have to fight for it. The only alternative to denial and cynicism is to become what I call a "happiness warrior."

Happiness warriors accept the harsh landscape of life and commit themselves to the battle for happiness.

That's my secret, the combined wisdom of 400 funerals.

Darfur: silence is consent

Darfur haunts me. In July 2004, I wrote an article protesting the Arab Janjaweed militias' brutality against farmers in the Sudan's northwestern region. The Janjaweed had murdered 30,000 people and displaced 1.2 million more. "How dare we sit, drinking our morning coffee," I wrote, "tut-tutting over evil without trying to fight it?"

Gil Troy in Montreal

Nearly three years later, more than 300,000 have been murdered, and we are still tut-tutting. True, there is enough Darfur awareness that people who want to telegraph their humanitarian bona fides invoke Darfur to position themselves as successors to Mother Teresa. And the Jewish community has responded far more effectively than most. But I remain haunted by Darfur, embarrassed by our silence, humiliated by our impotence, humbled by my own failure to help.

I used to criticize America and Canada for not doing enough during the Holocaust to save European Jewry. While both countries should have welcomed more refugees, I am more cautious in my condemnation. I watched the Rwanda genocide unfold. Former U.N. secretary general Kofi Annan and former U.S. president Bill Clinton, the dithering duo, did nothing. My friends and I did nothing that inconvenienced us. Now, we are equally numb regarding Darfur.

Fortunately, some of my students still believe they can change the world, or at least stop the slaughter. One, Evan Malach, organized "The Amazing Benefit Concert for Darfur" on the McGill campus, last November. A former student, Josh Scheinert, now studying at Osgoode Hall Law School, succeeded in getting the National Post to publish a series of articles by politicians and community activists this spring.

These initiatives are lovely, creative, inspiring, but will they help? Three years from now, will Evan, Josh and their allies look back as I do on my essay, with an overwhelming sense of failure drowning out what little pride they can muster because they, at least, tried? The answer lies not with them but with the rest of us.

We are overdue for a massive mobilization. We should write letters, make phone calls, contributing our time, efforts, creativity however we can. We should pressure western governments to sanction the Sudanese dictatorship, which facilitates the Darfur slaughter. We should donate money generously but vigilantly, making sure our charity goes to the needy, not the jackals who exploit western guilt and African misery. We need to learn other pressure points, such as boycotting the 2008 Beijing Olympics unless the Chinese stop supporting Sudan. We must demand that the United Nations prove it can stop Third World abuses, not just nitpick at Israel.

We also should help single-issue advocacy organizations connect the dots between their concerns and Darfur. Feminists should mobilize because women and girls are frequently raped, then branded, making the emotional trauma permanent. Environmentalists should galvanize because the murderers sometimes throw corpses into local waters to poison the water supply. Islamic leaders should respond because most of the criminals in this conflict – and the victims – are Muslim. African-Americans should react to the conflict's racist dimension, with the Arab Janjaweed militias targeting black tribal farmers in a push for Arab supremacy. And human rights groups should rally more vociferously, because this conflict's brutality demeans us all as fellow human beings.

The '60s cliché applies: silence is consent. True, Darfur is thousands of miles away. True, most of us have no real stake in the outcome. True, most of us are lucky enough to lead such comfortable lives we cannot imagine this catastrophe's dimensions. And true, we crowd our schedules with so many work, relationship and leisure time commitments we cannot carve out time for serious activism. That is why we must as a society stand up for Darfur. We need to act heroically, not only for the hundreds of thousands of good people in anguish, but for our own souls. Who are we as individuals, who are we as a people, if we stand idly by? And imagine what we can become as individuals, and as a nation, if we start learning how to be a strike force for justice. We must understand that even when we do not seem to have a stake in the battle for good – we do, and that when we try to save strangers, we are also saving our own souls.

On teaching religious studies

Recently someone asked me whether Jewish studies courses at universities were intended for Jewish students only. Were these courses, she asked, designed to foster religious belief and adherence to tradition? She wondered aloud whether there was at all a place in such courses for students of other religious, or students who professed no religious affiliation at all? Implicit in her questions, I understood, was the possibility that Jewish studies, and religious studies more broadly, may not really belong in a secular university.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Coincidentally, that very day I read a column in the New York Times that addressed the same issue, although from a different angle. Guest columnist Stanley Fish asserted that when religion is taught in a secular setting – be it the public school system or a liberal arts university curriculum – it must be taught in a manner that will "cut the heart out" of the subject.

In other words, Fish argues, the job of the university course is not to espouse the truth claims of any particular religion, but rather to describe, study and analyze the practices, rituals and beliefs of a diverse group of religions. In Fish's words, while "you can't – or shouldn't – teach religion… you can and should teach about religion."

Fish is a distinguished literary theorist with a strong interest in the 17th-century poet John Milton, as well as a professor of law. He became known for developing the concept of "interpretive communities" – that is, that the true meaning, the intended meaning, of a text, be it the Bible, Hamlet, or a contemporary novel, can never be fully known by its readers. Instead, readers make subjective, shared meaning of what they read, inheriting traditions of interpretation.

The same idea undergirded both my interlocutor's questions and Fish's column: that if religion could not be taught in a disinterested and purely analytical manner, it had no place in the university curriculum. Fish quoted the wry comment of his former colleague at Duke University's School of Law, Methodist theologian Stanley Hauerwas: "The only requirement for being a member of a religious study department is that you not believe in God."

However, Fish noted, there is a price for teaching religion in this detached, objective and relativistic way: you reduce it to "a set of stories and ritual practices bereft of any transcendent meaning." Fish juxtaposes the religious meaningfulness of the believer with the "empty shell" of the religious studies class.

As a professor of Jewish studies at York University, and as president of the Association for Jewish Studies, the academic society for professors in the field, I find myself often musing about the place of religious studies, and Jewish studies in particular, on campus. I agree with the contention that university courses can't be designed as religious advocacy programs. Instead, religious studies professors present descriptive and analytical frameworks for understanding religious practices and beliefs, with the goal of educating a diverse student body.

Yet I can't help thinking that Fish oversimplifies the dynamics of religious studies on university campuses. First, he polarizes believers and secularists. Religious studies professors and their students reflect a range of religious beliefs and adherences and relationships to their own faith communities. Second, his insistence on the dichotomy between what he considers the disinterested empirical knowledge of the university and true religious knowledge that can "save and transform" the individual is, in my observation, a false dichotomy.

Students enter into and come away from religious studies courses with a range of intellectual and spiritual curiosity and need. What they learn, and how they learn to think about, their own religion as well as the religions of others does, indeed, have the power to transform, alter, enrich, shake or deepen their relationship with religion.

On the one hand, students are evaluated on their mastery of the knowledge and analytic abilities developed in the course in ways that have nothing to do with the spiritual life or ritual practice of the students or their professors. On the other hand, religious studies courses often set in motion an inner dynamic that has an afterlife long after the ink has dried on the university transcript.

The Kirshner File

Ehud Olmert has weathered a turbulent year

It has been an extremely difficult and tumultuous year for Ehud Olmert, Israel's politically besieged leader and one of its weakest, least respected prime ministers.

A seasoned, wily politician who was first elected to the Knesset at the tender age of 28, he became an accidental prime minister after his boss, Ariel Sharon, suffered a massive stroke in January 2006 and was sidelined. Standing in for Sharon as acting prime minister, Olmert called general elections as the head of the newly formed centrist Kadima party. Winning a plurality of 29 seats, he formed a government and presented it to the Knesset on May 4. Five months later, in an attempt to shore up his shaky coalition, he brought hawkish Avigdor Lieberman and his Yisrael Beiteinu party into his government, thereby gaining control of 78 of 120 parliamentary seats.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

From almost the moment he replaced Sharon – the prime minister who unilaterally pulled out of the Gaza Strip and vaguely promised more withdrawals from the West Bank – Olmert faced turbulence and uncertainty.

Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement, soundly and surprisingly defeated Fatah – the party of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas – in elections and thus obliterated the chances of a pragmatic accommodation between Israel and the Palestinians. To this day, Olmert boycotts Hamas, which refuses to recognize Israel or renounce terrorism and, following an agreement in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, recently formed a coalition government with Fatah.

Ehud Olmert

Within five months of Hamas' electoral victory, Palestinian militants from Gaza attacked an Israeli border post, killed two soldiers and kidnapped a third, Gilad Shalit. Israel responded with limited incursions into Gaza designed to find Shalit and stop the firing of Qassam missiles into Israeli territory. But 10 months on, Shalit remains imprisoned and Qassam rockets continue to terrorize Israeli settlements, particularly the town of Sderot. Israel and the Palestinians negotiated a truce last November, but it has been repeatedly violated, primarily by Islamic Jihad, which rejected the very idea of ceasefire. Now the question is whether Israel will reinvade Gaza and try to pacify it.

Shortly after the troubles in Gaza boiled over, Olmert faced a crisis in Lebanon, caused when Hezbollah, an Iranian client, attacked an Israeli patrol on Israeli soil, killed three soldiers and kidnapped two others, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev. The clash escalated when an Israeli tank crossed into Lebanon and was ambushed, with further Israeli casualties. Olmert could have ordered a perfunctory retaliatory strike, or simply left it at that, the tactic Israel adopted in the autumn of 2000, when Hezbollah abducted three Israeli soldiers soon after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from southern Lebanon. Instead, Olmert and his defence minister, Amir Peretz, went to war, hoping to retrieve Goldwasser and Regev, destroy Hezbollah's considerable capabilities and restore Israel's military deterrence.

In short, the 34-day war ended inconclusively. Israel conducted itself with neither resolve nor daring, nor was it able to end the daily barrage of Hezbollah missiles, which displaced hundreds of thousands of Israelis, paralyzed the Galilee, dealt a body blow to Israel's economy and underscored Israel's vulnerability, despite its status as the region's pre-eminent military power.

Accused of mismanaging the war on an epic scale, Olmert emerged from the fighting very much battered. Olmert argued that Israel had pushed back Hezbollah from its armed positions along the border and had persuaded the United Nations to upgrade its peacekeeping force, UNIFIL, there. But to no avail. Judging by his sagging popularity in a succession of public opinion polls, most Israelis berated his leadership qualities and called for his resignation. Olmert has ignored these calls and held fast, unlike the chief of staff, Gen. Dan Halutz, who finally stepped down in January after his performance during the war was widely castigated.

Yet Olmert's day of reckoning looms. The Winograd Committee, which has been investigating the second war in Lebanon, is due to release its report in a matter of days, and if Olmert comes off badly, he may have no alternative but to resign, or call new elections. A precedent has already been set. In the wake of the Yom Kippur War, the prime minister, Golda Meir, and the defence minister, Moshe Dayan, both resigned after the Agranat Commission found their respective performances wanting.

Ariel Sharon

Olmert's woes are magnified by internal scandals that have rocked his cabinet. Haim Ramon, the justice minister, had to resign after being charged with sexual harassment. Avraham Hirschon, the finance minister, and Avigdor Yitzhaki, the Kadima whip, are being investigated for financial impropriety. Tzachi Hanegbi, chair of the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee, is under investigation for cronyism. Olmert himself is also ethically challenged. Not only does he face a criminal investigation over his involvement in the sale of Bank Leumi stocks, but the state comptroller is currently examining the terms under which he sold his residence in Jerusalem.

Should Olmert be forced out, there will be no shortage of putative successors – notably Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz (the ex-chief of staff), Construction and Housing Minister Meir Sheetrit and Internal Security Minister Avi Dichter.

If he survives the scrutiny of the Winograd Committee, Olmert may be able to deal more effectively with the Palestinian file. In his first major policy speech after filling in for Sharon, Olmert declared that Israel would have to relinquish large parts of the West Bank to maintain its Jewish majority and character and would have to acquiesce to the establishment of a sovereign Palestinian state.

Sharon, in a gradual retreat from his previous views, broadly enunciated these principles. But Olmert elaborated upon them in far greater detail and more boldly and spoke of the need for "painful concessions." Like Sharon, he opted for a unilateral approach to withdrawals from the West Bank. But after last summer's war in Lebanon, he switched course and, with the active encouragement of the United States, decided to engage the Palestinians in bilateral talks. Since then, he has met with Abbas several times to discuss current issues, but, in light of the fact that Abbas has entered into a partnership with Hamas, Olmert has stricken final status core issues from the agenda.

Olmert has basically rejected Saudi Arabia's peace plan, which envisages a complete Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and the Golan Heights and a "just resolution" of the Palestinian refugee problem, but he thinks that there are "positive" elements in it, and that a comprehensive agreement with the Arabs is possible.

In the meantime, Olmert has rebuffed overtures from Syria's president to resume talks, claiming that Bashar Assad merely wants a peace process rather than real peace in order to ingratiate Syria with the United States.

Whatever his beliefs, Olmert may not be around too much longer, given his abysmal approval ratings. It will be left to one of his successors to try to make peace with the Arabs.

Yom Hashoah marked in Toronto schools

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

At last week's Yom Hashoah commemoration organized by Grade 12 students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill campus, Yael Feinberg and Adam Kleinberg were among several students whose personal connection to the Holocaust brought a special poignancy to the ceremony.

"My name is Yael Malka Feinberg, and I was named for my grandfather's aunt, whose name was Malka, and who perished in the Holocaust," Feinberg told her schoolmates. Kleinberg, her co-chair, said he was named for his great-grandfather Aizik Treibictz, who survived the Holocaust.

The theme for this year's commemoration – which included a morning program at Shaar Shalom Synagogue, an afternoon program at the school, and a third program in the evening for parents, family and friends – was "family." The students heard survivor speakers and discussed issues such as ethics in the Holocaust and current responsibilities.

"There was a large emphasis on [the ongoing genocide in Sudan's Darfur region]," Kleinberg said.

Other Jewish schools marking the solemn occasion included Associated Hebrew Schools and Leo Baeck Day School.

At Yorkhill Elementary School in Thornhill, an assembly will be held April 25. Harriette Fleising, a teacher at the school, organized the event and planned a unit of study to precede it, so that students could learn about the survivors who will take part in the assembly. Fleising, who organized a similar event last year, has been recognized by the York Region School Board for her efforts in anti-racist education.

Students Brandon Schwartz and Tessa Etkin-Silver serve as MCs at Leo Baeck Day School's Yom Hashoah assembly last week.

At nearby Brownridge Public School, a conference called "Together in Harmony" took place March 30 for students from grades 5 through 8.

The event was organized "to celebrate inclusiveness" and was timed in between Black History Month, the International Day for the Elimination of Racism and Holocaust Remembrance Day, said teacher-librarian Annabel Wong.

The event featured 16 workshops and talks by Holocaust survivors Rosalind Goldenberg and Faigie Libman. Keynote speaker Mosa Neshama McNeilla was chosen because of the "powerful message communicated by her diverse heritage," which includes Grenadian, Jewish, Scottish, Romanian and African roots, Wong said.

This year's commemoration at Leo Baeck's Thornhill branch was a 90-minute assembly attended by middle school students in grades 6, 7 and 8, as well as – for the first time – their survivor grandparents and great-grandparents. Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld blessed the survivors and students presented them each with a single rose.

Among the speakers was Ursula Miller, a great-grandmother of two students at the school, who talked about her experiences as a survivor of the S.S. St. Louis. The ship, which left Germany for Havana in 1939 filled with Jewish refugees, was denied entry to Cuba, the United States and Canada before being forced back to wartime Europe.

Assembly organizer Shari Standil, who teaches a Holocaust unit as part of Grade 6 social studies, said she tells her students that "before long we won't have the primary sources and that it will be our responsibility… to remember [what happened in the Holocaust] and pass it on to future generations."

Associated ran an all-day program featuring time with survivors including Gerda Frieberg, who spoke to Grade 7 students, and CBC reporter Joe Schlesinger, who spoke to Grade 8s. The Vienna-born journalist, whose parents were killed in the Holocaust, was sent to England as a child to escape the war.

Associated's program aimed to put "a face on the individuals and communities that were affected by the Holocaust rather than focusing solely on the atrocities that occurred," the school said in a news release.

Teacher aims to help autistic kids become independent

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As a teacher of autistic children at Zareinu Educational Centre, Chen Pascoe says she has to be "a bit of a detective.

"Every parent of a kid with autism will tell you that. You have to know your child very well."

In Pascoe's applied behaviour analysis (ABA) class, she has five mainly non-verbal students ranging in age from six to 14, and five assistants who work with her as a team.

People sometimes tell her she works with "a tough crowd," but she does not believe in using that kind of terminology, she said in a Passover interview at her home where she lives with her Toronto-born husband Ron, who is also a teacher, and their one-year-old son. Pascoe immigrated from Israel shortly after their marriage six years ago, and they are expecting their second child this summer.

According to the website of Autism Treatment Services of Canada, autism is a syndrome that affects communication skills, behaviour and ability to engage in social interaction. Pascoe's class at Zareinu, a school for children with physical and developmental challenges, is unusual because it incorporates ABA therapy into every aspect of the class, Pascoe said.

A native of Bat Yam, a coastal city south of Tel Aviv, Pascoe knew early on that she wanted a career in which she could help people. After her Israel Defence Forces service as a naval intelligence researcher from 1993 to 1995, she entered Tel Aviv University, where she pursued a double major in English literature and special education.

Chen Pascoe

A lesson from the teacher: "Many people say, 'You work in special education; you must have a lot of patience.' It's not about patience. It's about trying to look at things from the students' perspective. Then you're not judgmental, and you don't put any of your own baggage on it."

In her third year, she experienced a turning point, when she had to choose a practicum and narrow her field of study.

"One of the places we toured was a school for the autistic – and that was it.

"I thought it would be really interesting. I was kind of amazed by the way these kids were. The way they behaved and the way they thought was interesting. I wanted to get into how they were seeing the world," she said.

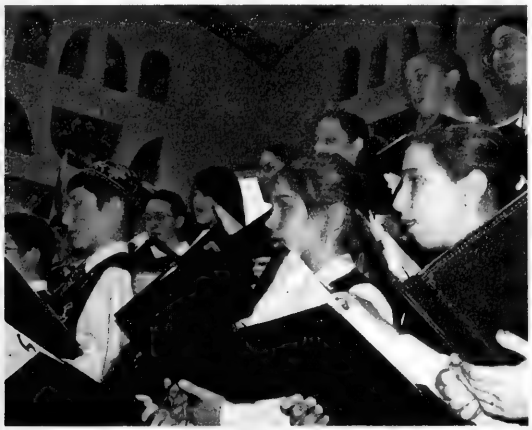
However, her advisor told her to visit the school again before committing to the program. She did, and her decision was "reinforced, definitely."

Pascoe, who joined Zareinu in 2003, has studied ABA with the Geneva Centre for Autism and the Autism Partnership, which serves as a consulting agency for her class. She has also studied the Miller Method, an autism therapy that, like ABA, uses small, incremental steps.

Pascoe says her class is "flexible" for an ABA program. The yoga devotee sought and received the approval of the school's occupational therapist to use yoga with her students as a means of incorporating relaxation and exercise into the class.

In addition to academic skills like reading, math and writing, Pascoe tries to "work on the social aspect as much as possible. For them to greet each other and use names… is a major task.

"The idea is to make [the students] as functional and independent as possible. We facilitate all the time, and at the same time, we have to teach them how to do things themselves… but not frustrate them. It's a fine balance."



YOM HAZIKARON: A crowd estimated at 1,300 people gathered at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation Sunday night to pay tribute to more than 22,000 soldiers who have lost their lives fighting for Israel. Clockwise from top left, attendees sign a petition to return abducted Israeli soldiers; the Renanim Youth Choir; Israeli consul general Ya'acov (Cobie) Brosh; Miriam Inbar, recalling her uncle who was killed in the Six Day War; and the Blue & White choir. [Frances Kraft photos]

MAKING SENSE OF INVESTING

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

We must all act on 'Never again'

By RABBI JASON ROSENBERG

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

It was Rabbi Harold Kushner who said that the greatest moral leap in Jewish history, possibly in world history, was the injunction that Jews should always look out for the powerless, because we were once slaves in Egypt.

Why was this such a revolutionary idea? Because human nature seems to dictate that in reaction to feeling oppressed, we find someone else to oppress in turn. This is one of the major impulses behind hazing, for example – I remember what it felt like to be powerless and taken advantage of, so now that I have the power, I will find someone else on whom I can visit equal suffering. And so, oppression leads to oppression and creates what seems to be an unbreakable chain of suffering.

But our God commanded us to think differently. Rather than lash out, we are commanded to remember the feeling of being helpless and tortured. Indeed, one of the major goals of Pesach (which is only a week past as I write this) is to ritually relive that suffering, year after year, so that we never forget, as a people, what it felt like. We hold dear the memory of our time as the oppressed, so that when we see someone else who is suffering, we will empathize with them – we will literally feel some of their pain, and therefore, we will find ourselves compelled to act.

This is why it is so important that each and every one of us be involved in a response to the ongoing genocide in Darfur. Right now, as you read this, the killing continues in the Darfur region of Sudan, and the world stands by and watches, with a few words of condemnation and no real effort to stop the slaughter. We can be thankful and proud that members of the Jewish community have been at the forefront of the groups that are speaking out. For example, the American Jewish World Service created the Save Darfur Coalition (www.SaveDarfur.org), one of the most important Darfur education and advocacy groups. In many synagogues and campuses, Jews are trying their best to get the word out that something must be done. There are other examples.

But still, on the whole, the reaction of our community has been insufficient. There are pockets of noble effort, to be sure, but there isn't the feeling that the Jewish world has, in an overall way, gotten involved. We aren't mobilized as a people to stop yet another genocide, this one happening before our very eyes. Every single member of our community has a responsibility to do something, anything, to try to bring an end to this atrocity. Write a letter to Stephen Harper, or your member of Parliament, demanding that Canada take a leadership role in calling for a real response to the murders. Write a letter to the editor, urging constant coverage of the slaughter. Attend a rally. Talk to a friend. Speak for those who have no voice.

Like many of us, I grew up as part of a generation for whom "Never again!" was a rallying cry. I always assumed that it meant that we would never let any people, anywhere, face genocide. That we would do everything in our power to save anyone who faced annihilation, as we did, not so long ago.

Excuse the chutzpah, but anyone who doesn't try to do at least a little bit to bring an end to the Darfur genocide should probably stop saying "Never again," and perhaps start staying "Never again – to us." Our history demands more of us, as does our God. Act now. Never again!

Rabbi Jason Rosenberg is an associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple in Toronto.

Holy shall you be

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Midrashic Moments

In the Torah readings coming up, we encounter lengthy and interesting lists of things that we must never do and things that we must always do. There are people we must never be intimate with and crimes we must never commit. Essentially, we are told, we should not adopt any immoral or criminal behaviours that we see in the cultures that surround us. There is a "Jewish" way to do things, and although it can't always be defined, we know what it is.

In a subsequent portion, we read a very bold and frightening statement.

Moses is told to speak to all of the Children of Israel and tell them, "You shall be holy, for I, your God, am holy." The bar has been raised as high as it can go. Not only must we be holy, but our standard of holiness is set by God. The frightening aspect of this is that it speaks of an outcome rather than an intention. It does not say, "Try to be holy" or "Put your heart and your might toward being holy," but rather "Holy shall you be."

The text then lists certain prohibitions with regard to idolatry, sacrifice, agriculture and interpersonal relations. It covers areas of justice, fairness and emotional responses. It's not enough not to hurt your fellow human being, but you must also not hate this person secretly in your heart. We must remember that the standard is God's holiness, and, therefore, matters of the heart are also known and considered. This is the portion where we learn the famous Jewish standard, "You shall love your fellow person as yourself."

Even how we treat the trees around us is an expression of our holiness and our relationship with God. We do not prune a tree or take of its fruit for the first three years of its life. Many families extend this to the practice of not cutting the hair of a child for the first three years. Whether agriculture or society, the list touches on everything. We are forbidden to oppress or take advantage of foreigners or anyone less fortunate than ourselves.

The standard of holiness applied in this portion refers to the community and the collective of the Jewish people, since the word appears in the plural. Yet, a holy community must consist of righteous individuals, and rabbinic literature tells us that these people are few and far between.

The Talmud tells us that a righteous person does the right thing because it is right, whereas sin is motivated by gain. According to a passage in Sanhedrin, there are 36 righteous individuals upon whom the entire world sustains itself. One of these 36 cannot die until a new one is born to take their place. We do not know who they are, since part of true righteousness is humility, which means they themselves don't know who they are. They are not honoured – no dinners offered as tributes to them, and no buildings are named for them.

Yet, righteous people consistently give us two things: words and deeds. Their deeds change the world, as the midrash states: "'Let there be light,' these are the deeds of the righteous," and they leave behind an eternal legacy, as the rabbis say: "No monuments need be set up for the righteous, their words are their monuments."

A Jewish community can only strive for holiness when the individuals within diligently strive for righteousness. It's a personal journey with universal ramifications.

Mari, myth and the Patriarchs

By ALEX GROPPER

Like Ugarit, which I wrote about in an earlier column, Mari was one of those blockbuster sites that was discovered during the interwar years. It was also similarly located in the French Mandate of Syria, which produced a wealth of archeological riches, unlike the British Mandate of Palestine whose archeological sites were nowhere near as spectacular in terms of either their size or the written documents that were found therein.

Past Forward

As with the other sites, Mari was discovered accidentally by wandering Bedouins. Almost immediately, a large archive with more than 20,000 cuneiform tablets was found in a spectacular palace on the site. Some 5,000 of these tablets detail royal correspondence between the rulers of Mari and those of other nearby kingdoms. The most famous of these other rulers is the legendary Hammurabi of Babylon, noted for his famous law code, which was discovered in the 19th century and is on display in the Louvre. (Ironically it was Hammurabi who destroyed Mari c. 1750 BCE).

When the Code of Hammurabi was discovered, scholars noted parallels between it and some of the materials in the Tanach, especially the section talking about an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. Mari would provide scholars with more biblical parallels.

Prof. Abraham Malamat, now retired from the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, has devoted many decades to the study of Mari and its biblical connections. I had the pleasure of meeting Malamat on a number of occasions and interviewed him for a series I did on the Bible and Archeology for the CBC radio series, IDEAS.

In one of the documents he studied, Malamat discusses an inventory of tin bound for the important biblical site of Hazor located in the Upper Galilee, which was excavated in the late 1950s by the noted Israeli archeologist, Yigael Yadin (who in addition to his archeological work on such places as Masada and the Dead Sea Scrolls, was deputy prime minister of Israel under Menachem Begin at the time of the Camp David Accords in 1979).

The Mari documents belong to a sophisticated cosmopolitan era called the Middle Bronze Age (c. 1750 BCE). It was into this milieu that some scholars attempted to place the Patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac and Jacob) a few generations ago, primarily under the tutelage of the great American biblical scholar, William Foxwell Albright.

In fact, one of the documents mentions a group called the Beni Yamini, which has obvious affinities to the tribe of Benjamin in the Bible except that in the Semitic language used at Mari the name translates as "sons of the left hand," a literal use of the term "southerners." Werner Keller made use of this fact in his popular best-seller of the 1950s, The Bible As History.

Nowadays most archeologists have given up looking for physical evidence of the Patriarchs. David Noel Freedman, the editor of the Anchor Bible Series, and a pupil of Albright's, attempted to unsuccessfully link them to the discovery of the Ebla tablets in the 1970s. Most scholars confine the Patriarchs to the realm of myth, which the noted Harvard classical scholar Gregory Nagy defined for me once as "society's way of explaining universal truths," an apt definition for something that eludes physical proof.

The question of Patriarchal historicity is now part of the minimalist-maximalist debate, although there are not many scholars today who see the Patriarchs as actual historical figures.

But who knows – shifting sands at some undiscovered site in the Fertile Crescent may yet reveal a new discovery that would once more force us to rewrite history, causing the past to move forward in an unknown direction. This is what makes archeology such a fascinating subject. Despite physical appearances, nothing is ever fully written in stone.

Yom Ha'atzmaut online, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This week Israel began its 60th year of independence. To mark the occasion, we're looking at six ways to celebrate the event. We've already covered three of them: Hebrew, Israeli food and Israeli TV. Today, the final three.

Tour the country.

Even if you're not lucky enough to be in Israel right now, you can still relive memories of your last trip or plan for your next one.

Israel's Ministry of Tourism has created a lovely online map of the country. View Israel's 19 geographic regions and zoom in to find more information about attractions, accommodations and highway distances. [www.eyeonisrael.com/]

As well, there is GoogleMaps, which gives you a satellite's eye view of the country. This link will take you to the highest resolution of Jerusalem's Old City. [http://tinyurl.com/35yj5j] Unfortunately, you can't zoom in quite as closely as you might like. I had read stories in the past that said Google had agreed to limit its satellite resolution of some sensitive areas of Israel. But according to ynetnews.com, Israel now gets the same satellite treatment as the rest of the world. [http://tinyurl.com/lxwk8]

One of my favourite Israeli tourism sites isn't the work of a government ministry but of one person with an obvious love of the country. I'll let Shulamit Levin provide her own introduction to her hundreds of photographs of the country: "This page comes to show you how beautiful is Israel. All the photos here were taken by me during my vacations around the country. This is my way of trying to show the world that we here live normal life in spite of the huge efforts to portray us Israelis as the only cause of trouble in the world." [http://tinyurl. com/2umgpl]

For video, you can watch a somewhat government gimmicky travel ogue that does have some very good photography. [http://tinyurl.com/2q34rm] And appropriate for Israel's birthday, I came across on YouTube a somewhat retro clip, circa 1970, created by British Pathe. You'll learn that you can visit the country "in jet age luxury," that "in Israel it's easy to get obsessed with the ancient but hard not to appreciate the modern," and that this is a place where "the new and the old mingle in jumbled juxtaposition." [http://tinyurl.com/2nbalh]

Spend – and donate – online.

From sandals to soap to silver, you can buy some of the best Israeli goods online. Many merchants have created their own commercial websites and Jacob Richman's Shopping Hotsite points to dozens of them. [http://tinyurl.com/2s6f6r] ShopInIsrael .com has plenty more. [http://tinyurl.com/2rw5g2]

Although I have not encountered problems shopping online, you should always take a few precautions before you send money over the web. Check my previous article for details. [http://tinyurl.com /2rodnr]

If you'd like to donate money to an Israeli charity, you'll find many interesting causes online. [http://tinyurl.com/39ql5k] For some lesser-known recipients, I always like to see which charities the Ziv Tzedakah Fund recommends. [http://tinyurl.com/2rms v6] Always check out a charity's track record before you donate. If you'd prefer to give to Israel through your local federation, Canadian contact information can be found here. [http://tinyurl.com/2ons8v]

Sing and dance.

Israelis and Jews around the world have a special love for Israeli folk dancing. Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs has traced the importance of dance in both communal and religious Jewish life. [http://tinyurl.com/3xd99z]

If you want to brush up on a classic dance or learn a new one, then head to IsraeliDances.com. This incredible resource has information about thousands of dances as well as choreographer information and links to instructional video clips. [www.israelidances.com/]

IsraeliDances.com was created by the Jewish Australia Online Network, the same marvellous people responsible for Hebrew Songs.com. Have you forgotten the lyrics to Bashana Haba'a, Hafinjan or Abanibi? They're all there along with about 4,000 others. [www.hebrewsongs.com/]

Complete your musical tribute to Yom Ha'atzmaut by singing Hatikvah. But to do your rendition real justice, go beyond the familiar lyrics and sing the original version of the poem – all nine stanzas! [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hatikvah]

BBYO ALUMNI GATHER: Last fall, a small committee of BBYO alumni gathered to discuss ways to reconnect with the organization. The group represented four decades of alumni from across the country who all spoke of the way their involvement with BBYO had contributed to their adult lives. They decided to try to establish an alumni network in Toronto. The result was an event held at a local restaurant last month, where 99 people came from as far away as Vancouver and Israel to reconnect, reminisce and learn about the organization today. Among those in attendance were, from left, Cheryl Bernknopf, Selena Kovshoff-Picov, Nate Cantor; Brenda Edson, Susan Lieberman, Ken Bernknopf and Richard Gayne.

Israeli Arabs said torn between two worlds

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Arabs in Israel are torn between their Israeli citizenship and their Arab national identity, but are an integral part of the State of Israel, an Arab legal scholar said here last week.

Mohammed Saif-Alden Wattad, a member of the Israeli bar and a graduate of Haifa University's law school, made the comments at a New Israel Fund of Canada forum at the First Narayever Congregation.

Currently a visiting scholar at the University of Toronto, he said that this dichotomy clearly manifested itself when some Israeli Arabs condemned Israel during last summer's war in Lebanon.

But as they expressed criticism of Israel's military actions, Hezbollah rockets rained down on Israeli Arab villages, killing as many Arab civilians as Jewish ones.

Mohammed Saif-Alden Wattad

Wattad, who was born and raised in the Israeli Arab village of Jatt and whose father is also a lawyer, said that Israeli Arabs are required to be loyal to Israel, even when faced with a conflict pitting their Israeli citizenship against their sense of Arab solidarity.

In reply to a series of questions from Ed Morgan, national president of the Canadian Jewish Congress and a law professor at U of T, Wattad said that Israel's security should be of the utmost importance to both Israeli Arabs and Jews, and no one should be permitted to undermine it.

Declaring that Israeli Arabs care about Israel, Wattad said that they have proven their loyalty through two Palestinian uprisings since 1987.

A fellow of the Halbert Exchange Program at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre, and a former law clerk to Israeli Supreme Court justice Dalia Dorner, Wattad suggested that Israeli Arabs have made significant strides forward since the abolition of military rule in their villages in 1966.

A minority comprising about 20 percent of Israel's population, they are the descendants of Palestinian Arabs who remained in Israel after the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948.

Wattad, who presented what the New Israel Fund said was "an encouraging" and "positive" view of the status of Israeli Arabs, nevertheless observed that they remain victims of discrimination.

As an example, he said that Arab municipalities and schools do not receive their fair share of state funds.

Wading into sensitive territory, Wattad admitted that Israeli Arabs are troubled by certain Jewish symbols, namely Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah, and its flag, which features the Magen David.

Out of respect to his Israeli citizenship, he explained, he has no problems chanting the words to Hatikvah. But he acknowledged that most Israeli Arabs do not share his sentiments.

Later in his talk, however, Wattad called on Israel to modify the anthem and the flag so that its lyrics and symbols reflect the presence of its large Arab minority.

Asked to comment on the Law of Return, which allows Diaspora Jews to claim immediate Israeli citizenship upon immigrating to Israel, Wattad expressed understanding why Jews do not want to be a minority in their own state.

But he immediately added that Israeli Arabs should be able to regain lost properties expropriated by Israel, and failing that, should be duly compensated.

Addressing another pivotal issue, Wattad said that all Israeli Arabs should serve in the army, which at present they are not required to do.

But Israeli Arabs who fail to serve should not be penalized, he added, saying that it is "idiotic."

Wattad, who holds an MA and a PhD from Columbia University, said that he was fortunate enough to be brought up by open-minded parents who never regarded Jews as "the other" and who abhorred extremism.

Indeed, their middle-of-the-road values had an impact on him and his siblings, he said.

Prior to his appearance in Toronto, Wattad delivered similar speeches in Montreal and Ottawa.

Yom Hazikaron

Ottawa remembers Israel's fallen

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Like all Israelis, Alan Baker, the Jewish state's ambassador to Canada, has personal memories on Yom Hazikaron, Israel's remembrance day for fallen soldiers.

"I asked to read [K'el Maleh Rachamin] because this prayer, on this day, to me, is extremely meaningful. Both as ambassador and as a reserve officer in the IDF [Israel Defence Forces], I felt that I have to read this prayer in Ottawa this evening," Baker said at the community commemoration held at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC) on April 22.

He and his family have served in the IDF and have known and lost friends and relatives who also served.

The largest hall in the SJCC was packed, with standing room only and people lining the walls and the back of the room, as the flag was lowered to half-mast and a siren was sounded, signalling a moment of silence in memory of those who died in defence of Israel.

Jonathan Freedman, on behalf of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, asked Baker to "convey to the country of Israel our thoughts today and our feelings that even though we are not with them physically, we are with them daily in spirit." Freedman is also the parent of Liat Ben-Choreen who is currently serving in the IDF. Ben-Choreen's message to the community was read by her sister, Tal-Or Ben-Choreen.

A selection of readings by members of the community with strong ties to Israel included a poem read by Anna-Lee Chiprout and Annie Elliot, who have worked together for several years on joint Jewish-Christian initiatives of support for Israel.

Sisters Irit Beck and Noga Reiss lit a memorial candle in memory of their brother, Yoram Shiloni, who lost his life nearly 35 years ago while serving in the IDF. Jane and Martin Gordon, whose son Ben Kates is currently serving, accompanied them.

Kates, who has been living in Israel for three years and serving in the IDF for a year and a half, was present at the ceremony and shared his thoughts. "Too many families in Israel have to face this sorrow [of losing a loved one in battle.] Today is a day to remember that we still have soldiers in captivity and that their fate is not known," he said.

The stories of the three soldiers taken captive at the beginning of last summer's hostilities, Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, were read in Hebrew and English by students Eyal Podolsky, Topaz Hershkovitz, Melina Rymberg, Shira Benlolo and Racheli Manderker.

Rabbi Steven Garten of Temple Israel reflected on the Battle of Vimy Ridge and the soldiers who fought and lost their lives there in World War I. "I have a sense that there will never be a monument, as there is at Vimy Ridge, in our homeland of Eretz Yisrael. There will only be the graves that mark special spots of loved ones, because we are a people for which there is no world mourning of our losses. There is only our mourning."

He sent a message to the people of Israel that Canadians are with them in spirit.

The children's choir from Hillel Academy day school concluded the ceremony.

STUDENTS REMEMBER

School children in Tel Aviv participated in a Memorial Day ceremony on Monday, April 23. Sirens sounded throughout the country as Israelis stood to attention to honour those who had lost their lives to keep Israel secure since its foundation. Ceremonies were held in 43 military cemeteries throughout Israel, attended by families, friends and official representation.

Raptors star encourages community support for Walk With Israel 2007

Annual event takes to the streets of Toronto May 27

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Anthony Parker, one of the most popular Toronto Raptors, is taking a short time-out from the court to encourage Torontonians to show their support for Israel. A former player for Maccabi Tel Aviv, the 6-foot-6 basketball star recently recorded a message for UJA Federation's Walk With Israel 2007, which will be shown to students at Jewish schools and made available online.

"I loved living in Israel and playing for Maccabi Tel Aviv," Parker says in the message. "I also love three pointers, so here's three points to consider: the walk is a great way to show Israel how much you care, it's fabulous fun, and there's the RioCan carnival at Exhibition Place after the Walk ends."

During his five-year stint with Maccabi Tel Aviv, Parker led the team to five Israeli National Championships, five Israeli National Cups, three Euroleague championships, and a Suproleague title. Since then, his career has continued its ascent, from his divisional win of the 2006-07 NBA Sportsmanship Award, to his recent career-high of 27 points in a game.

The UJA Federation Walk With Israel returns to the streets of Toronto on May 27.

With an estimated 15,000 participants, Walk With Israel is the largest Diaspora walk in support of Israel. This year's Walk, scheduled for May 27 rain or shine, will wind through six kilometers of downtown Toronto from Coronation Park at Bathurst and Strachan, across from the CNE's Prince's Gates, to the Automotive Building at Exhibition Place. Following the Walk, participants will be invited to a carnival at the Automotive Building, sponsored by RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust, where there will be food and rides.

While Parker drums up enthusiasm for the Walk, UJA Federation has already created the online infrastructure to facilitate fast and easy participation. The official Walk With Israel 2007 website, www.walkwithisrael.com, offers individuals the opportunity to sign up for the Walk, sponsor participants, learn about volunteer opportunities, and find general information about the event.

"We're so excited that Anthony Parker is helping us get our message out. After a difficult year for Israel, it's more important than ever that our community comes out and shows our support," says Helen Silverstein, chair of Walk With Israel 2007 along with Ruth Ekstein. "It's so important, and it's so easy to sign up – all you have to do is go to the Walk website."

By registering online, children who raise a minimum of $72 will be eligible for a prize draw. Online donors will automatically receive a tax receipt via email when they complete the donation.

For more information about the Walk With Israel 2007, call 416 631 5700 or visit www.walkwithisrael.com.

Passover Cuba food drive attracts record number of donors

Success may be hard to define but it is not always hard to measure. This year, the Maot Chittin fund for Pesach in Cuba, the massive effort by UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee-Ontario's (CJC Charities) to supply Cuban Jewry with Passover food, was met with unprecedented levels of involvement within the Toronto Jewish community. This year the number of donors grew by more than 300 per cent and the amount raised by more than 160 per cent over last year.

"The partnership between CJC Charities and UJA Federation can help to ensure a real Pesach for Cuban Jewry as long as such assistance is required by our brothers and sisters," says Steven Shulman, Ontario Director and National General Counsel for CJC Charities.

"This kind of increase is amazing," says Shimmy Wenner, assistant campaign director and Maot Chittin point person at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "We made a larger effort to publicize this longstanding program and the community responded."

For over four decades, the Pesach in Cuba Maot Chittin program was operated by CJC and subsequently, CJC Charities. In 2006 however, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto joined the project and brought a wealth of experience in online fundraising to the table. Turning directly to the community for financial support, the partnership has resulted in lay contributions that, after only two years, cover the entire cost of the close to $40,000 annual project.

Kosher-for-Passover food is not available in Cuba, a significant obstacle for a holiday so fundamentally defined by its prescribed and proscribed foods. In a very real sense, Cuba's 1,500 Jews depend on Ontario's annual donation of wine, matzah, matzah meal, gefilte fish, horseradish, tea, cooking oil, and consommé to be able to celebrate Passover.

"Once again, thanks to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee-Ontario and Toronto Jewry it was possible for us to celebrate Pesach according to our tradition," writes Adela Dworin, president of the Casa de la Comunidad Hebrea de Cuba, in a thank-you letter. "Our community feels great affection towards the Jews of Toronto for these efforts."

Sports celebrity banquet to benefit local JCCs

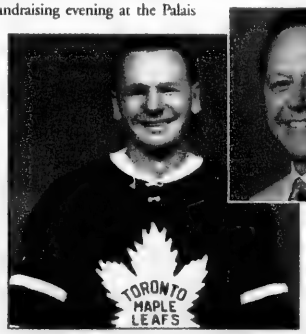
Early next month a number of well known Canadian sports celebrities will be coming together for the JCCs of the Greater Toronto Area in a special fundraising evening at the Palais Royale.

Proceeds from the Wednesday, May 9 benefit will be used to expand youth sports programs that the Miles Nadal JCC, Bathurst JCC and the Schwartz/Reisman Centre – part of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan - offer to the many diverse residents of the GTA.

All three GTA JCCs are initiatives of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum.

Also on hand for the banquet will be Michael Lewis, author of Moneyball and Liar's Poker.

"This is a unique opportunity for the three JCCs of the GTA and the beneficiaries are the families and community we serve," said Sherry Kulman, executive director, Bathurst JCC. "We are delighted to be joining the Miles Nadal JCC and the Schwartz-Reisman Centre on this exciting community-wide initiative."



Former Maple Leaf Goalie Johnny Bower and Richard Peddie (inset) will be among the sports celebrities at next month's fundraising evening at the Palais Royale.

Joining in the festivities will be NHL alumni Ted Lindsay, Johnny Bower, Wilf Paiement, World Boxing Champion Steve Molitor, Olympians Marnie McBean, George Karrys, John Child, members of the gold medal-winning women's hockey team, and many more.

"We have been overwhelmed by the support of the professional sports teams and the corporate community," said Harold Wolkin, president, Miles Nadal JCC and chair of the event. "We cannot thank these celebrities and corporate donors enough for affording us the opportunity to enrich the lives of our kids. The confidence they have shown in us is tremendous. Without them this benefit would not be possible."

The event, being held at Palais Royale Ballroom on Lakeshore Blvd., will allow guests to mix and mingle with the celebrities at dinner, take part in a live auction, and win prizes in a raffle. The event will feature TSN's Michael Landsberg as the Master of Ceremonies.

A special presentation will be made to the 2007 JCC Sportsman of the Year, Richard Peddie, president & CEO, Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment.

"Richard has been instrumental in Toronto's sports scene for many years," said Ellen Cole, executive director, Miles Nadal JCC. "He gives tirelessly of his time and energy to many community initiatives and we want to publicly recognize his contribution."

Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner honours Ted Rogers

UJA Federation & CIJA pay tribute to broadcast pioneer

By DAN HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) came together on April 17 to honour a true Canadian pioneer at the second annual Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner.

Ted Rogers, president and CEO of Rogers Communications Inc., a man who personifies the spirit of the award, was presented with the honour by Dinner co-chairs Ivan Fecan and Peter Godsoe in front of 800 guests – including a number of high-profile dignitaries – at Toronto's Royal York Hotel.

The evening was chaired by former Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney. Other participating political leaders included another former prime minister, Paul Martin and Ontario Progressive Conservative leader John Tory.

The Words and Deeds Leadership Award honours Canadian leaders who have made outstanding contributions to humanitarian causes and to social cohesion, inclusion, and to civil discourse in Canadian society.

RBC's Gordon M. Nixon was the recipient of last year's inaugural award.

Named Outstanding Philanthropist of 2002, Rogers and his wife Loretta have given millions of dollars and much of their time to educational and health-related charities, including the University of Toronto, Ryerson University, Toronto General Hospital, and Sheena's Place, an agency supporting those affected by eating disorders.

"In my early days in business, I made a conscious decision to give back," Rogers told participants. "Giving is in the heart of everyone – from a small donation from a young person to a large donation from an older person. Our family's purpose is to try and assist in each generation having more opportunity than the last. We feel that the single, most important factor is improved access to higher education."

"CIJA and UJA Federation have, once again, conferred the Words & Deeds Leadership Award on a truly great community and business leader, a man I've known for thirty years and whom I consider a mentor," said CIJA's Brent Belzberg, an honourary co-chair of the event along with Steven Cummings, Gordon M. Nixon, Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum. "Ted Rogers has put the resources of his innovative spirit to work on behalf of the entire community. This is Canadian leadership at its best."

Rogers was made an Officer of The Order of Canada in 1990 and was inducted into the Canadian Business Hall of Fame in 1994. In 2002, Rogers was the first Canadian named to the Cable Hall of Fame in Denver, Colorado, before being inducted into Canada's Telecommunications Hall of Fame in October 2006.

"As a Canadian of vision and great communal purpose, Ted Rogers has proven himself to be an outstanding leader who has demonstrated through words and deeds how the synergy of entrepreneurial and philanthropic spirit becomes a magnificent tool for the betterment of society," said UJA Federation president and CEO, Ted Sokolsky.

"I am overwhelmed by this tribute," said Rogers. "I am thankful to CIJA and UJA Federation and applaud the incredible work they do."

Vaughan street festival celebrates Lag B'omer and a true Israeli hero

On Sunday, May 6, which is also Lag B'omer, UJA Federation, in cooperation with the City of Vaughan, is sponsoring The Ilan Ramon Street Festival, named in honour of Israel's first astronaut. The festival – which will run from 6:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m. - will feature a barbecue, children's rides, bonfires, an official street naming ceremony and the Fire and Light Show.

The festival will take place on the site of The Schwartz/Reisman Centre at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus.

The street running adjacent to the campus was recently named Ilan Ramon Blvd.

Ramon, along with the rest of the ill-fated Columbia crew, died in 2003 during the space shuttle's entry into the earth's atmosphere.

Following the street-naming ceremony, the public is invited to sing, dance and celebrate along with one of Toronto's most popular Israeli-style bands, Bais Groove.

Ilan Ramon z"l

"This is such an important event, not only because we will be coming together to celebrate Lag B'omer, but with the help of the City of Vaughan, we will be paying tribute to such a heroic man," said Bryan Keshen, executive director of the Schwartz/Reisman Centre. "It's important that our children have Jewish role models and Ilan Ramon is a courageous example of just that."

The Street Festival will be the first event held at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus which is located at the corner of Bathurst Street and Lebovic Campus Drive (Weldrick Road). It is an initiative of the UJA Federation Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum.

When its doors open in 2009, The Schwartz/Reisman Centre will be a 95,000 square foot facility which will encompass a full range of amenities including an early childhood education centre, a sports and recreation facility, an aquatic centre and an outdoor pool. The northern branch of Tanenbaum CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) is set to open its doors in September of this year.

Admission to the street festival is free. For more information, please call 416.631.5727.

Canadian Jewish actor is on the rise

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Theatre student Jeremy Ferdman continues to add to his long list of acting credits as he prepares to begin filming Horrorween, a spoof horror movie that is garnering a lot of attention in Hollywood.

"Right now it is one of the most talked about movies in Hollywood, because the website [www.horrorween.com] gets like 300,000 hits a day and it has this ridiculous cast," said Ferdman, a 20-year-old Brock University theatre student, and a North York native.

Actor William Shatner, porn star Jenna Jaimeson, and rapper Flavor Flav are just a few of the many celebrities who are expected to make cameos in the film.

"It's about two kids who come across a bootleg version of Windows and they become dot.com millionaires and then everyone in town starts to hate them," he said.

"It's supposed to be a spoof movie, so every character is like a cliché character. My character, I'm the poster guy in the movie, and I'm putting up posters for George Clinton, who is in the movie as well, and I'm putting up posters for the Horrorween parade and everything."

Jeremy Ferdman in character as a homeless person in the play.

The movie will be filmed in Toronto, Los Angeles and New York City, and is fittingly set to be released next Halloween, Oct. 31.

Meanwhile, Ferdman is busy with another project.

Last week, Ferdman played the role of Big Bird, a desperate homeless man in a theatre production titled The Free Country, directed by Federico Holten-Anderson at the Strega Cafe in St. Catharines, Ont.

Ferdman described The Free Country, an independently produced play, as a social justice theatrical piece that criticizes how Canadian culture deals with issues such as ethnicity.

"It is a really politically heavy, really culturally heavy play," said Ferdman, who didn't start acting until he was about 15. He got a walk-on role in the television show Queer As Folk in 2003, and in 2005, he appeared on an NBC series called Angela's Eyes.

"It's intense. It's a completely different experience from anything I've done," he said, explaining that the play is an interactive experience for the audience.

He said that on a budget of $500, the cast managed to build an installation, through which an audience of up to 18 people at a time can walk through with a tour guide, played by Jacquelin Holmes, an actress who appeared in the film Billy Madison when she was a child.

"We built an installation, which is a representation of an ideal free country, which is not free at all, and we take the tourists and the audience on a tour through the free country. The people walk through, guided by a tour guide and they encounter different episodes along the way," director Holten-Anderson said.

In one scene, in order to enter "the free country," the audience is led to a security checkpoint where an actor, who plays a character named Abdul Mohamed Issain from Afghanistan, is detained by authorities who suspect him of being a terrorist.

Holten-Anderson said the play is meant to parody the boundaries of democracy, which, he said, "in many places in the world right now… is more of an illusion" than a reality.

"I think everyone will have a completely different reaction," Ferdman said.

"It is such a heavy play. Like when you're watching, you don't really know how to react… I play one of the homeless guys and it's a really powerful scene with a lot of audience interaction. I'm going up to audience members and actually asking them for money, asking them if they can spare some change."

Holten-Anderson hopes that regardless of how people react to the play, they'll feel strongly about it one way or another.

"Some people are going to get a little freaked out, and some are going to love it, hopefully, so the idea is to get the audience immersed into a different place and have them go through a set of different experiences that they won't have time to chew on until after the play," he said just hours before the show's debut on April 12.

Although the cast performed the last show of the play's limited run on April 15, The Free Country has received so much attention that there are plans to run the show again in September, Ferdman said.

JVS Toronto intern program finds students work in community

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A new program sponsored by JVS Toronto in partnership with Hillel of Greater Toronto will give 18 university and college students a chance to spend the summer working in the Jewish community.

JVS is now accepting applications for its eight-week paid Kohn Summer Intern Program, which is geared to students who have a demonstrated commitment to the community and who are seeking the opportunity to work in a synagogue or Jewish communal agency.

Karen Goldenberg, president and CEO of JVS Toronto, said the objectives of the program are for interns to develop professional and practical skills, evaluate opportunities for future professional volunteer involvement, increase knowledge of current issues, and gain familiarity with the structure of local Jewish agencies.

Interns will work at their placement for 4½ days a week for eight weeks beginning June 25, and they will spend half a day a week with Hillel staff attending professional development seminars.

Each intern will receive $3,000 for the summer, two-thirds of which will be covered by JVS and the rest by the agency that employs them.

Efforts will be made to match interns with their career goals, Goldenberg said, and they will work on a variety of tasks, including marketing, public relations, finance, journalism, Israel advocacy, event planning, fundraising, and direct service with youth, the elderly or disabled people.

"It is a win-win situation. Agencies have bright students working for them, and students gain working experience," Goldenberg said.

She added that a similar program, also called the Kohn Summer Intern Program, has been run by San Francisco's Jewish Vocational Service since 1986, and she has been "eyeing it" for a number of years.

She added that the two programs are not named after the same person.

"When [program donors] Irving and Toddy Granovsky approached me about a funding opportunity, I told them about the San Francisco program, and they thought it was a good fit," Goldenberg said.

"They said that a dear family friend, Annie Kohn, had just died, and this would be a wonderful way to honour her. This program is in memory of a woman who exemplified the highest Jewish values."

Applications from agencies who want to hire an intern are due April 30, and agencies will be contacted after student interviews have been completed, she said.

For information about the program, call 416-787-1151 ext. 259, or e-mail kohnintern@jvstoronto.org.

Hebrew U to honour Compers

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Elizabeth and Tony Comper, the founders of FAST, a coalition of non-Jewish Canadian business and community leaders who have vowed to speak out against anti-Semitism, will receive the Scopus Award, the highest recognition bestowed by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, in Montreal on April 29.

Tony Comper retires next month as president and chief executive officer of BMO Financial Group (the Bank of Montreal).

The $300-a-plate dinner, sponsored by the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, will be held at the Fairmont Queen Elizabeth Hotel and is expected to draw about 800 people, many of them from the corporate world.

Guy Savard, chair of Merrill Lynch Canada's Quebec operations, will be master of ceremonies.

Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, the opposition human rights critic, is guest speaker.

Proceeds will establish the Elizabeth and Tony Comper Research Endowment Fund on Anti-Semitism at Hebrew U's Vidal Sassoon International Centre for the Study of Anti-Semitism.

The Comper fund will support the dissemination of the centre's scholarly work into a format suitable for journalists, policymakers and educators. This includes the creation of modules for elementary and high school students, which is expected to help FAST's educational activities.

The couple launched FAST (Fighting Anti-Semitism Together) in Toronto in June 2005 after anti-Semitic incidents had reached an all-time recorded high in Canada and the year before. The incidents were also becoming more alarming, including the firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs in St. Laurent.

The pair have remained the driving force behind it. He launched the project in Quebec last September with an address to the Canadian Club, appealing to influential people to join the coalition.

On that occasion, Comper warned that singling out Israel for blame in the Middle East conflict, even when it comes from people of good faith, is encouraging anti-Semitism.

"What I worry about is not the intent but the effect of criticizing Israel so vehemently and disproportionately… I worry that those with darker motives will treat these honestly held views as justification for hating Jews and wishing them scourged from the earth," he told 400 businesspeople.

Quebec Remparts drop shomer Shabbat player

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Benjamin Rubin's decision to stay true to his Orthodox Jewish beliefs means he will not be playing with the Quebec (City) Remparts junior hockey team next year.

Coach and owner Patrick Roy gave the promising forward an ultimatum that he either play full time next season, including Shabbat, or he won't be invited to this summer's training camp.

Rubin, who turned 18 in January, did not hesitate to respond that he would not change his way of life. Even though he dreams of playing one day in the NHL, he will not play, practice or travel between sundown Friday and sundown Saturday.

He now hopes another team in the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League (QMJHL) will take him on, or perhaps he can catch on with a team at the same level in Ontario or the Maritimes.

Rubin, a left-winger who was a star with the Midget AA Montreal Maroons during the previous season, was given a chance by Roy to try out at the Remparts training camp last year.

The Hall of Famer and former NHL goalie was impressed by Rubin's talent and still is, but he told the media after the Remparts were eliminated in the first round of the playoffs that he would not have Rubin back on the same conditions.

A Hebrew Academy graduate, Rubin is 6-foot-1 and 189 pounds. He is one of the fastest skaters on the team, physically tough and can pass the puck.

He played in only 29 games during the Remparts' 70-game regular season, scoring three goals and one assist.

The Remparts played 38 games on Fridays and Saturdays. But Rubin had little ice time after mid-January, even when he could play. He never advanced from the fourth line and played maybe five to seven minutes a game, said his father Michael Rubin, a Montreal architect.

Benjamin noticed that players who were not as good as he were getting more time, and he grew frustrated.

The elder Rubin wonders if the darkening mood in Quebec regarding "reasonable accommodation" of religious minorities had anything to do with Roy's decision. "All the feedback we got earlier in the season, from assistant coaches and others, was that he was doing great. But by early January, there was a change in tone."

The radio sports talk shows began referring to how Rubin was being "tolerated", his father learned from listeners.

Still, he is grateful to Roy for giving his son a chance, and still hopes Benjamin can continue in junior hockey or even get drafted by the NHL this June.

Staying in the QMJHL will be tough he admits, because there are games every Friday night, but some teams play fewer games at that time than others.

He's been poring over the schedules and thinks it's possible that Benjamin could play up to 45 games a season next year, which would be fine if he could get 15 to 20 minutes of ice time per match.

Benjamin was scouted by the Montreal Canadiens, and his father is hopeful about his draft prospects. There are fewer Friday night games in the NHL and, during most of the season, Saturday night would not be a problem.

"I've looked at the schedules, and he might be able to miss just 10 per cent of the games."

Whatever happens, Rubin said he is proud of his son's principles. "He has stood firmer than I thought he would to his religious obligations. He's shown that there are more important things in life than hockey. He's a great role model."

Nicole Bouchard, the Remparts' media relations director, said that with Benjamin playing so little, it was difficult to put together lineups, and it was hard for the full-time players. It was also hampering Benjamin's chances of advancing in the game, she said.

"[Roy] explained at the end of the season that we tried to do our best to accommodate him and to respect him, but it is hard to tell players who play 40 or 50 games a season, and are used to playing together, that they are being taken off tonight because [Benjamin] is available."

In the last 30 regular games, she said, Benjamin dressed for only 10.

She noted that the Remparts played on every Friday night except four during the regular season, and that "90 per cent" of the other QMJHL teams have a similar schedule. There are 18 teams in the league, which also includes the Atlantic provinces and Maine.

The reason, she said, is that most of the players are students and they lose less school time with that timetable. Benjamin has been attending Champlain-St. Lawrence CEGEP.

She said Roy told Benjamin that if he wants to continue in the game, "at some point he is going to have to make a choice.

"If a player wants to improve, he has to play more often."

She said the growing resentment in Quebec toward bending the rules, including in sports, to accommodate religious practices was not a factor in Roy's decision.

"Benjamin had friends, he had fun, everyone respected the way he was living," she said.

Bouchard said Roy would give no more interviews about Benjamin.

Vandals target Richmond, B.C. synagogue

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

RICHMOND, B.C. — Richmond, B.C., symbolizes the multiculturalism that has come to define Canada, with a variety of places of worship coexisting peacefully – most of the time. The Vancouver suburb is home to three synagogues and a Jewish day school, and acts of anti-Semitism are rare here.

Which might explain the surprise on Rabbi Claudio Kaiser-Blueth's face the morning of April 15 when he arrived at Beth Tikvah Synagogue to find his Conservative shul's windows and walls defaced with swastikas, a hangman and anti-Semitic profanity.

The vandalism by two young men, caught on surveillance camera at 5 a.m., coincided with Holocaust Remembrance Day. It was the second and more extreme of two incidents of vandalism at the synagogue in the past two years.

An investigation by Richmond RCMP and the B.C. Hate Crimes Unit is underway, but no details on its progress were available at The CJN's deadline.

Beth Tikvah has several members who are Holocaust survivors, and though the graffiti was erased just hours after it occurred, Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth said he is certain those members were devastated.

"Everyone in the congregation and the community at large found out about this and is speaking about it, and the non-Jewish community, including the mayor and non-Jewish clergy in this city, have been calling, writing and showing their support in an amazingly positive reaction," he said

Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth said that the young men on the surveillance video, only one of whom was clearly visible, appeared to be Caucasian and 18 to 20 years old.

"My first reaction was that it was just a coincidence this happened on Yom Hashoah, though it's difficult to say," he says. "But we have some clear leads to apprehend those people."

Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth said he hopes the youths can "come and study with us," rather than being sent to jail, which "makes them more angry, more enraged."

If they could come study at the shul, they would come to appreciate the history of the Jews and the 2,000 years of anti-Semitism they have endured, the rabbi said.

"The kids have likely been brainwashed and have no idea what happened in the Holocaust. They probably don't even know the word," he said. "We have millions of questions right now, but no answers. I know the police are working diligently on this and trying to get those kids."

"We cannot allow manifestations of racism and intolerance to become the norm," said Mark Weintraub, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region. "We are certain that the impact of this act is felt by all British Columbians, and that they share our anger and disgust. We are confident that the Richmond RCMP and the B.C. Hate Crimes Team will treat this matter with the seriousness it deserves and will do all that they can to find the perpetrators and bring them to justice."

Jewish MNA not named to Que. cabinet

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former Revenue Minister Lawrence Bergman said he was "very surprised" and "certainly disappointed" at being dropped from Premier Jean Charest's cabinet, a move that broke a post-1970 Liberal tradition of naming one Jewish minister.

Bergman said reports that he had asked to be relieved of his duties for health reasons are "absolutely wrong."

"I had a hernia operation on Dec. 19 and there was a little infection afterward. But I was full of health by the time the campaign began," he said.

He said he has returned to his normal routine of working out two or three times a week at the Snowdon YM-YWHA. "I have a lot of energy and feel fine."

Bergman, 66, was adamant that he is not going to resign and intends to run in the next election – to seek a fifth mandate.

"My intention is to use my seat to speak out on behalf of my constituents, as well as the Jewish community and English community," said Bergman, who avoided any direct criticism of Charest.

Former education minister Jean-Marc Fournier has been given the revenue portfolio.

Bergman's dismissal was unexpected to others as well, just as his appointment to the cabinet was four years ago. In 2003, he was one of two anglophones named to a 24-member cabinet chosen from a caucus of 76.

His appointment was seen as a recognition of the Jewish community's strong electoral and financial support of the Liberal party, as well as in keeping with a tradition among Liberal premiers since 1970 of naming a Jewish cabinet minister.

The revenue post was influential in 2003 because Charest had made a campaign promise to cut taxes by $1 billion over the next five years.

Some observers felt the other Jewish Liberal MNA, Russell Copeman, of Notre-Dame-de-Grace might have been tapped this time around after serving loyally since 1994. At 46, he is younger than Bergman and has done a credible job as chair of the social affairs committee throughout the last mandate, during a complex reorganization of the system.

Bergman, who was first elected MNA for D'Arcy McGee in the September 1994 election that brought the Parti Québécois back to power, was appointed to the cabinet by Charest when the Liberals returned to office in 2003 after nine years of PQ government.

He said he is proud of his record as revenue minister, noting that "all our figures were up," including collections from tax evaders. Electronic tax filing also increased dramatically under his watch, a system that is not only more efficient but significantly cheaper than processing paper returns.

Bergman's had three election majorities of more than 90 per cent. In the March 26 election, his share of the vote was down to 84 per cent, but that was still the widest vote margin in the province.

Holding just 48 of the National Assembly's 125 seats, Charest reduced his cabinet to a very lean 20.

Robert Libman, who represented D'Arcy McGee as leader of the anglo-rights Equality Party, said for a Liberal government to not include a Jew in the cabinet is a "slight" and indicates the party takes the community's support for granted.

Am Shalom hires Barrie's first female rabbi

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Ilyse Glickman, the newest member of the Am Shalom Congregation family, said she's known since she was 15 that she was going to be a rabbi.

For the past few months, Rabbi Glickman has been leading services at Am Shalom in Barrie on a part-time basis, and she said she's thrilled to have been given the opportunity to be a part of the growing shul.

"It is such an honour that they have asked me to be a part of their community. I have been received very well. They are so generous. They are just relaxed and a normal group of people," she said.

Rabbi Ilyse Glickman

Am Shalom, which is affiliated with the Union of Reform Judaism and has a membership of about 80 families, changed its name from Simcoe County Jewish Association (SCJA) in 2001. According to the shul's website, SCJA members conducted services in homes and rented spaces until 2003, when they built a 5,000-square-foot building on Huronia Road.

Rabbi Glickman, 29, said that being involved in the Jewish community comes very naturally to her.

"I was involved in my synagogue youth group at Temple Har Zion. I was on the board and at the time, and I don't know if it was that God spoke to me or something, but it just felt right to be part of the Jewish community, to be involved in creating services. I basically came to this realization that, wow, I could do this for my life, and that felt very comfortable," she said.

She said that she was recently interviewed by a reporter from the Barrie Examiner who was interested to know how she felt about being the first female rabbi in Barrie.

"She wanted me to feel so much about that. On one hand, definitely, I feel that it is quite an honour, but on the other hand, this road has been paved for me… The first female rabbi was in 1972, so I feel like the struggles don't exist as much as they did 30 years ago," she said.

"Our predecessors fought for what we can do now. I feel like, yes, it's an honour, but it was always within my grasp. When I was 15 and said, I'm going to be a rabbi, it never occurred to me that it was something I couldn't do, because it had been done."

Rabbi Glickman said that the idea of becoming a rabbi was something that came very easily to her.

"I love studying and teaching, and Judaism fits very easily into my life… I sort of came to the conclusion that of all the things I could conceivably do, this felt right. I felt like I could do well at this and I could add something to the Jewish community.

"I grew up very involved with my family," she said, adding that she used to get teased by her friends for getting together with her family for every milestone, such as a cousin's birthday.

Rabbi Glickman completed her undergraduate degree in psychology at York University, where she met her husband, David Rosen, who is now the cantor at Beth Radom Congregation in Toronto.

"We met at York on the first day of school in our Hebrew class. It was a match made in Jewish heaven," she gushed.

While at York, Rabbi Glickman applied to and was accepted by the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion. She was ordained in 2004 and graduated with a master's degree in Hebrew literature.

Both she and her husband studied and worked in New York City for seven years before they decided that it was time to come home.

"We really missed being near family," she said.

Now that she's back in Toronto, Rabbi Glickman works full-time with Jewish students as the program director for Hillel at York, and part-time with Am Shalom.

She said she is so excited about being a part of the Barrie Jewish community, which, she said, is very involved in maintaining Jewish life.

"They are so energetic and committed, and their lay leadership is amazing. I've worked in large congregations and small congregations. When you're part of a small congregation, you have to be involved, because if you're not, it doesn't exist," she said.

"They are involved because they have to be and because they want to be. They created this from the ground up because they have a passion and because they are the Barrie Jewish community. And it's growing," she added, noting that many young families decided to leave busy Toronto for the more laid back Barrie.

"One message that I'd really like to give to them is that they are the congregation… but they are making this congregation happen. And it isn't so much admonishing them to do it, but acknowledging that they are already doing it."

New genetic risk factors for Crohn's discovered

Further evidence that Crohn's disease is hereditary has been discovered by an international team of scientists led by John Rioux, an associate professor of medicine at the Montreal Heart Institute and the Université de Montréal.

In the April 15 online edition of Nature Genetics, the Canadian and American researchers reported the results of a search of the entire human genome for genetic risk factors leading to the development of Crohn's. The authors linked the genes known as PHOX2B, NCF4 and ATG16L1 to the inflammatory bowel disease (IBD).

In addition, their study identified two regions of the genome where genetic risk factors are located but no known genes were implicated. Further work will be necessary to identify the causal genes in these regions.

About 170,000 Canadians have Crohn's or colitis, another IBD.

The study's authors are associated with the IBD Genetics Consortium, which is funded by the U.S.-based National Institutes of Health. In addition to the Montreal Heart Institute and Université de Montréal, the consortium's member institutions include the Cedars-Sinai Medical Centre in Los Angeles, University of Chicago, Johns Hopkins University, University of Pittsburgh, University of Toronto and Yale University.

Because IBD tends to run in families and is more frequent in certain ethnic populations, especially Ashkenazi Jews, scientists have long suspected a significant genetic component.

Although previous genetic studies found a link between Crohn's and mutations in a gene known as CARD15, those mutations alone are not considered to tell the entire genetic story.

To identify additional genes that are associated with IBD, the team scanned the genome – all of 22,000 or so genes – by testing more than 300,000 single nucleotide polymorphisms, or SNPs, in people with Crohn's and in healthy controls.

The comparison of these SNPs (common genetic variants) between patient and control groups identified multiple SNPs that were strongly associated with Crohn's. These findings were then tested in two additional sets of patients and healthy controls in order to confirm their results.

According to Rioux, the findings highlight numerous biological pathways not previously thought to play a role in the disease.

The authors, for example, found evidence that an individual's response to microbes has an influence on susceptibility to Crohn's.

The findings are expected to not only enhance understanding of disease but should also have a long-term impact on clinical practice.

According to Dr. Edmond-Jean Bernard, co-author and gastroenterologist at the Hotel Dieu Hospital in Montreal and the U de M, "the multiple genetic risk factors we've identified provide important molecular targets for current functional studies aimed at understanding the disease and important targets for drug development to improve therapy of Crohn's disease in the future."

Dr. Stephen P. James, director of the division of digestive diseases and nutrition at the National Institutes of Health, said that "these important discoveries not only offer new hope for better therapies for patients with Crohn's disease, they also highlight the promise of the human genome project and subsequent investments by the NIH in large-scale, collaborative research projects to unravel the causes of, and hopefully better treatments for complex, enigmatic diseases."

Clarification

The April 19 article "Jewish hospitals' kashrut practices under review" indicated that the Quebec Human Rights Commission had recommended that the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) pay $10,000 in damages to ambulance technician Ginette Gelesko, as it had for her colleague Yvon Verreault.

In fact, the commission never reached the point of making a ruling on Gelesko's complaint, because after the commission's decision in favour of Verreault in December, the JGH decided to negotiate a global settlement with both Verreault and Gelesko.

The JGH Auxiliary paid them $7,500 each.

Verreault and Gelesko were having lunch together in the JGH's Cafe de l'Atrium in February 2005 when they allege they were ordered out because their food was not kosher. Verreault complained to the commission in April 2005 and Gelesko did so about a year later.

JGH spokesperson Glenn Nashen said the hospital asked that the two cases be treated as one because they concerned the same incident and it seemed probable the commission would reach the same decision in both.

Emunah dinner honours longtime volunteers

Three longtime communal activists will receive volunteerism awards at the annual Family in Israel dinner of Emunah Women of Toronto.

The honorees, all under the age of 41, are Aryella Weisz, Laurie Dame Teperman and Shawna Magence.

The event will be held at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto Congregation in Thornhill, Ont., April 30 at 6:30 p.m.

Proceeds will go primarily to Neve Michael, a children's village orphanage at Pardes Chana, Israel, that houses more than 250 children at risk between four and 18 years of age and is the site of the Crisis Centre for Children at Risk. Neve Michael is a longtime beneficiary of Canadian Emunah.

In addition, part of the dinner proceeds are earmarked for a dormitory at Neve Sarah Herzog High School Ulpana for Science and Arts in Bnei Brak.

The keynote address on "Faith, Family and Future" will be given by Liebe Geft, director of the Museum of Tolerance at the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles.

The honorees have all worked for many years in the Toronto community. Weisz, a vice president of Emunah's national council, is a former president of the Emunah Toronto council. She has chaired the local En Hiver, Au Printemps and Family in Israel dinners, as well as being involved in the Jewish travel guide to Toronto. She has also given her time to Netivot HaTorah Day School, Camp Moshava and her synagogue, Shomrai Shabbos.

Teperman has also worked on the Au Printemps and En Hiver events. As well, she has volunteered at Baycrest, was a counsellor at Camp Reena and helped found the Shaarei Tefillah nursery school. She worked on the Zareinu Moveathon and the Netivot Gatherings cookbook. She has been vice-president of the Emunah national council and is now chair of its board.

Magence is another past president of Emunah Women of Toronto. Now treasurer of Netivot's executive board, she co-edited its popular Gatherings cookbook. She considers one of her greatest accomplishments to be a symposium she helped organize on eating disorders in the Orthodox Jewish community.

At the dinner, three scholarships will be awarded to local women to help them with a year of study in Israel.

Emunah Women is an international women's religious Zionist organization. It sponsors day care centres and nurseries, high schools, children's homes and youth villages.

Heart and stroke ride marks 20th year

For 20 years, enthusiastic Torontonians have been pedalling along the Gardiner Expressway and the Don Valley Parkway on the first Sunday in June to help raise critical funds for Heart and Stroke Foundation research.

On June 3, more than 12,000 cyclists and in-line skaters are expected to come out for this year's Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart in support of the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario.

The event is the foundation's largest cycling fundraiser, and funds raised support medical research, social change and health education.

Last year, 12,000 people in Ontario and Alberta raised a record $2.1 million in pledges for heart and stroke research. This year, corporate teams and individual riders and skaters are expected to raise $2.7 million.

Cycling routes range from beginner distances of 25 to 50 kilometres to a more gruelling 75 kilometres along the Gardiner and the Don Valley Parkway, which are both traffic-free for the event.

Those who want to take part in the 75-kilometre ride or take the 7:15 a.m. early bird routes (25 or 50 kilometres) must raise a minimum of $60 in pledges in addition to paying their registration fee by June 3.

In-line skaters can complete five-, 10- or 20-kilometre routes on the Gardiner, west of Exhibition Place.

After registering (at www.rideforheart.ca), participants can also set up a personal fundraising page to collect pledges from friends, family and colleagues, who will receive an electronic tax receipt if they donate more than $10.

Registration for the 20th annual Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart runs until May 30 online, by fax (416-932-1620), phone (416-486-RIDE [7433]) or by mail (The Becel Heart&Stroke Ride for Heart, P.O. Box 1227, Station K, 2384 Yonge St., Toronto, ON M4P 3E4).

Human rights museum gets national status

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — Prime Minister Stephen Harper has announced that the Canadian Museum for Human Rights will become the first national museum outside of Ottawa.

The prime minister's announcement, made before a standing-room crowd of invited guests and media at the Fairmont Hotel on April 20, means that the dream of Jewish media mogul Israel Asper will come true.

Asper, who was the founder and chairman of CanWest Global Communications Corp., conceived of the idea of a Canadian human rights museum and worked on it for decades before he died on Oct. 7, 2003, at the age of 71.

His 46-year-old daughter, Gail, has worked since her father's death to ensure that her father's vision would became a reality. She met with Harper about a year ago in Ottawa and persuaded him to give the museum his full financial blessing.

Although Harper did not specify the exact cash commitment that the federal government will be making to the museum, it is expected to amount to $9 million a year once the museum is open in 2011.

Construction of the museum will cost $265 million. The city of Winnipeg is to contribute $10 million, the province of Manitoba $40 million, the Canadian government $100 million, the Asper family $20 million, and private donors $85 million.

Gail Asper still has to raise $30 million from private donors, which she is confident she can raise within the next year. Many potential donors were reluctant to contribute until the federal government committed to the operating funding.

"This museum, the realization of Izzy Asper's vision, will celebrate and promote awareness of human rights in Canada, and it will bring Canadian and international visitors to Winnipeg so they can see and hear the Canadian human rights story," said Harper.

The late Israel Asper ...his vision now a reality

In April 2003, Asper said the museum "will be more than a tableau of past events. It will be an education centre dedicated to promoting understanding and respect of ethnic, religious and racial diversity, especially among our youth."

A jubilant Gail Asper, who has fought an uphill battle to bring the museum to Winnipeg instead of Ottawa, said at the hotel, "I believe that the creation of the Canadian Museum for Human Rights is a great thing for Canada and the world. We [the Asper family and the Asper Foundation] are absolutely thrilled that Stephen Harper has made human rights a priority. We are deeply grateful to the thousands of Canadians from coast to coast, who never stopped believing that the museum would become a reality.

"We anticipate that it [the museum] will have a major gallery devoted to the Holocaust and galleries dealing with Canadian immigration issues, including the treatment of the Jewish people. This will include dealing with laws in Canada that were implemented involving quotas and restrictions on buying property that discriminated against Jewish immigrants," she said.

Marjorie and Morley Blankstein, Gerry Grey and family, Richard Marantz, Sherrey Walder and the Kahanoff foundation have each donated $1 million dollars.

Community leader Harold Buchwald said that "the exciting thing is that the government on behalf of all the people of Canada from every region has realized that a museum that addresses human rights is not only important but has to be used to educate and inspire. The government has recognized that such a museum does not have to be only in Ottawa.

"What will be of specific significance to Canadian Jews will be the portrayal of discrimination they suffered not just through the Nazi Holocaust but during the period of earlier Canadian governments," he added.

It is not clear yet what the role of the Asper family will be in running the museum. Harper said that a board will be appointed that will include representatives from across Canada and that will recognize leading donors.

New cookbook offers a healthy take on Jewish food

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aviva Allen has written a cookbook that addresses issues she hasn't seen in other Jewish cookbooks.

"There are a lot of healthy kosher cookbooks," she said, referring to trends in recent years to lower fat and cholesterol in traditional Jewish recipes. But the registered nutritional consulting practitioner and nutrition instructor in the holistic health program at Seneca College is troubled by the presence of ingredients like white flour, white sugar and margarine in some of the modified recipes.

Aviva Allen

The Organic Kosher Cookbook, which Allen self-published on 100 per cent recycled paper, grew out of recipe requests from clients and participants at seminars that Allen has given.

The slim volume has 53 user-friendly recipes, conveniently designated as vegan, gluten-free and/or Passover friendly. The majority are vegan and/or gluten free, and all the recipes are pareve.

Allen, 29, said she wrote the book for "anyone who is health conscious," as well as those with special needs like celiac disease or lactose intolerance.

The book begins with a section titled "Is Traditional Jewish Food Making Us Sick?" In it, Allen – whose father is Beth Tikvah Synagogue's Rabbi Wayne Allen – lists problematic aspects of a traditional Jewish diet, including transfats in pareve shortening, and minimal fibre.

"This does not mean that we should never eat traditional Jewish foods, but that we need to strive to make healthier versions," she writes.

A proponent of organic food, which she says has a higher nutrient content, Allen did part of her training in the Adamah program at the Isabella Freedman Jewish Retreat Centre in Connecticut, where she worked on an organic farm and cooked whatever was ready to be harvested. The experience changed her way of thinking – and meal planning, she said.

She also studied at the Canadian School of Natural Nutrition and Manhattan's Natural Gourmet Cookery School, and has worked as a chef in a Toronto vegetarian restaurant, Fresh on Bloor.

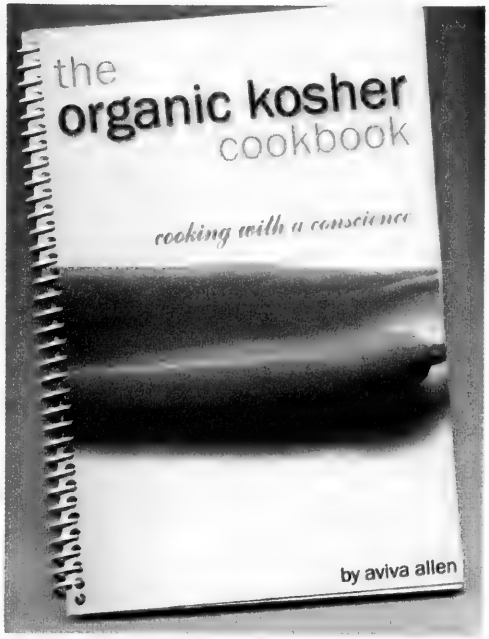
Allen's career grew out of a stint working in the skin care industry. "I started to realize that these [cosmetic] creams only do so much. What happens on people's skin is a reflection of what goes on inside. I wound up being more interested in the food side," she said.

A fine-tuning of her own diet turned out to be a learning experience for her. As Allen started to learn more about nutrition, she initially assumed that eating poorly resulted from a lack of knowledge about healthy food.

But she soon realized that it's not easy to change longstanding habits, and doesn't recommend making sudden, dramatic changes in one's diet. "It can be hard on the body, and hard to maintain if you cut out too many foods all at once."

She suggests a more gradual change, removing unhealthy foods while introducing new, healthier ones.

Instead of a "dessert" chapter, Allen finishes her book with a "Treats" section, because she believes such items should only be eaten once in awhile.



Her pear-ginger crisp, flavoured with fresh ginger and lemon zest, sounds tempting.

But Allen's favourite recipe is Aviva's Challah, which went through many incarnations before she was satisfied that it was as nutritious as possible and, at the same time, as close in taste and texture to conventional challah as it could be.

The Organic Kosher Cookbook is available at the Cookbook Store, Ambrosia Natural Foods, Hartman's, Israel's, Matana Judaica, Beth Tikvah Judaica Shop and Beth David Judaica Shop; or online at http://organickoshercookbook.com/.

AVIVA'S CHALLAH

2¼ cups warm water
¾ cup raw honey
2 tbsp. yeast
4 large eggs + 1 more for egg wash
4 tsp. sea salt
½ c. extra-virgin olive oil
5 cups whole spelt flour, sifted
5 cups light spelt flour, sifted optional: sesame and/or poppy seeds

In a large bowl, combine water, honey and yeast. Let sit until mixture gets foamy (about 10 minutes).

In a separate bowl, beat eggs, then add to yeast mixture along with the oil and salt. Slowly add flour until dough pulls away from sides of bowl.

Place the dough onto a floured surface and knead, adding the extra flour as needed, until dough is springy and not sticky (about 10 minutes).

Place dough in a large clean bowl greased with a bit of oil and cover with a towel. Place bowl in a warm quiet place to rise for about 1 hour.

Punch down the dough about 10 times. Divide the dough in half, then separate each half into equal pieces (number depends on type of braid). Flour the pieces lightly as you roll them in your hands into logs. Braid into 2 challahs.

Place each braided challah onto a separate baking sheet lined with parchment paper (no need to grease) and cover with a towel. Let sit for about 40 minutes.

Preheat oven to 350.

To make egg wash, whisk together 1 egg with 1 tsp. of water. Place egg wash on top of challah using a brush or your hands. Add sesame or poppy seeds (optional). Bake challah for 25-30 minutes, rotating the baking sheets from top to bottom rack after about 15 minutes. Yields 2 large challahs.

SAUTÉED GREENS

Use this recipe with any type of leafy green vegetable such as kale, collard greens, Swiss chard, beet greens, mustard greens, dandelion greens, bok choy and more.

2 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil
1-2 cloves garlic, minced
1 bunch greens, washed and cut into desired size
¼ tsp. sea salt

In a large pan, heat the oil and garlic at a medium-high temperature. When garlic begins to brown, add the greens and sea salt and cook until greens are tender and have turned a vibrant, dark green colour. Serve immediately. Yields 3-4 servings.

'Nutritious cooking can be easy and fun'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Norene Gilletz, cookbook author, culinary consultant, CJN columnist and cooking teacher, says she'd rather lift her fork than move her tuches.

"I'd rather eat than move, any time," she said in an interview about her new book, Norene's Healthy Kitchen (Whitecap Books), due in stores mid-June.

Norene Gilletz

That said, however, she controls her borderline diabetes with diet and exercise. "I take walks every day, and I wear a pedometer to measure my steps. Even when I'm working in the kitchen, I fidget, I dance... anything to keep me moving."

She also cooks and eats healthy, and she is happy to share her tips and recipes with her readers.

"After doing a lot of research and talking to experts from a number of fields, I've learned that nutritious cooking can be easy and fun. It's doable for cooks at every level of experience."

The book is just what the doctor ordered, she says. "It teaches you that you can transfer advice from your doctor or dietitian right to your plate."

She stresses that she is not a nutritionist. "I just use common sense nutrition. We all have different issues, but we can all follow the same guidelines. Food [is like] medicine. If we eat well, we have a better chance of being well."

In addition to 600 recipes, the 512-page book is packed with chef's secrets and nutrition tips. "I made sure that the ingredients are available in local supermarkets, and that the instructions are easy to follow. I want this book to be for everyone."

The recipes, she says, focus on "smart carbs, smart fats and smart proteins. They feature a wide variety of vegetables, fruits, whole grains, beans, legumes and nuts.

"Fish and protein are more prominent than red meat, and I've included many vegetarian dishes. [As well], there are many healthy, delicious desserts."

It's an encyclopedia of healthy eating, she says. "If you're wondering about something, chances are it's there."

Gilletz is launching Norene's Healthy Kitchen in Montreal on April 30 at Shaare Zion Congregation. For information call 514-933-8461.

In Toronto, the book is being launched at Beth Radom Congregation on May 9. Call 416-636-3451, ext. 31, for information.

EASY CORN CHOWDER

1 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 medium onions, chopped
2 stalks celery, chopped
1 red bell pepper, seeded and chopped
4 cups fresh (about 6 ears) or frozen corn kernels
1 medium potato peeled (about 1 cup chopped)
2 cups broccoli florets
3 cups vegetable broth
1 tsp. salt
½ tsp. freshly ground pepper
½ tsp. dried thyme
1 tsp. dried basil or 2 tbsp. chopped fresh basil
1 cup skim milk or soy milk

Heat oil in a large saucepan on medium. Add the onions, celery and red pepper, and saute for 5 minutes or until the vegetables are tender. Add the corn and potato and cook 4 to 5 minutes longer, stirring often.

Add the broccoli, broth, salt, pepper and thyme (if using dried basil, add it now) and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to low, cover and simmer for 10 to 12 minutes or until the potatoes are tender. Remove from heat and cool slightly. (If using fresh basil, add it now.)

Using an immersion blender, partially puree the soup while still in the pot (or puree half the vegetables with a little of the cooking liquid in a food processor or blender and then return the puree to the pot). Add the milk and reheat gently on low heat. Don't bring to a boil or the soup may curdle. Yield: 5 to 6 servings (about 7 cups).

Keeps for three to four days in refrigerator, freezes well for up to three months.

QUICK CHICKEN CACCIATORE

6 boneless skinless chicken breasts, cut into thin strips salt and freshly ground black pepper
2 tbsp. olive oil
3 cloves garlic (1 tbsp. minced)
2 medium onions, sliced
1 green pepper, seeded and sliced
1 red bell pepper, seeded and sliced
3 cups sliced mushrooms
3 cups tomato basil sauce
½ cup red wine
1 tsp. dried basil
½ tsp. dried oregano
¼ tsp. red pepper flakes (optional)
2 tbsp. minced fresh basil and/or parsley

Rinse chicken strips and pat dry. Trim the excess fat. Sprinkle chicken with salt and pepper.

Heat 1 tbsp. oil in a large, deep nonstick skillet or Dutch oven on medium high. Add the chicken strips and garlic, stir fry until the chicken is no longer pink, about 3 to 4 minutes. Transfer to a bowl.

Heat the remaining oil in the pan. Add the onions, peppers and mushrooms; stir fry for 4 to 5 minutes or until golden. Return the chicken to the pan. Add the tomato sauce, wine, basil, oregano and red pepper flakes, if using; mix well. Bring to a simmer, then reduce heat and cover partially. Simmer for 2 minutes or until tender, stirring occasionally. Season with additional salt and pepper. Sprinkle with fresh basil and/or parsley. Yield: 6 servings.

Recipe doubles or triples easily. Keeps for up to 3 days in refrigerator and reheats well. Freezes well for up to 3 months, but the veggies won't be as crisp when thawed.

CARROT ALMOND SALAD

1 10-oz. bag grated carrots (about 3 cups)
2 green onions, thinly sliced
½ cup dried cranberries or raisins
½ cup toasted slivered almonds
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. lemon juice (preferably fresh) or vinegar
1 tbsp. honey or granular Splenda
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. minced fresh dillweed or parsley
½ tsp. salt

In a large bowl, combine the carrots, green onions, cranberries and almonds.

In a small bowl, whisk together the oil, lemon juice, honey, mustard, dillweed and salt. Drizzle over the carrot mixture and mix well. Cover and refrigerate for up to 1 to 2 hours or over night before serving. Yield: 6 servings.

Recipe doubles and triples easily. Keeps for up to 2 to 3 days in the refrigerator.

EU ratifies expanded UN sanctions against Tehran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

BRUSSELS — European Union foreign ministers on Monday approved a regulation implementing United Nations sanctions against Iran after it refused to halt uranium enrichment, officials said.

The sanctions are targeted against individuals and organizations involved in Tehran's disputed nuclear and missile programs, which the west suspects are aimed at making nuclear weapons.

The EU list of individuals, which was not immediately made public, goes beyond persons identified in UN resolutions.

EU officials said the regulation and a common political position opens the way for further names to be added to the list of people denied entry into the 27-nation EU and whose assets are frozen.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad on Monday told Spanish television that Iran wishes to remain within the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and would resist any UN sanctions peacefully.

"Up until now our activities have been within a framework of laws… We are interested in continuing on that path. We do not want to abandon the framework of laws," Ahmadinejad said after being asked by TVE whether Iran could abandon the treaty.

In the live interview from Tehran, Ahmadinejad also indicated that Iran would prefer peaceful resistance to UN Security Council sanctions aimed at its nuclear program.

"We are obliged to defend ourselves. A nation has this logical and legitimate right, on the basis of dialogue and peaceful defence," he said. "There are some countries that want a monopoly of production of nuclear fuel, and I think that's the root of all the problems."

Javier Solana, the EU's foreign policy chief, was to meet with top Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani in Ankara Wednesday to see if Iran can be persuaded to halt uranium enrichment in exchange for negotiations over economic incentives.

His spokesperson, Cristina Gallach, said Solana hopes the talks would lead to the resumption of full-scale negotiations between Iran and the international community over its nuclear program.

Gallach reiterated that an Iranian freeze on enrichment work is a precondition for such full-scale talks. In exchange for such a freeze, she said, the international community would suspend UN sanctions on Iran.

"We are encouraged, despite the sanctions which are fully in place," Gallach said. "We hope this opportunity on Wednesday will be fully used."

Javier Solana

Ahmadinejad, speaking on TVE, said Europe should adopt a separate stance to the United States in the talks.

"If the European Union wants to translate the words of the United States, we can go directly to the United States," he said.

In the bid to push Iran to drop some aspects of its nuclear program, Solana is negotiating on behalf of permanent UN Security Council members France, Britain, Russia, the United States and China, as well as Germany.

The international community wants Tehran to freeze uranium enrichment work before any talks can be held on a package of economic and other incentives for Iran, including assistance for its nuclear power generation program.

Iran has started feeding small amounts of uranium gas into centrifuges that can enrich it to weapons-grade level and is already running more than 1,300 of the machines, according to an International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) document obtained last week by Associated Press.

The IAEA has protested Iran's decision to prevent agency inspectors from visiting the country's heavy water reactor, which, when built, will produce plutonium.

Enriched uranium and plutonium can both be used for the fissile core of nuclear warheads.

Iran denies it plans to produce nuclear weapons, saying it only wants to generate energy.

On the weekend, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert tried to soothe the Israeli public's fears about Iran's nuclear program, saying in a radio interview that Tehran has exaggerated its progress.

Olmert also said he is confident that international diplomatic efforts to curb Iran's nuclear program are working.

"Iran is far from crossing the technological threshold," he told Israel Radio. "Unfortunately, it is not as far as I would like it to be, but it is also not as close as it proclaims to be. I believe the international efforts will achieve their goals. There is no need to get caught up in any apocalyptic prophesies that have no basis in reality."

Olmert said there is still time for international diplomatic efforts to work, echoing the assessment of U.S. Defence Secretary Robert Gates, who visited the Middle East last week.

Olmert also politely turned down an offer by Pakistan's president, Gen. Pervez Musharraf, to serve as a go-between Israel and the Palestinians.

Olmert said he preferred to maintain direct contacts with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and not depend on an intermediary.

Musharraf made the surprise offer last Friday in an interview with the Arab satellite station Al-Arabiya. He told the Dubai-based station that he would even be willing to visit Israel to help bring peace to the Middle East.

Israel celebrates 59th Independence Day with population of 7,150,000

By MOTI BASSOK

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel celebrated its 59th Independence Day this week with a population of 7,150,000 people.

When the state was founded in 1948, it had 806,000 residents. A third of those still live in the country.

Figures published Sunday by the Central Bureau of Statistics indicate that 5,725,000 residents of Israel – 80 per cent – are Jewish. Most of the remainder are Arab.

The population has increased 121,000 in the past year. Most of that increase – 89 per cent of it – reflects natural growth.

Since last Independence Day, 148,000 babies were born here.

About 44 per cent of the population resides in cities of 100,000 inhabitants or more.

In 1948, Tel Aviv was the only city with more than 100,000 residents – it had 248,500 inhabitants.

Today, Israel has five cities above 200,000 inhabitants: Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Rishon Letzion and Ashdod. These five cities account for 1,810,300 residents, or about a quarter of the population.

Rural localities house 8 per cent of the population. The rural population includes 119,700 kibbutz members, less than 2 per cent of the overall population. At the founding of the state, kibbutzim housed 6 per cent of the population.

'It is a great loss'

Although she was initially composed, she broke down as someone handed her her husband's golden wedding band – 42 years after their marriage.

"He saved them. He saved them," she said quietly of her husband's students as she slipped the band on her finger, next to her own.

"He was a very human person," his wife said. "He wanted to help everybody."

Liviu Librescu taught at Virginia Tech for 20 years and had an international reputation for his work in aeronautical engineering.

"His research has enabled better aircraft, superior composite materials, and more robust aerospace structures," said Ishwar K. Puri, the head of the school's engineering science and mechanics department.

Librescu's son, Joe, said his father's students sent e-mails detailing how the professor saved their lives.

"My father blocked the doorway with his body and asked the students to flee," Joe Librescu said last week from his home outside Tel Aviv. "Students started opening windows and jumping out."

When Liviu Librescu's native Romania joined forces with Nazi Germany in World War II, he was imprisoned in a labour camp, and then sent along with his family and thousands of other Jews to a ghetto in the city of Focsani. Hundreds of thousands of Romanian Jews were killed during the war.

After the war, Librescu found work at a government aerospace company. But his career was stymied in the 1970s because he refused to swear allegiance to the Communist regime. He was later fired when he requested permission to move to Israel, according to his son.

In 1977, then-prime minister Menachem Begin personally intervened to get the family an emigration permit, the son said.

Librescu left Israel for Virginia in 1985 for a sabbatical year, but eventually made the move permanent, said his son, who himself studied at Virginia Tech from 1989 to 1994.

At the Polytechnic University in Bucharest, where Librescu graduated in mechanics and aviation construction in 1953 (he also received a PhD from the Bucharest-based Academy of Sciences in 1969, and an honorary degree with the Polytechnic University in 2000), Librescu's picture was placed on a table with a candle and flowers.

"It is a great loss," said Ecaterina Andronescu, rector of the university. "We have immense consideration for the way he reacted and defended his students with his life."

Librescu, who specialized in composite structures and aeroelasticity, published extensively and received numerous awards for his work. He also received several NASA grants and also taught courses at the University La Sapienza of Rome, Italy.

U.S. President George W. Bush also paid tribute to Librescu.

"This brave professor blocked the door with his body while his students fled to safety," Bush said.

"On the day of remembrance, this Holocaust survivor gave his own life so others may live," Bush said, referring to Yom Hashoah. "We honour his memory, we take strength from his example."

Librescu is survived by his wife, sons Joe and Arie, and one grandchild.

Israel Briefs

British royal to visit Israel

Prince Edward will become the first senior member of England's royal family to make a formal visit to Israel. The prince, seventh in line to the throne, is slated to visit in September. Prince Edward was invited by the Israel Youth Award organization, which is affiliated with an international group run by Edward's brother, Prince Charles. Although it will be the first formal visit by a senior royal, Prince Charles attended prime minister Yitzchak Rabin's funeral in 1995.

Olmert on prisoner swap

Ehud Olmert said there are limits to what Israel will give in exchange for a soldier being held in Gaza. The Israeli prime minister said he rejected a list of 1,400 Palestinian prisoners whom Sgt. Gilad Shalit's captors want freed as ransom. "The list is disappointing and creates expectations that are impossible to live up to," he told the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee. Olmert didn't say how many prisoners he would free to recover Shalit, who was abducted to Gaza by Palestinian gunmen last June.

Iran recruiting spies?

Israel accused Iran of trying to recruit Jewish emigres as spies. The Shin Bet intelligence agency said that in the past two years, approximately 100 Israelis of Iranian descent had received special permits from Tehran to make "homecoming visits." Once in Iran, many of the visitors came under pressure to work as spies and had their passports withheld as a coercive tactic, the Shin Bet said. Most reported the attempted recruitment on their return, while 10 tried to pass information to their Iranian handlers but were stopped, the agency said. It urged the Knesset to amend a law allowing Israelis to visit Iran, which is not technically designated an enemy state.

Canadian sentenced

An Egyptian-Canadian man was sentenced to 15 years in jail April 21 for spying for Israel in Canada and Turkey. Mohamed el-Attar's lawyer said he would appeal the verdict. El-Attar, a 31-year-old Toronto bank teller, has said that a confession he gave authorities after his January arrest in Cairo was extracted by torture. An Israeli and two Turks were also tried and convicted in absentia. In a statement, Canadian Foreign Minister Peter MacKay said he had concerns about "a number of aspects in this case," including torture.

Former chief rabbi accused of Holocaust slander

By RONI SINGER-HERUTI and YAIR ETTINGER

© Ha'aretz Daily News Inc.

JERUSALEM — Six members of the Reform Movement last week accused the former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel of slander for allegedly stating that the Holocaust happened because of the activity of Reform Jews in Germany.

Rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu is said to have made the statement in an interview with a pirate radio station, and the Reform Movement members have filed a slander complaint with the police.

"Rabbi Eliyahu's statements are no less serious than Holocaust denial, and the Israeli public must respond accordingly… The public in Israel has had enough of rabbis cursing and wants a spiritual leadership whose 'ways are ways of pleasantness,'" they said in their complaint.

Most of the complainants are survivors or descendants of survivors. The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (IMPJ) said there were numerous requests for immediate public and legal action after the broadcast.

Rabbi Eliyahu, who is considered the spiritual leader of the National Religious Party, was asked by the radio interviewer, "What was the sin of the six million?" In response, he quoted from Exodus 22:5: "If fire gets out of control and spreads through weeds, and [then] consumes bound or standing grain or a field, the one who started the fire must make restitution."

He added: "Those people [Jews in general] are not to blame, but Reform started in Germany, those who changed the religion began in Germany. And because it is written that God was angered, even He did not differentiate among the righteous, it was done."

Among the complainants are IMPJ chair Abraham Melamed, who is also the chair of the department of Jewish history and thought at the University of Haifa and a Yad Vashem board member, and Michael Sheizaf, a Bergen-Belsen survivor and a member of the Darchei Noam Reform congregation in Ramat Hasharon.

Rabbi Eliyahu's son, Rabbi Shmuel Eliyahu, the chief rabbi of Safed, said his father's words do not justify the Nazi crimes but "are based on historic facts," and that anti-Semitism rose where there was assimilation.

He called the complaint against his father "a joke."

Jewish Agency chair Zeev Bielski protested Rabbi Eliyahu's statements in a letter to the rabbi.

In a statement, the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism wrote: "Jewish leaders cannot stand silent when we hear such hate-filled language… We know all too well the dangers of… failing to recognize hateful language for what it is."

They applauded Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who in response to the controversy, reached out to the World Union for Progressive Judaism, the international umbrella body of Reform Judaism, expressing his appreciation for the Reform Jewish Movement and for its "contribution to Jewish life in Israel and the Diaspora."

The statement spoke of the pain such accusations cause among the two million who identify as Reform Jews, especially those who are Holocaust survivors and the families of victims of the Nazis.

It called on Rabbi Eliyahu to apologize for his remarks, and for responsible Jewish religious leaders around the world, from all streams, to condemn them unequivocally.

Carter urges Iowans to seek ME 'balance'

IOWA CITY, Iowa — Former U.S. president Jimmy Carter urged Iowa voters to "screen out" presidential candidates who don't take a "balanced" position between Israel and the Palestinians.

Carter told about 6,000 people at an April 18 lecture at the University of Iowa in Iowa City that he chose the venue to promote his book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid because of Iowa's disproportionate role in choosing presidential candidates.

"The main reason I came to Iowa is to make sure you knew you could shape an outcome in the 2008 presidential election," Carter was quoted as saying. "At least you can screen out candidates." Iowa's caucuses, the first contest for either party, often set the tone for the primaries, together with the first primary, in New Hampshire.

Carter urged Iowans to extract pledges from candidates "that they will take a balanced position between Israel and Palestinians."

Chirac's efforts against anti-Semitism recalled

By RINA BASSIST
JTA

Analysis

No matter who ultimately wins France's election for president, it will mark the end of an era — four decades of extraordinary and occasionally controversial political activity by Jacques Chirac.

Chirac has been both admired and despised by his own colleagues, praised in Africa and criticized in Europe, befriended by Arab leaders, while sometimes loathed by American politicians.

French voters went to the polls April 22 in the first round of voting to choose his successor.

Jacques Rene Chirac was born in Paris in November 1932. After graduating from the prestigious National School of Administration, the training ground for much of France's political elite, he fought as a young lieutenant and was wounded in France's Algerian war.

Chirac entered politics soon after his return home. In 1974, he was appointed prime minister by President Valery Giscard d'Estaing, but resigned after two years.

In 1977, he was elected mayor of Paris, a post he held for 18 years — surviving several corruption scandals — and served again as prime minister from 1986 to 1988. Chirac twice ran unsuccessfully for president before beating his socialist rival in 1995.

Political experts say Chirac never had a clear political agenda of his own. Though he leads a right-of-centre party, the Union for a Popular Movement, his ideas often appear closer to socialism then to free-market economic principles.

In the international arena, Chirac frequently has called on western leaders to invest more in Third World countries and give them trade preferences to encourage the export of products from Africa, a region of the world to which he devoted the most attention. Chirac takes pride in his idea of a "poverty tax" on rich countries to raise money to develop poor countries, and is known for championing the international fight against AIDS.

Jacques Chirac

In France, Chirac is a natural politician, meeting farmers, patting cows and cuddling babies. He's known as a shrewd political animal, merciless toward competitors from the right or left. He has forged many alliances and broken even more, say his rivals — some of whom used to be his friends.

Still, even his opponents agree that no other post-World War II French leader has fought anti-Semitism, which has surged in France since the Palestinian intifadah began in 2000, like Chirac. It seems almost as if this fight has become a mission for Chirac, perhaps one of the only issues in which he truly believes and to which he is ideologically committed.

Two events have indelibly marked Chirac's relations with the French Jewish community.

The first was his famous "vel d'hiv" speech of July 1995 in which Chirac, newly elected, acknowledged once and for all France's responsibility, under the Vichy regime, for the deportation of thousands of French Jews to Nazi death camps.

The second occurred this year, four months before the end of his political career, when Chirac inaugurated at the national Pantheon, a French national monument that houses the tombs of the country's heroes, a memorial for a French Righteous Gentile who saved thousands of Jews from extermination in the Holocaust.

Both acts set a norm for future French politicians, obliging political leaders and the bureaucracy to fight anti-Semitism fiercely.

Chirac's attitude toward Israel has been much more complex on political and personal levels.

Chirac has nurtured warm relations with many Arab leaders over the years. The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat used to call him "Dr. Chirac." Jordan's late King Hussein was a close friend. So was Rafik Hariri, the assassinated Lebanese prime minster.

Chirac made frequent visits to Middle Eastern and Persian Gulf countries, travelling to Saudi Arabia five times as president – more often than he came to Washington. That may not be surprising considering Chirac's belief that Europe should stand as a counterweight to America's international political hegemony.

For many years, Chirac championed France's "pro-Arab" policy, often at the expense of relations with Israel. Former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon, who harshly criticized anti-Semitism in France and urged French Jews to leave for Israel, was persona non grata in France early in his term.

Israeli officials, for their part, accused the Chirac government of spearheading Europe's general anti-Israel approach — motivated, they claimed, both by Chirac's desire to be seen as the great defender of the Palestinian cause and by French commercial interests.

Chirac's visit to Israel and the Palestinian territories in December 1996 was marked by a diplomatic incident when he visited a church under extra-territorial French protection in Jerusalem's Old City, which Israel captured in the 1967 Six Day War. Chirac loudly claimed that Israeli bodyguards were too brutal in pushing back a mob of Palestinians seeking to greet the French leader; to Israelis, it came off as grandstanding at the Jewish state's expense.

But when Sharon, generally portrayed by French media as a war-mongering beast, presented his Gaza withdrawal plan, Chirac began to see the Israeli prime minister in a different light and Sharon suddenly was welcome in the French capital.

Visiting Paris in July 2005, Sharon rewarded the new French enthusiasm by referring to Chirac as "one of the world's greatest leaders," and both countries seemed keen to build better relations.

Jerusalem and Paris were in general agreement on the need to stabilize Lebanon and act against Iran's nuclear program.

Chirac will be remembered in Jerusalem as a sometime-friend of Israel and sometime-hardline opponent, and certainly as one of the Arab world's strongest allies in the West — but always as a great friend of the Jewish people and a fighter against anti-Semitism.

Sarkozy and Royal in election showdown

By RINA BASSIST
JTA

PARIS — Nicolas Sarkozy, the tough-talking conservative party candidate who appeared to be favoured by French Jews despite their tradition of liberalism, won the first round of voting for the French presidency.

Exit polls Sunday indicated that Sarkozy, the UMP Party candidate who led nearly every opinion poll leading up to the balloting, garnered some 29.5 per cent of the vote. Segolene Royal, the socialist candidate, received 25.8 percent.

Those two candidates will meet in a May 6 runoff to see who succeeds Jacques Chirac, the president since 1995. The winner in the first round of voting needed 50 per cent of the vote to avoid a runoff.

Sarkozy and Royal were the top vote-getters in a field of 10 that included centrist candidate François Bayrou, who had 18.5 per cent, and extreme right candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen, at 11 per cent.

A near record of some 84 per cent of 44.5 million eligible voters turned out despite the beautiful spring day.

French Jews, despite a tradition of activism in the socialist party, were seen as backing Sarkozy. The former interior minister, known as an American-style law-and-order politician, earned points in the Jewish community for his hard line against Muslim unrest in France, including anti-Semitic attacks.

"I would like to say to all the French people who are afraid of the future that I will protect them against violence and delinquency," Sarkozy told supporters in Paris after the early results were announced.

Sarkozy has been a frequent visitor to Israel and has been nurturing contacts there, as well as in the Arab world, for years. Royal drew fire from the Jewish community for meeting with Hezbollah lawmakers in Beirut during a Mideast tour in December.

The Middle East has been among the hot topics in French politics in recent months. A delegation of French senators visited the region in February on a four-day fact-finding mission.

An opinion poll conducted by IPSOS after the results were announced showed Sarkozy leading Royal, 54 per cent to 46 per cent, in the runoff, the French Press Agency reported.

Nonna Mayer, professor at the Science-Po University and an expert on French politics and the extreme right, said the real surprise was the high voter turnout.

Mayer said bitterness and anger rose in the suburbs after the 2005 riots, "when Sarkozy referred to those burning cars as 'hooligans.' Thousands of people, sons and grandchildren of immigrants, registered to vote at that time.

"This extraordinary participation rate is excellent for French democracy. Much better, obviously, than burning cars to express one's frustration," she said, referring to the riots, in which the protesters, among them many North African and Arab youths, killed at least one person and burned some 4,000 cars.

But not only those living in the suburbs decided to vote. People from rural France voted as well, many for the first time.

"Many living in rural France, who felt frightened by what has happened, frightened by the surge of violence, were mobilized," Mayer said, adding that they were drawn to Sarkozy's stress on security.

Another explanation for the high turnout was the widespread fear of having the extreme right-wing candidate, Le Pen, reach the election runoff as he did in 2002. Le Pen received fewer votes than the pollsters had expected.

U.K. Jews decry journalists' Israel boycott

By JONNY PAUL
JTA

LONDON — Jewish communal organizations are saying that a decision by Britain's largest journalists' union to boycott Israeli goods and ask for government sanctions on the Jewish state affirms what the groups have been thinking for some time: that the British media cannot report objectively on Israel.

The Board of Deputies of British Jews said the journalists' motion earlier this month did nothing to advance peace or help Israelis and Palestinians, and that the move tainted all British journalists by portraying them as biased.

"We've always feared that much of the British media was biased against Israel and distorted its news coverage," Neil Goldstein, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, said in a statement last week. "Now we have proof certain."

The National Union of Journalists voted at its annual meeting April 13 for "a boycott of Israeli goods similar to those boycotts in the struggles against apartheid South Africa led by trade unions and for the Trades Union Congress to demand sanctions be imposed on Israel by the British government and the United Nations."

The motion also condemned the "slaughter of civilians by Israeli troops in Gaza and the Israeli Defence Forces' continued attacks inside Lebanon following the defeat of its army by Hezbollah," and called for the end of "Israeli aggression in Gaza and other occupied territories."

The measure, which was toned down from earlier proposals, passed by a 66-54 margin. It follows campaigns among British academics to boycott Israeli colleagues and institutions – calls that were overturned after they sparked international condemnation.

British Foreign Office Minister Kim Howells said he was "disappointed" by the journalists' vote.

"The government believes that as a friend of both Israel and the Palestinians, we can best exert influence by encouraging both sides to take the steps needed for progress toward peace through close engagement," Howells said last week.

Tim Gopsill, the union's press spokesperson, said the move was partially a reward to Palestinian journalists for co-operating with a campaign to free Alan Johnston, a BBC reporter kidnapped by Palestinian terrorists in Gaza.

Gopsill said the move did not mean British journalists could not report objectively on Israel.

But not everyone believed business could continue as usual.

"It is astounding that British trade unionists should seek to ostracize the one country in the Middle East where trade unions enjoy freedom of association and expression while uttering not a peep against those regimes which really do suppress trade unions and intellectual inquiry," Melanie Phillips wrote in the Daily Mail. "But this is now the madness of Britain."

Anti-Israel ad campaign set for Washington subway

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Washington, D.C., area commuters will be inundated with a controversial poster-ad campaign when they take the city's subway system next month.

Starting May 13 for four weeks, the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority (WMATA) has ordered 20 of its subway stations to place posters advertising a June 10 rally to end "Israel's illegal military occupation of the Palestinian West Bank, Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem."

Initiated by a charity called the U.S. Campaign to End the Israeli Occupation, the 46-by-60-inch posters depict an imposing tank pointing its main firing turret at a child with a schoolbag walking along a dirt road.

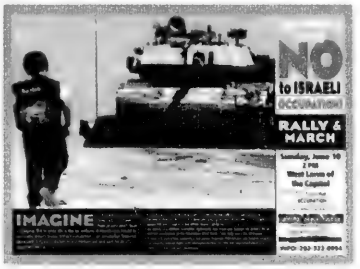
"Imagine if this were your child's path to school. Palestinians don't have to imagine," the poster states, before continuing to call for an end to U.S. aid for "Israel's brutal military occupation… paid for by U.S. taxpayers like you."

CBS Outdoor, the New York-based firm that places in-station advertising for WMATA, at first refused to consider the poster, but eventually relented to pressure from WMATA and the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU).

According to an April 4 report in the Washington Jewish Week online, the U.S. Campaign contacted the ACLU, which then advised WMATA to order CBS Outdoor to place the posters, citing freedom of speech rights.

Joanne Ferreira, a WMATA spokesperson, said, "We didn't have any problem with the ad. It was a First Amendment issue."

In the same report, Oren Segal, a spokesperson for the Anti-Defamation League said, "If past events by this organization are any indication, it will make no attempt to present a balanced view of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and this ad is a pure reflection of that."



Jodi Senese, CBS Outdoor's executive vice-president in charge of marketing, explained to The CJN last week why she first turned away the poster.

"I initially rejected it on grounds that I thought it was too inflammatory to children," she said over the phone from her Manhattan office.

Senese recalled that she told U.S. Campaign staff that if they wanted to raise awareness for their campaign, she was fine with it based on First Amendment rights, "but not like this," she said.

The U.S. Campaign claims 250 member organizations in the United States. Its website features a prominent logo with the slogan, "Apartheid: Wrong for South Africans. Wrong for Palestinians."

Senese, who is Jewish, indicated that though she was uneasy with the ad, her personal feelings were not a part of her initial decision to dismiss the ad.

"I'm very proud [of being a Jew]," Senese said. "I thought the image was inflammatory, but I also believe in our First Amendment rights. As Jews [in America], we thrive on that right as well."

Senese indicated at the time of the interview, that to her knowledge no other group had yet come forward with a counter-campaign for CBS Outdoor to run.

Arthur Spitzer, who is Jewish and the legal director for the ACLU in the National Capital Area, told the Washington Jewish Week it wasn't "a case about Judaism or Israel… but about establishing someone's right to freedom of speech, which I agree with regardless of whether I agree with their particular political position."

Jewish organizations in the D.C. area downplayed the seriousness of the upcoming campaign.

Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, president of Washington-based pro-Israel think-tank, the Israel Project, said her organization didn't consider the ad campaign worth wasting resources to counter in the media and expected the ads to have a "minimum impact."

She said when the Israel Project and other prominent Jewish organizations in the area first learned about the ad, they worried about its "ominous" potential.

They discussed the matter at length and then conducted several focus group studies on the ad with dozens of "highly educated people" before concluding the ad wasn't worth combating actively.

In fact, Laszlo Mizrahi claimed that of the dozens who analyzed the ad in the focus groups, upon first glance most thought the tank was an American one surrounded by Iraqi children. And even when they read the poster's words, participants had little sympathy for the cause, she said.

"It's a poorly run... poorly executed campaign and the American people are onto [the U.S. Campaign's] game," Laszlo Mizrahi said. "There are real, legitimate threats to the U.S.-Israel relationship – this is just not one of them.

"If these guys want to build support for their cause, they need to have something to sell that doesn't encourage children to blow themselves up."

BOOK LAUNCH FOR RIFKE BRINGS HUNDREDS TO FOUR SEASONS

Rosalie Wise Sharp and husband Issy Sharp launched her lovely new memoir Rifke: An Improbable Life last week at a ritzy early evening gathering at the Yorkville Four Seasons Hotel.

Some 400 to 600 people enjoyed the delectable Kensington Market buffet and welcoming words from Issy, publisher Jack David of ECW Press, and Rosalie herself, who read a colourful and funny segment of her narrative called "the chicken story."

Issy (founder, chairman and CEO of Four Seasons) also garnered laughs when he offered "a special thanks to the Four Seasons management and their staff… [who] measured up to what we expected."

David recounted that although the manuscript landed on his desk already typeset and with a cover design, he didn't recognize who had sent it until the author's assertion, some 50 pages in, that "my husband Issy is a good provider." He and editor Stuart Ross worked closely with Rosalie for about a year in putting the sparkle on what they immediately saw as a diamond in the rough.

"The two of them generally prodded me into writing a better book," Rosalie said. The lavishly illustrated Rifke: An Improbable Life is 254 pages long.

Musical prodigies headline gala concert

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Young musical prodigies from around the world will showcase their gifts in Toronto on May 4 at the third annual gala Young Stars of the Young Century concert.

The event will feature an esteemed collection of 10 virtuoso musicians and singers ranging in age from 10 to 20.

"Musically speaking, the concert will be a very interesting program," said impresario Svetlana Dvoretskaya, founder of Show One Productions, which is producing the gala.

"It's very emotional music, but it's also energetic and dynamic because the kids give it that energy. We make it accessible for everybody."

A wide variety of instruments will be featured in the concert, including the balalaika and oboe.

Special guests on stage will be dancers from Toronto's Hamazkayin Armenian Cultural Society and the Armenian Day School Choir.

"They will perform some mainstream pieces as well as Armenian folks songs, which are absolutely beautiful," Dvoretskaya said.

Two hits from last years' concert, pianist Luka Okrostvordize, 16, from the Republic of Georgia, and local violinist David Lakirovitch, 17, will return and perform together for the first time ever.

Okrostvordize is also scheduled to perform a special solo recital in Toronto on May 9.

"I will be playing some of my own music at the concert, and I also want to play [pieces by] Georgian composer Taktakishvili," said Okrostvordize, who started playing piano at age four.

"I hope [the audience] will fall in love with the music."

Prior to coming to Canada, the pianist will participate in a Vladimir Horowitz competition.

Though still a teenager, Okrostvordize has accomplished a great deal and has dreams of touring the world.

"I hope to play all over the world and I really want to have time to write more music," he said.

"Music is my life and… I love it because it makes me feel complete."

All the Young Stars performers have won at least three international festivals or competitions. To appear in the concert, they had to meet strict criteria and be chosen by the Moscow-based Vladimir Spivakov International Charity Foundation, which is headed by the famed Russian violinist and conductor of the same name.

A committee in Toronto makes the final decision about who goes on stage here.

Some headliners this year include pianist Jia Li (Cathy) Yang, soprano Antonella Cavallaro and accordionist Mikhail Tsvetkov.

"As a producer, this is one of my most favourite projects," Dvoretskaya said.

"Parents, teachers and the young people themselves who come out to see it are really inspired by seeing these kids. It's very motivational and I'm sure this year will be great."

The Young Stars concert on May 4 takes place at the George Weston Recital Hall at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Okrostvordize's piano recital will be on May 9 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts' Studio Theatre.

For tickets, call 416-870-8000 or visit www.ticketmaster.ca.

For more information about the concerts, visit www.showoneproductions.ca or call 416-737-6785.

No need to bring popcorn to the TJFF

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

A Brazilian film set amid the backdrop of 1970s World Cup fever launches the 15th annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 5 to 13.

The Year My Parents Went on Vacation, directed by Cao Hamburger, tells the story of 12-year-old Mauro, a child of communist parents on the run from the police. It is a richly detailed, bittersweet picture that gently shows us how a child finds his place in a multicultural landscape that is constantly changing.

The festival closes with the local premiere of the American film Rape of Europa, a stunning and in-depth look into the systematic theft and destruction of art at the hands of the Nazis.

In between these two films, the festival is presenting more than 90 films from 16 different countries. Among them are films on ballroom dancing, Bob Dylan, bagels, the first Zionist Playboy bunny and a pod of excommunicated dolphins.

Of course, no Jewish gathering is complete without noshes, and once again the TJFF will feed its audiences while they wait in lineups.

There will be herring on Wednesdays, French food prior to the screening of Comme T'Y Es Belle (the Jewish answer to Sex in the City), and strawberries and ice cream on closing night. Frank Silva, general manager of Montreal's legendary Schwartz's Deli, will also be on hand for the double bill screening on May 10 of One of the Last and Chez Schwartz, and he'll be bringing his smoked meat sandwiches.

As always, many of the screenings feature visiting filmmakers who take part in interviews, panels and audience Q&As.

Tickets can be purchased online at www.tjff.com or by calling 416-967-1528. Advance tickets can also be bought at the box office, at 17 Madison Ave., every day except Shabbat until May 3.

The films will be screened at three theatres: the Bloor Cinema, the Al Green Theatre (at the Miles Nadal JCC), and, for the first time, at the Sheppard Grande.

For prices and movie schedules, check www.tjff.com.

Textile exhibit celebrates Pomegranate Guild's 25th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, Toronto, celebrates its 25th anniversary with an exhibition of its members' works.

The exhibit, "Threads of Identity," runs from April 29 to May 20 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's Koffler Loggia Gallery.

The major work of the exhibition is a large wall hanging, Bigdei Hakohen Hagadol: The Sacred Vestments of the High Priests As Described in the Book of Exodus. The hanging contains 25 squares, marking the 25th anniversary of the guild.

The hanging's designer is Haya Nativ, a renowned textile artist and teacher. Each of the squares was created by guild members.

Haya Nativ is seen with the major work of the "Threads of Identity" exhibition, which commemorates the 25th anniversary of the Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, Toronto.

The 12 centre squares, representing the 12 tribes of Israel, are in different colours, and each one is made with a different colour jewel. The squares are edged in needlepoint stitching and beading. The hem of the robe is decorated with needlepoint pomegranates and bells.

The hanging's 13 outer squares are done in shades of blue, and each contains a Hebrew word relating to creation, women, prayer and spirituality.

Guild members' works on display also include challah and matzah covers, mezuzot, Sukkah banners, Torah mantles, beaded items and other pieces. A unique addition to the exhibition is a display of shadow boxes.

To commemorate the Pomegranate Guild's 25th anniversary, Nativ's husband, David, an aeronautical engineer, created a collage of photos depicting its history. It is presented in five-year segments, beginning with photographs of the four founding members, Phyllis Spivak, Beverley Colman-Lokash, Temma Gentles and Zita Gardner, and the guild's first meeting in 1982 of women interested in the advancement of Judaic needlework.

The guild has 100 members, who meet monthly at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.At the meetings, new techniques for the members to incorporate into their works are demonstrated.

Some of the members meet weekly to work on individual and group projects. Many of their works have been donated to Baycrest.

Guild members, from novices to professionals, come from all segments of the community and come together as Jewish women with a common interest.

"Threads are neutral," says guild president Anna VanDelman. "They are neutral with non-affiliation until they are woven together to create an identity.

"I am excited that we can show the community our engagement in hiddur mitzvah – the enhancement of ritual in the synagogue and the home, for splendor and for beauty."

After it leaves the Koffler Loggia Gallery, the exhibit will be mounted at the Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum at Baycrest in June, where it runs until September.

"Threads of Identity," opens at the Koffler Loggia Gallery at 2:30 p.m. on Sunday, April 29. Exhibit hours are 9 a.m. to 8:30 p.m., Sundays to Fridays.

Reggae-ska album has a Jewish twist

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

For many music lovers, it would be hard to imagine a Winnipeg-born Jew releasing perhaps one of the best, most uplifting reggae-ska albums in the last few years.

But that's exactly what Ron Wiseman has done.

With the January 2007 release of his first full-length album, Mystical Mood, out of Marshmellow Records in Toronto, the musician and songwriter delivers 52 minutes of head-bopping, Marleyesque goodness, with a Jewish twist.

The entirety of the album, from opening track Measure for Measure to its closing song, We Are the Prophecy, is one feel-good, cosmic jam.

Borrowing from the wisdom of the Torah and his own life experiences, Wiseman's intelligent lyrics anchor a bounty of grooving, up-tempo beats.

It's clear that Wiseman's time spent working with other luminaries in the musical field, including recording with contemporary reggae star Sugar Minott in Jamaica, has served only to bring him that much closer to musical "jah-ness".

Wiseman, who now calls Tel Aviv home, has clearly been affected by his musical sojourns and studies in the Holy Land.

Mystical Mood is anything but a typical guitar, bass and drum-driven reggae disc.

Listeners can hear the distinctive sounds of the oud, a lute-like, Middle Eastern instrument, as well as shakers, bongos and kasabas, on the album.

And Wiseman also wisely enlisted Amy Sky, the outstanding Toronto vocalist and solo artist, for backing vocals on five songs. Her voice adds depth and warmth to the overall mix.

Still, it's Wiseman's clever phrasing and his impeccable pacing that dominate the album.

On the fifth track, Waiting for a Miracle, Wiseman, sounding an awful lot like a younger, less gravelly throated Leonard Cohen, draws the listener in with his staccato stanzas.

"The city's eyes that have no soul/ and all that glitters takes its toll/ and once you were a messenger/ now nothing can get through to even reach you," he sings.

It's but a sample of the creative, reflective and playful lyrics to be discovered on Mystical Mood.

Have a listen. But be warned: this album will cause spontaneous toe-tapping, head-nodding and perhaps even dancing.

Illustrated book showcases work of sculptor Jack Culiner

You've probably seen some of Jack Culiner's works. More than 50 of his gleaming bronze statues enhance the corridors and spaces at Baycrest and Mount Sinai Hospital. Many more will follow in the future.

Culiner, 93, has donated his sculptures to medical institutions in order to "make them less intimidating and more attractive, user-friendly places for patients, family and staff," he once wrote.

Collected Works: Baycrest and Mount Sinai (Boston Mills Press) is a richly illustrated book that showcases many of his current and future donations. Among them is Love Cycle (pictured), part of a romantic cycle that includes Embrace, Passion and Erotica.

Culiner is one of four sons of Russian Jewish immigrants who settled in New York before moving to Ontario in 1907. He was born in Hearst, Ont.

The book is available by contacting Mary Kotsopoulos at the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, mkotsopoulos@mtsinai.on.ca or 416-586-4800, ext. 5905, or at Baycrest's W.A. Gift Shop.

Ex A&R exec founds music industry prize

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

When Steve Jordan decided to leave the hectic life of a high-profile, record label A&R (artist and repertoire) representative behind, he did it in humble fashion: by starting a non-profit organization called the Polaris Music Prize.

Granted, his non-profit is still neck-deep in the music industry, but it's planted there Jordan's way.

In 2001, he decided it was high time for Canada to have an independent award for the country's best album, regardless of genre, sales, mass popularity, label or financial backing.

Jordan, who grew up in a small Jewish community in Kingston, now works from his Toronto home office as the Polaris Prize's executive director and only staff member.

Despite persistent comparisons, he insists Polaris isn't in competition with Canada's other main awards staple, the Juno Awards.

"The Junos do two things that we are not set up to do... they exist to honour a bunch of crafts and categories and run a highly rated TV show," Jordan recently told Heebonics/The CJN over lunch at a cozy café in Toronto's trendy Little Italy. "We just do something the Junos don't. We understand what are place is. We specifically put our event months away from the Junos so we can try to avoid those comparisons."

The prize, named after the northern star, implies "Canadiana without using words like beaver, maple or habitant," he said.

After five years of hard work, badgering friends and acquaintances in Canada's recording industry, cobbling together sponsors, assembling a board of directors and several false starts, the first Polaris Music Prize was handed out last September to Final Fantasy, a.k.a. Owen Pallett, for the scatalogically titled album, He Poos Clouds.

Part of a gala evening at Toronto's Phoenix club, finalists performed eight-minute sets for a crowd of 350 industry insiders and a panel of Jordan's hand-picked judges, made up of Canadian regional music journalists and broadcasters.

Winnings included $20,000 in prize money and hefty marketing for nominees' albums in music stores across Canada.

Though the precise September date and venue for the 2007 version isn't set yet, Jordan said the format and prizes will likely be the same this year.

This year's shortlist of nominees, culled from albums released between June 2006 and May 2007, will be revealed sometime in July.

Jordan himself is surprised by just how successful his venture has become.

Now into its sophomore year, the non-profit has already established itself as an international beacon for music-lovers.

In fact, just being nominated affords Canadian bands acclaim they may not otherwise have had.

"Artists get a lot of media attention organically as a result of the Polaris Prize. Which is one of our objectives," Jordan said. "Malajube [a finalist from last year] recently called to say they couldn't go anywhere in Portugal without answering media questions about their nomination."

The selection process works this way: more than 100 music journalist-jurors from across Canada submit their top five album picks based on ones they've heard or reviewed over the past year. A journalist's number one pick is assigned five points, the number two pick gets four, etc.

Jordan and a small jury (last year there were 11) whittle the submissions down to a "long list" and resubmit these to the journalists for another round of points until a shortlist is finally achieved by July.

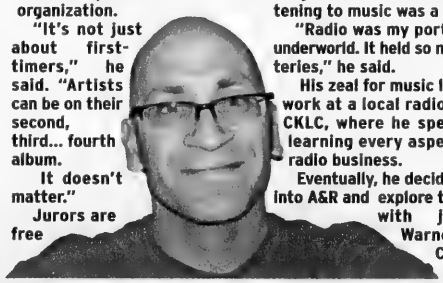
Though many of the artists showcased last year are lesser known than other, more popular Canadian bands, Jordan is careful to explain that Polaris is definitely not an indie-centric organization.

"It's not just about first-timers," he said. "Artists can be on their second, third... fourth album.

It doesn't matter."

Jurors are free to pick whichever artist catches their fancy in a given year, regardless of whether they're big-name acts like the Tragically Hip or relative unknowns like the Deadly Snakes, another finalist from last year.

"We're not trying to be populist, but we are trying to make [Canadian bands] more popular," Jordan said. "Polaris is all about having a discussion about music."



Steve Jordan

And Jordan listens to each nominee's album with great interest.

As a boy growing up in Kingston, Jordan said that listening to music was a passion.

"Radio was my portal to the underworld. It held so many mysteries," he said.

His zeal for music led him to work at a local radio station, CKLC, where he spent years learning every aspect of the radio business.

Eventually, he decided to hop into A&R and explore that world with jobs at Warner Music Canada and True North Records.

While it was fun, Jordan eventually tired of the work and changing face of the music industry.

"A&R is a constant struggle to get credibility with the artist you want to sign, with the bosses who you want to please by signing artists who can sell records," Jordan said. "The artists I grew up with were allowed to develop their art and marketing over the course of a few albums, like a lot of the artists who were nominated in [Polaris'] first year."

Jordan wants to continue promoting and rewarding that musical work ethic with his prize for a long time and hopes Canada will come along for the ride.

"We'd love some government funding," he said. "It would only be natural and right to put the Canadian flag on this product."

Two books by two rescuers of Yiddish

Outwitting History: The Amazing Adventures of a Man Who Rescued a Million Yiddish Books*, by Aaron Lansky, Algonquin Books of Chapel Hill.

Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods*, by Michael Wex, Harper Perennial.

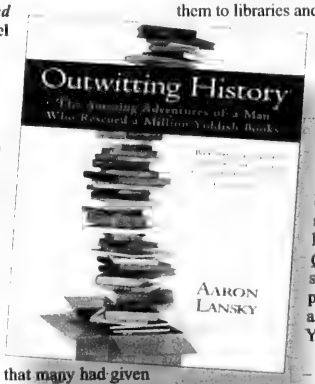
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN



Some three decades ago, when Aaron Lansky and friends began climbing into dumpsters to rescue discarded Yiddish books, he had no idea what sort of treasures might turn up or how far the venture would carry him.

Today – one million books later – he is the founder and president of the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass., the legendary bibliographic repository that, thanks to his inspirational efforts, rose like a phoenix from the ashes of a language that many had given up for dead.

It was the great Yiddish scholar Max Weinreich who dared to suggest that "Because Yiddish has magic, it will outwit history." Appropriately, Lansky drew his title from the remark and became a conduit of its prophecy.

It must be observed, with no scientific basis whatsoever, that only a Jew could write a passionate adventure story about rescuing books. Lansky's descriptions of heroic missions by teams of collectors to save old Yiddish tomes are engrossing, entertaining and dramatic, because in many cases the books were only a hair's breadth away from the dustbin of history.

The National Yiddish Book Center acts as a clearing-house for Yiddish books, collecting unwanted volumes and selling them to libraries and readers who desire them. It has scanned and reprinted multitudes of rare and not-so-rare titles using a specialized Japanese-made scanner that passes over both sides of a page at once, reducing wear and tear on paper that is often crumbling with age.

Lansky says he was surprised at the high proportion of books, ranging from Bambi to the Bhagavad Gita, that were classics in translation. A young Isaac Bashevis Singer was responsible for translating Afn mayrev front keyn nayes – All Quiet on the Western Front. A 13-volume set of the collected works of Guy de Maupassant in Yiddish was distributed free as a subscription incentive for a popular Yiddish newspaper.

A popular Yiddish work was Kenig Lir – Shakespeare's King Lear – which "dealt with a subject much on the minds of Jewish immigrants: tsores mit kinder – trouble with children," Lansky observes. It is with a rather chutzpahdik mixture of temerity and wit that an editor decided to emblazon the cover of another Shakespearean translation with the promise "Fartaytsht un fabesert" – translated and improved.

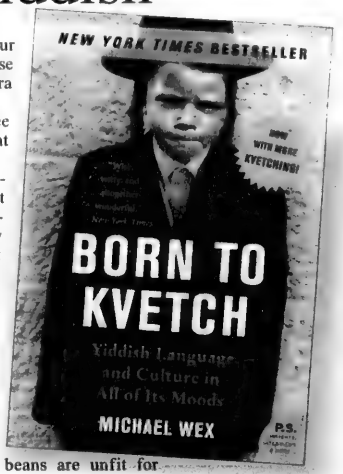
Lansky presents a geshmak (delectable) pocket history of Yiddish literature as well as a rare overview of what was rolling off Yiddish presses in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.



Did your family ever use a 1930s-era Maxwell House Coffee Haggadah at Passover? Lansky presents a neat bit of sociological history by reporting that Maxwell House distributed the readers for free with its coffee specifically to counter the mis-impression that coffee beans are unfit for Passover consumption: coffee beans are actually berries, and thus fully kosher.

The centre's rarest and most remarkable find has to be Leksikon fun politishe un fremdverter, the Dictionary of Political and Foreign Terminology in Yiddish, an 1,100-page volume edited by Dor-Ber Slutski and published in Kiev in 1929.

Lansky describes the book as "a scholar's dream: a lexical snapshot showing exactly how Jews perceived the world around them at a moment of great social and political change." He was, therefore, perplexed to find no listing of the title in either the YIVO Institute in New York or the Library of Congress in Washington.

After much digging, he found an obscure volume containing a revealing mention of the book: "Slutski spent the entire decade of the 1920s working on a comprehensive dictionary of foreign and political terminology. The book was published in 1929. However, the authorities deemed it politically unacceptable and destroyed the entire print run. No copies survive."

After more detective work, Lansky found that a cousin of Slutski had visited Kiev and been given a copy of the dictionary as it was coming off the printing press, just days or hours before the secret police destroyed all other copies. That copy has been donated to the centre.

Lansky was awarded a lucrative and prestigious MacArthur Fellowship for his against-all-odds achievement, the story of which is elegantly told in Outwitting History. The book costs $36.95 in hardcover.

Bouquets, encomiums, kudos and raves have deservedly been heaped upon Toronto's own Michael Wex for his splendid and erudite treatise, Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods, which has catapulted him from near obscurity onto the New York Times bestseller list.

Some of us know Wex for his storytelling abilities and the deadpan whine in which he relates, for example, his wholly original story of a kugel that comes magically to life: audiences end up rolling in the aisles with laughter.

HarperCollins has produced a softcover edition of Born to Kvetch, which promises "Now with more kvetching!" and includes an additional "study guide" section on the author and the book's unanticipated success, which, Wex acknowledges, is "nothing to kvetch about."

The Lethbridge-born author, who moved to Calgary and then to Toronto, said he never dreamt that the Yiddish he spoke at home would ever be useful in the world beyond. "[J]ust as I never studied Yiddish in school, I never could have imagined putting it to any serious use in later life," he writes.

Lovers of Yiddish, especially those with an affinity for its colourful and off-colour phraseology, are well advised to read Born to Kvetch, which is available as a Harper Perennial paperback for $17.50.

Jewish law permits organ donation, panel agrees

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Donating an organ or tissue is pikuach nefesh, saving a human life, a halachic imperative that supersedes nearly all other Torah injunctions.

That is not to say, the speakers at an all-day symposium on the subject agreed, that those injunctions are unimportant or not a source of disagreement among rabbinic scholars.

The program, "Organ donation in Jewish law: a conversation about life. Medical and halachic aspects of organ donation," was held recently at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, presented by the synagogue's adult education medical ethics committee, and sponsored by Helen and David Brown and family, Trillium Gift of Life Network, Astellas Pharma Canada, Inc., Novartis Pharmaceuticals, Sanofi-Aventis Canada Inc., Sharon Sussman and Avi Wurman and the Life Management Financial Group Ltd.

In the keynote speech, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Synagogue, said there are four halachic prohibitions that factor into whether or not organ donation is acceptable: no benefit can be derived from a death, there can be no disfigurement of a dead person, the entire body must be buried, and burial must not be delayed, which can happen if organs are being removed.

However. Rabbi Bulka said, all these considerations "pale into insignificance" against the absolute obligation of pikuach nefesh.

What must be the main consideration, he cautioned, is defining the moment of death, whether it is at the time of cardiovascular cessation or brain stem death.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

That issue, of course, does not arise in the case of a living donation, such as bone marrow or a partial liver transplant, he said. The issue that does arise is whether even a minimal risk to the donor's health is permissible.

"The general consensus is that the risk is allowed. However, a person can't be forced to donate, nor can he be stopped if he does wish to do so."

Dr. Beni Gesundheit spoke in several capacities – he is head of the bone marrow transplantation department at Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital, has a PhD in Jewish medical ethics from the University of Toronto, and has received rabbinic ordination, smichah, from Israel's chief rabbinate. He recently spent several years in Toronto on a fellowship in research and clinical oncology in hematology-oncology at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

The point, he said, is not whether organ donation is allowed, but rather under what conditions it is allowed. In other words, he added, referring to the same issue as Rabbi Bulka, at what point is a person considered dead?

The scholars echo the medical profession's concern over whether death occurs when the heart stops pumping blood or when a person is declared brain dead, particularly in the case of brain stem death. While there are now different technologies to detect brain death, Gesundheit said, the old way was to hold a feather under the nose to detect breathing, since respiration is controlled chiefly by the brain.

The book of Genesis speaks about "the breath of life," he said. Rambam, Rashi and the sages of the Talmud considered that the seat of life is the respiratory system and not the heart, even though they didn't realize exactly why this was so. "Now we realize that respiration comes from the brain stem."

Once the heart stops beating, it can often be restarted. That is not the case with brain activity.

Twentieth-century sages Rabbi Moshe Feinstein and Rabbi Shmuel Auerbach arranged for what has come to be known as the sheep experiment. They had a sheep decapitated, rendering it dead by any definition, even though they could still see some neurological functioning going on afterward. "They could see that this happens even if the brain is cut off from the body."

From this experiment, they deduced that brain stem death must be the arbiter for declaring death and allowing removal of organs.

This decision mirrors the Harvard University criterion of death, which has been almost universally accepted.

Gesundheit said there is some uncertainty as to whether Rabbi Feinstein fully accepted the idea of brain stem death marking the moment of death, although his son-in-law, Rabbi Moshe Tendler, a rosh yeshiva at Yeshiva University and a respected expert in biomedical ethics, insists that he did. Nevertheless, Gesundheit said, Rabbi Yoseph Shalom Eliashev, a major halachic arbiter of the haredim, does not generally allow organ donation by any definition of death, although he has done so on a case by case basis.

The consensus among halachic authorities, Gesundheit said, is that as long as death has unquestionably taken place, organs may be removed for donation, even if there appears to be some neurological or cardiac functioning.

Concert raises funds to help young people fight cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

For about eight years, Alli Shapiro-Amar battled Hodgkin's lymphoma, cancer of the lymphatic tissues. With radiation, chemotherapy, various experimental therapies and her own determination, she was able to live beyond the two years life expectancy that came with her diagnosis, finish a course in theatre production at Ryerson University and get married.

On May 3, Take My Hand, the second annual fundraising concert of an organization called Alli's Journey, will raise funds to help the cell therapy program at Princess Margaret Hospital. It will also honour Dr. Armand Keating, who heads the program. He is an internationally recognized expert in stem cell transplantation and cell therapy, and was Shapiro-Amar's oncologist.

Last year, Shapiro-Amar took part in the program. But not this year – she died in July 2006, just before her 27th birthday and her second wedding anniversary.

During her treatment, she realized that there were no services for young adults who were undergoing radiation or chemotherapy. Many, she said in an interview last April, were far from home and all alone.

She, her mother Pam Shainhouse Shapiro and other family and friends formed Alli's Journey, a grassroots charitable organization that supports education, research and support for young adults with cancer.

This year's concert will feature Canadian music director David Warrack and will offer selections from opera, classics, alternative music, bluegrass, Broadway, cabaret, reggae, soul and hip-hop. Performers will include comedian Ron James, actor Thom Allison, singer Lily Frost, singer Matthew Barber, the Andras Weber String Quartet, actor and singer Theresa Tova, lyric tenor Mark Dubois, Nancy White, Stone Fox, the Wexford Singers and Kae Sun. Jackie Richardson and the Barenaked Ladies will appear in video presentations.

Last year's concert, Shainhouse Shapiro said, supported a program at Princess Margaret Hospital called Healing Beyond the Body. "It trains volunteers to work specifically with these young people who have all kinds of issues and fears beyond the cancer."

Keating is a professor of medicine, director of the division of hematology and Epstein chair in cell therapy and transplantation at the University of Toronto. He has also recently served as chief of medical services and head of the medical oncology and hematology department at Princess Margaret Hospital/Ontario Cancer Institute and director of hematology-oncology at Mount Sinai. In October 2006, he became director of the Princess Margaret Hospital cell therapy and translational research program.

He also served for 10 years as a cancer research scientist of the National Cancer Institute of Canada.

The field of cell therapy is still in its infancy. According to a media release from Alli's Journey, it is "based on the notion that certain immune cells can be used clinically to attack cancer cells while other cells, including some from the bone marrow, can help to regenerate injured tissue or organs."

Shapiro-Amar was scheduled to be one of the first subjects to try this new therapy, but by the time Keating was given approval to begin, she was too ill, her mother said.

Shainhouse Shapiro said she hopes to continue Alli's Journey "forever."

Tickets for this year's Take My Hand range from $50 to $150, and are available through Ticketmaster, online at www.tickemaster.ca, by phone at 416-872-1111, at the theatre box office or at the door.

Israel beats Canada in Fed Cup tennis

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

KAMLOOPS, B.C. — Shahar Peer defeated Aleksandra Wozniak 6-4, 6-0 last weekend to give Israel an unassailable 3-0 lead over Canada in their best-of-five tennis Fed Cup World Group II contest in Kamloops, B.C.

Israel lost the last two matches later on Sunday to take the overall tie 3-2.

Needing to win to keep the Canadians alive in her contest, Wozniak was the first to break serve. However, she was unable to consolidate the break, and soon Peer had broken twice to take the first set.

The second set was a one-sided affair, as Peer ran out a 6-4, 6-0 winner to notch her 11th straight Fed Cup win and take Israel just one match away from being among the top eight women's tennis nations for the first time.

Peer, ranked 16th in the world, and Tzipi Obziler had given Israel a stranglehold on the tie the day before.

Peer defeated Stephanie Dubois 6-4, 6-4 in just under 90 minutes in the opening round, after which Obziler took a dramatic three-set thriller over Canadian No. 1 Wozniak 6-4, 4-6, 6-4.

"My experience helped a lot," said Obziler, who turned 34 last week and was playing her 56th tie for Israel. "I just kept believing that I could win right until the last point, and I think that was the difference."

"It was a big battle out there today and it was a few games that made the difference. Otherwise it was a really close match," Wozniak said.

Russia, Italy and France reached the semi-finals with two matches to spare.

Israel will now play in the World Group I playoffs, which include the losing teams from World Group I and the winners from World Group II.

Israel's possible opponents are China, Spain, Japan, the Czech Republic, Austria, Germany, Australia and the winner of the Belgium-U.S. tie.

Canada will attempt to retain its World Group II status in matches beginning in September.

Former major leaguer Lou Limmer passes away

By MARTIN ABRAMOWITZ
JTA

BOSTON — Lou Limmer, part of a little-known bit of Jewish baseball trivia, passed away April 1 at age 82 in Boca Raton, Fla.

The Philadelphia A's first-baseman appeared in a total of 209 games in 1951 and 1954, batting .202 with 19 homers, 62 RBIs and three stolen bases.

Notwithstanding those modest numbers, fans with a particular interest in Jews in baseball and the history of baseball in Philadelphia remember Limmer fondly for four reasons: his membership in a small group of Jewish players whose careers spanned the years between the Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax eras; his central role in a "historic baseball encounter;" his place in Philadelphia Athletics history; and his unique contribution to "the Jewish angle" among all Jewish players.

Hank Greenberg retired after spending the 1947 season with Pittsburgh, and Sandy Koufax made his debut with the Brooklyn Dodgers in the summer of 1955. During the intervening seven seasons, a dozen Jewish players played or were called up to the major leagues. In their ranks were three prominent players, three journeymen and a half-dozen players who came up from the minors only briefly.

Although the word is often overused, these players formed a kind of community. In varying and interlocking combinations they knew each other, socialized, played winter ball together and, on at least one occasion, did a Passover seder together.

The prominent players were New York Giants and Boston Braves slugger-outfielder Sid Gordon; 1951 American League ERA-leader Saul Rogovin and 1953 AL MVP Al Rosen, who almost won the Triple Crown.

The journeymen were catcher Myron (later "Joe") Ginsberg, outfielder Cal Abrams, and Bronx-born Louie Limmer, who was one of 12 children from an Orthodox household.

It was Limmer who told the story of three Jewish players and one Italian-American umpire. It happened May 2, 1951, and remains the only known time that a Jewish batter faced a Jewish pitcher with a Jewish catcher behind the plate in a major league game.

In Limmer's words: "I got along with most of the umpires. There was this one, Joe Paparella, he was a nice guy. We had a game in Detroit and Saul Rogovin was pitching and Joe Ginsberg was catching. I came up to pinch hit.

"So Paparella comes from behind home plate and he dusts it off and he says. 'Boy, now I've got the three Heebs. I wonder who's going to win the battle?' and Rogovin throws the first pitch and I hit it into the stands, and Paparella says, 'I guess you're the winner, Lou.'

"It so happens I wasn't the winner because Joe Ginsberg stayed with Detroit, and Saul Rogovin went to the White Sox that year and he led the league in ERA and poor Lou Limmer, he got shipped to the minors."

Limmer's minor-league career, both before and after his major-league stint, reads like a railroad signboard: Omaha, Lincoln, Louisville, St. Paul, Buffalo, Toronto, Columbus, Birmingham. Virtually wherever he played, Limmer recalled, Jews reached out to him – the dairy owner in Lincoln, the car dealers in Omaha and Toronto. He also recalled anti-Jewish, anti-black road signs in the U.S. South and hanging out with Jackie Robinson in Florida in spring training towns where neither of them were welcome.

A frequent participant in gatherings of the Philadelphia A's Historical Society, Limmer was proud to relate that at the end of the 1954 season, just before the A's moved to Kansas City, he had the last homer and the last base-hit in franchise history.

Limmer also was the first Jewish ball player to serve as president of his synagogue, at Castle Hill Jewish Community Center in his native and beloved Bronx. He served a five-year term.

Lou Limmer was a great-story teller, a reminder of a unique between-the-superstars era of Jews in baseball – and a mensch.

Martin Abramowitz produces Jewish baseball cards and lectures on Jews in baseball as president of Jewish Major Leaguers, Inc., on the web at www.jewishmajorleaguers.org. This story is based in large part on a Jewish Major Leaguers oral history interview of Lou Limmer conducted in November 2005 by journalist Marc Katz.

Israel remains in IIHF Division II after 2-2 record at tourney

Israel finished in the middle of the pack in an International Ice Hockey Federation world championship tournament held recently in Seoul, South Korea. Israel amassed a 2-2 record with wins over Mexico and Iceland and lost to Australia and the host South Koreans in the Division II, Group B event.

The South Koreans, with an unblemished 4-0 record, advanced to Division I, while North Korea, which withdrew from the tournament, was relegated to Division III next year.

Sergey Frenkel led the Israeli attack with three goals and two assists in four games. The Israelis were missing past leaders such as Alon and Oren Eizenman, as well as Max Birbraer, who played professionally in England this year.

Two years ago, Israel won the division and advanced to Division I where they competed with the likes of Germany, France and England. When they failed to win a game during the 2006 tournament, they were relegated back to Division II for 2007.

BBYO RECORD BEATERS

Twenty-eight players got together recently at a Thornhill school in a bid to set a new Guinness world record for the longest indoor floor hockey game. The players broke the record, which was 24 hours, by playing for 24 and a half hours. The event also raised money to support Shoot For a Cure, a charity that funds spinal chord research.

Jewish goalie gives Moose insurance for playoff drive

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — This longtime tracker of Jewish athletes received a mid-March telephone message from a friend that was brief, but to the point.

He asked if I was going to the Manitoba Moose game evening to see the team's new Jewish goalie Dov Grumet-Morris.

The young netminder had just arrived in Winnipeg with his new teammates from a road trip during which he had joined the American Hockey League (AHL) team. He was filling in as an emergency replacement after an injury to veteran Wade Flaherty. The Peoria Rivermen probably wished he had missed his plane, since the newcomer turned aside all 28 of the Rivermen's shots in a 4-0 victory.

On March 28, the 25-year-old made a second appearance and blocked 44 of 45 shots in a 2-1 shootout loss in Milwaukee. The single goal he allowed, in regulation time, was steered into the net by his own defenceman. Nonetheless, he was voted the game's first star.

Grumet-Morris started out with the Moose third in the team's puck-stop pecking order, but his dexterous play saw him move up to second behind Drew MacIntyre when rookie Julien Ellis, the backup, was demoted to Victoria of the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL).

On April 7, at the home of the Rivermen in Evanston, Ill., the native caused the opposition more grief, turning aside 34 shots for a 2-0 Moose victory.

The wandering Jew – who in less than two years has already had brief pro stops in Laredo of the Central Hockey League, San Antonio, Portland and Hamilton of the AHL and Cincinnati of the ECHL – may have been on a pro tryout contract, but as far as Moose management were concerned, with the playoffs fast approaching, he wasn't going anywhere anytime soon.

In 17 AHL regular season games this year, his save percentage was a gaudy .926 and his goals against average a respectable 2.30.

Asked about playing on Friday nights or Saturday, he responded politely, "I'm Conservative traditional. I went to Jewish day school and I speak Hebrew and belong to a congregation and go to services on High Holidays. I've never actually been shomer Shabbat, so playing hockey on Friday and Saturday was never an issue."

Selected in the fifth round (161st overall) by Philadelphia in the 2002 NHL Entry Draft, Grumet-Morris had already enjoyed a sterling four-year career at Harvard University, where he set 13 school records and was a nominee for the prestigious Hobey Baker Memorial Award, presented to the best player in U.S. college hockey. His career save percentage of .924 ranks fifth in NCAA history and his 1.63 goals against is 14th.

But the talented son of Jewish parents – Ken, a doctor (internist), and Mary, an attorney, in Chicago – never dressed for the Flyers.

"When I graduated college, the team wanted to go in a different direction in terms of goaltending, so we never ended up signing a deal. That's just part of the game and I understand it," he said.

Being recognized as a superior athlete and student hasn't fazed Grumet-Morris one bit.

"Awards are something you appreciate and value at the time. It's great for the moment, but you move on and don't think about it too much. You look ahead to the next challenge," he said modestly.

He is not the only hockey standout in the family. Aviva, his older sister, starred at Princeton University where she was an All-Eastern College Athletic Conference defender. Four younger siblings are Ariel, who is a soldier in the Israeli army, Amit, Yardena and Zev.

Dov is especially proud of Aviva, with whom he began skating, along with their dad, when they were just 3½ and five years old.

"She was a finalist for the Patty Kazmaier Award which is the Hobey Baker prize for women's hockey," he said proudly. "Aviva was also a phenomenal student."

Dov, who is 6-2 and 198 pounds, lives in Boston in the off-season for training purposes and still returns home to visit his family in Chicago.

In the past he has been involved with Big Brothers/Big Sisters, and tutored grade eight students at a local middle school. "I think it is very important as a professional athlete to be a positive role model and any time you have the opportunity to make a difference, you definitely want to take advantage of that," he said.

In university, he had a 3.2 grade point average, studying government and international relations and Near Eastern languages and civilizations. His 85-page senior thesis was on Jordanian and Israeli foreign policy, specifically covering the 1967 and 1973 Arab-Israeli wars.

The events of 9/11 helped determine his choice of studies.

"My Jewish background obviously led to that [option] when I started college on Sept.12, 2001, the day after Sept. 11. That had a severe effect on everyone throughout the country, but particularly for me. I think that anyone who has an affiliation with the Middle East would hopefully have an interest in what's going on," he said.

Grumet-Morris said he still has NHL aspirations.

"Yes, I'd like to play as long as I enjoy it and as long as I can. I want to get better and progress up the ranks, for sure. I'd love to be part of this team because it's such a winning organization," he said.

My benign pork prejudice

ALMOST FAMOUS
By Jacob Medjuck

I'm from a small town. Jews, though influential, had a limited physical presence in the community. It was the kind of place where old mentalities tended to endure. So as it turns out, I am, admittedly, unsurprisingly, and exceptionally racist. Hard core even (but not, as it turns out, in any way that matters). While I do have a sublime affection for the many nations of planet Earth, pent up inside me is an emotional rage, a clearly bigoted response, that has been passed down from generation to generation.

Simply described, I am unmistakably racist when it comes to bacon.

I hate the smell of it. The idea of pork in general repulses me. The permeating haze of baked ham in the air swells up my throat like an anaphylactic attack.

Strangely, though, I do hold dear the movie Babe, and as a child, I had a not-so-slight addiction to simulated bacon bits (I guess even the Orthodox have to rebel in some lame fashion).

To explain: I keep kosher, but not because I believe it will get me a better parking spot in Heaven. I keep kosher because I was raised knowing no exception. It's a blind adherence to a practice, which, though benign, is still narrow in scope.

I'm essentially a racist regarding pork and all things porcine.

I was reared to hate pig by law, but without motivation – not unlike how I can read Hebrew well, but do not understand what I'm saying. In my limited education, I developed a separation between the appreciation of faith and the practice of Judaism. I very much enjoyed going to synagogue, but only partly because I thought it would save my soul. Every week as a child, I would walk to shul with my father, and the the walk we'd have together became of my most cherished memories of growing up.

I was trained in how to behave, but as a child, spiritual motivations were hard to grasp. Appreciating anything meaningfully is usually something that comes with reflection, with age. So for 30 years, even having been an avowed "anti-sow-ite," I'm now grateful for the broader benefits that keeping kosher has given me: boundaries.

Faith systems can be quite clever. Children need to learn boundaries, while adults apply them in the name of productivity. Growing up while keeping a strict eye on the easily crossed line that is kashrut gave me the confidence and discipline as an adult to concentrate on the activities I've chosen to focus on without succumbing to the myriad of tempting distractions that exist both in work and at play.

In other words, the practice of maintaining arbitrary boundaries gives us mental patterns that benefit us in many areas of our lives.

A belief in Judaism, in the faith itself, has its own profound place. But the practice of Judaism – the lifestyle – confers additional benefits. I appreciate that now, as I'm able to trace my respect for boundaries and discipline back to having survived the early embarrassment and frustration of having to keep kosher in a small town that too often felt like it was saturated with pepperoni.

Like any other diet for the body and mind – be it Atkins, yoga or the Zone – moderately exercising my Judaism has made me a healthy and fit member of society. Other religions can serve their own adherents in a similar manner by training them to follow order – so long as their varied doctrines have an impact equal to that of hating pig, and nothing harsher.

As an independent adult, I continue to choose Judaism because I'm pleased with the parking space it affords me – in life. I suspect that in Heaven, I'll be doing a significant amount of walking – the likely result of a completely different set of ethical debts that I owe society.

Free us from high Pesach prices

By AVRUM ROSENZWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Every year, I'm amazed to learn how much money people spend on Passover food. Many middle class families and those struggling at a subsistence level of existence suffer greatly because they must pay thousands of dollars to purchase basic food staples for the holiday such as meat, vegetables, wine and matzah.

I walked through a kosher food store prior to Pesach and listened to the voices of consumers. I heard grumbling all over as a woman tossed a kosher-for-Passover tablecloth (whatever that is) into her cart, while another grabbed kosher-for-Passover dish soap and still another procured kosher-for-Passover water.

Soon enough, two people became very vocal, and one said: "This is ridiculous. How are we supposed to afford this?" They both walked away from their cart and left the store.

You have to wonder why a chocolate cake mix that costs a couple of dollars before the holiday costs $7 on Pesach, while a cake roll at a local bakery is $13. And why is shmurah matzah $14 a box? After all, it's made from water and wheat flour. How much could the extra supervision required at Pesach cost?

Lubicom Marketing Consulting, a food industry tracker in Brooklyn, N.Y., that publishes the weekly newsletter Kosher Today, reports that a decade ago, there were about 60,000 kosher products available in supermarkets. Today, there are more than 100,000. This is a welcome move forward (although kosher food companies still need to change many of the ingredients in their products, such as comparatively unhealthy cottonseed oil).

But as our choice of foods grows, it's up to kashrut supervisory agencies such as the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) and government ministries such as the Ontario Ministry of Consumer and Business Services to ensure that we're not price-gouged during Passover – or at any other time of the year, for that matter.

Knowing that out of the billions of dollars worth of kosher food bought annually by Jews, more than 40 per cent is purchased during the Passover season, we must question why it is that Passover food is so much more expensive than regular kosher food, regardless of the company that sells it.

(Furthermore, why is it so difficult to find chametz – not-kosher-for-Passover food – a couple of weeks before Pesach? A friend told me that the kosher food he normally buys could barely be found on the shelves prior to Pesach, and he had to buy Passover food before he needed it.)

Years ago, when Steinberg's – a family-run chain of supermarkets – was around, its policy was to keep prices down during Passover so that all Jews could afford to set their tables plentifully. There is nothing wrong with making a profit, but unfortunately, many kosher food companies today seem to be more concerned with creating an affluent lifestyle for their owners than allowing Jews of lesser wealth the opportunity to adhere to the laws and traditions of Pesach without experiencing enormous amounts of economic suffering.

It's estimated that 70 per cent of Jews partake in some form of Passover observance, surpassing observance on even the holiest of Jewish holidays, Yom Kippur. Some of us buy food for Pesach for traditional reasons, such as feeling part of the community and at one with the Exodus. Others have no choice because of their strict adherence to Jewish law.

We are strong in numbers and need to speak up about Passover food prices by challenging our local kashrut authorities and food outlets about profit margins and business principles. Let's remind the food manufacturers, distributors and retailers that we were once slaves in Egypt, but now we are free Jews, and we demand equity through price controls and Jewish decency in the form of affordable Passover food.

Lebanon war probe accuses Olmert of 'severe failure'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The partial report by a government-appointed committee probing the Second Lebanon War accuses Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of "severe failure" to exercise judgment, responsibility and caution from the outset of the war.

The Winograd committee's first report, which was released Monday, says Olmert acted hastily in leading the country to war last July 12, without having a comprehensive plan.

A lawyer for Defence Minister Amir Peretz said Monday that the report also found Israel's leadership had failed in its handling of the conflict.

Committee members presented the report to Olmert and Peretz at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem, an hour before the press conference at the International Convention Center where they released the findings to the public.

The final report, which deals with the decision to go to war on July 12 and the initial days of the conflict, is expected to be highly critical of the conduct of Olmert, Peretz and former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Dan Halutz.

Olmert will be criticized for the decision-making process during the first days of the war, for blindly following the army's plans and for not demanding alternative plans to the ones presented to him. The prime minister will also be attacked for not specifying precise goals for the fighting.

The report will also blame Olmert for not properly evaluating the Israel Defence Forces' preparedness, and for not asking questions concerning this matter before deciding to embark on a war.

The defence minister will be criticized for taking on the defence portfolio in spite of having insufficient experience in this area, and for failing to seek assistance from professionals in the defence establishment. He will also be blamed for not following an orderly process of decision-making.

The most severe barbs will be directed at Halutz. He will be blamed for France bestows highest honour on Canadian veteran

French Ambassador Daniel Jouanneau pins a Legion of Honour medal on Barnett (Barney) Danson. [David Eisen photo]

By PAUL LUNGEN

Barnett (Barney) Danson doesn't see so well anymore.

Sixty-three years ago, while serving in the Canadian Army, he lost the sight in one eye when he was wounded by German shrapnel during a battle in Normandy. In recent years, his one good eye has deteriorated thanks to a case of macular degeneration, a fairly common ailment that afflicts people of his advanced age.

His eyesight is poor – he can't read or watch television any more – but even with perfect vision, he wouldn't have seen his most recent honour coming.

Earlier this spring, not too long before the 62nd anniversary of V-E Day, the government of France honoured the former infantry lieutenant (and later Canadian defence minister) with France's highest honour. At a ceremony at Moss Park Armoury in downtown Toronto, France's ambassador to Canada bestowed upon Danson the Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

Ever the gentleman, Danson, 86, is quick to discount any personal merit in the award and instead credited his comrades-in-arms who made an even greater sacrifice for their country.

"I made a special point of saying I don't know why I got it 60 years later," he said last week. "I accepted on behalf of my regiment. They all deserved it and all the ones who were killed."

The Chevalier (French for knight) honorific was bestowed on Danson at a special parade of the regiment that included current soldiers of the reserve unit and about 100 invitees. It was a stirring ceremony, recalled Danson,

End Embargo: Church

TORONTO — United Church Moderator David Giuliano sent a letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper last week urging him to "immediately resume" financial support to the Palestinian Authority in light of the new Hamas-Fatah unity government there. Rev. Giuliano, who said the international boycott of the PA is "further crippling economic conditions for Palestinians," was in Israel and the Palestinian Territories from March 25 to April 3 as part of a six-person church delegation that met with Christian, Muslim and Jewish groups. He said the PA unity government and the "Saudi initiative" are "extremely positive steps to peace" that should be "fully supported and encouraged by the international community."

Cdns. To Be Honoured

TORONTO — Two Canadians will be honoured as part of graduation ceremonies this spring at the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion. Rabbinical student Janice Elster of Toronto will be ordained June 2 in Cincinnati, while Rabbi John Moscowitz of Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple receives an honorary doctorate May 3 in New York.

Suspects Arrested

PARIS — French police arrested five people suspected of desecrating 180 graves at a cemetery in northern France. Police said a quarter of the graves desecrated in Havre were Jewish. The five were questioned April 22 and were later charged. Early in April, 53 Jewish graves were desecrated and broken at the Lille Jewish cemetery. A 30-year-old man was arrested and admitted to the act, but his reasons remain unclear.

Street Rededication

NEW YORK — A New York street named for an anti-Semite will be rededicated. Corbin Place in Brooklyn had been named for Austin Corbin, a 19th-century developer who was a leader of the American Society for the Suppression of Jews. Corbin also ran the Long Island Rail Road and ejected the Montaukett tribe from the Hamptons in a contested land deal, the New York Times reported. A January column in the New York Daily News attracted the attention of local lawmakers, who set about changing the name. But residents, including many Jews, didn't want to change their addresses, the Times reported. The group then urged that the street be rededicated to Margaret Corbin, a Revolutionary War heroine. City council is expected to approve the move.

Neo-Nazis Rally

KRAKOW — Neo-Nazis protested the March of the Living in Krakow, a Jewish group says. Some 200 people took part in an April 14 march staged by the far-right National Radical Camp, a tiny extremist group. Participants held "Heil Hitler" signs and shouted "This is Poland, not Israel," "Poland is a saintly thing" and "Jews out of Poland," according to the Warsaw-based Foundation for the Preservation of Jewish Heritage in Poland. The rally in Krakow Market Square took place amid foreign tourists, including Israelis who were in Poland for the March of the Living, the foundation said. The foundation complained that police didn't stop the protest, despite the Nazi slogans, which are illegal in Poland. The protesters were outnumbered by 250 anti-racism protesters.

State Buys Bonds

SANTE FE — New Mexico purchased $5 million (US) in Israel Bonds. Gov. Bill Richardson announced the purchase April 23, saying the economies of New Mexico and Israel are similar and that his state is committed to strengthening trade with the Jewish state. "This purchase will help Israel move forward with important economic projects that will better the lives of its citizens," Richardson said.

Journalist Known For Vietnam Reporting

SAN FRANCISCO — Pulitzer Prize-winning journalist and author David Halberstam died April 24 in a car crash. He was 73.

David Halberstam

Halberstam was on his way to an interview with Hall of Fame quarterback Y.A. Tittle for a book on the 1958 NFL championship game when the car in which he was a passenger was struck by another vehicle in Menlo Park, Calif., near San Francisco. He was pronounced dead at the scene.

Halberstam, the son of eastern European Jewish immigrants, attended Harvard before beginning work as a journalist in the U.S. South. His coverage of the civil rights movement earned him a Pulitzer Prize in 1964. Canadian Jews celebrate Israel at 59

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israel and its ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, are both celebrating 59th birthdays this year and the Ottawa community came out in force to join the party.

Yom Ha'atzmaut began with a flag-raising ceremony in front of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre. Before the flags of Canada and Israel were raised by representatives of the Jewish War Veterans Ottawa Post, the audience was treated to a selection of Israeli songs by children from Ganon Preschool and from Hillel Academy.

Students from Yitzhak Rabin High School and members of the Tamir choir also took part in the ceremony. Later in the day, Baker and his wife hosted members of the diplomatic corps, politicians, MPs and representatives of various Jewish organizations at a special Yom Ha'Atzmaut reception.

B.C. Conservative MP James Lunney, chairman of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, recalled being in Toronto to celebrate "Israel at 40," an event he said he enjoyed immensely. "I think landmark occasions [such as this] should be recognized and it is good to celebrate."

Ontario Tory MP Dave Van Kesteren joined the festivities as well. "One of the most significant events in the 20th century is the establishment of the Jewish state. We support that and we want to stand behind the Jewish people in their struggles," he said.

Public Security Minister Stockwell Day added that "it is worth celebrating a vibrant democratic nation that is an example to the whole world."

The party continued in the Civic Centre salons, where more than 1,000 people gathered to eat, drink, sing and dance in honour of Israel's birthday.

Baker's brief welcoming remarks set the tone for the evening. "Let me welcome all the ambassadors who are here, all the RCMP people, the veterans, the Canadians, everybody. This is Israel's 59th birthday. I am also 59, so let's party!"

Ottawans who have served in the Israel Defence Forces were called to the stage and recognized for their contributions to Israel's security.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

7,000 rally for Israel in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day compared Mahmoud Ahmadinejad to Hitler and warned the world not to be indifferent to the Iranian president's plan to annihilate Jews at a massive downtown rally celebrating the 59th anniversary of the State of Israel.

"Just as a leader 60 years ago had a plan to exterminate all Jews, there's a leader today who wants to do the same thing. And just as people then said that leader is crazy or they don't care, the international community is saying the same thing today," Day said at the event, held at midday on Yom Ha'atzmaut.

"Canada cares for Israel and will stand with it," he told the crowd, estimated by organizers at more than 7,000 people, that had gathered in Place du Canada.

"When will there be peace? Next year in Jerusalem, if we stand together," he told the cheering audience.

Day, who sported an Israeli flag in his breast pocket, praised Israel for its strong defence of democracy since its founding. Arabs and Jews can and do run for political office and sit on Israel's Supreme Court, and they have freedom of religion and expression, he said, contrasting the situation in the Jewish state with Pakistan, which was founded as a Muslim state shortly before Israel.

He congratulated Israel for developing what was a barren desert and for absorbing more immigrants per capita than any other country. He also noted that Israel has the most patented inventions and Nobel Prize winners proportionally in the world.

Liberal leader Stéphane Dion said Ahmadinejad is "inciting another Holocaust and the international community must hold him to account.'

The defence of Israel should be the concern of all democracies, Dion said. "Any threat to Israel's right to exist is an attack on the values of every democracy. Israel's struggle for peace and security is our struggle."

He said the Liberals support "the right of Israel, like any other state, to be free of threats or acts of force," and the party backs a two-state solution.

He also denounced anti-Semitism."The struggle of the Jewish people against anti-Semitism concerns all people."

Recalling the 2004 firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs school, which is in Dion's riding, and the attempted firebombing of the YM-YWHA this Passover, he called the incidents "an attack on the values of every Canadian. These children are my children."

The April 24 rally began at Phillips Square. The throng, young and old, estimated by police at about 5,000 people, proceeded down Union Street to Réne Lévesque Boulevard to Place du Canada, where another couple of thousand more joined the program.

It was a dramatic scene as thousands of large blue-and-white flags fluttered in the breeze under skies of a similar azure, in a parade that was several blocks long. The joyous marchers followed a large blue flatbed truck, which carried singers and musicians playing Hebrew songs that resonated through the urban canyon.

The "people's rally," as it was dubbed, was organized by the ad hoc Consortium of Jewish Organizations (COJO) and spearheaded by businessman Amos Sochaczevski and Ariela Cotler, whose husband, Mount Royal Liberal MP Irwin Cotler, acted as master of ceremonies.

COJO spokesperson David Bensoussan said COJO included "just about every Jewish organization in town," although none of their names or logos appeared anywhere, nor did any of their leaders speak, in order to demonstrate that the event came from the "grassroots." Hundreds of volunteers were behind the project, which went off without a hitch.

Attendance might have been even greater, but people had to be turned away from the 20-odd chartered buses that came in from a multitude of points.

Busloads of people also arrived from Kingston, Sherbrooke and Ottawa, mostly with non-Jewish passengers.

The police presence was heavy, and private security guards were also hired. Unlike other years, the rally was not marred by anti-Israel protesters.

Several chassidim, mostly Lubavitchers, including rabbis, participated in the rally.

Israel's consul general in Montreal, Marc Attali, expressed his deep appreciation to the Jewish community and other friends of Israel. "Your support and solidarity is essential to our strength."

The formalities were kept relatively brief, and everyone was encouraged to enjoy the music of the local band Shtreiml and the dancing of a youth group from the northern Israeli town of Ma'alot, where 21 schoolchildren were murdered by Palestinian terrorists on Yom Ha'atzmaut in 1974.

Even Day and Dion were seen doing the horah.

Irwin Cotler described the Jews of Israel as "a prototypical aboriginal" people who are inhabiting the same land, speaking the same language, practising the same religion and using the same name as they did 3,500 years ago.

The program ended with the playing of a recording of Israel's "second anthem," Jerusalem of Gold, which debuted 40 years ago, just before the Six Day War, which no one knew was at hand, said Cotler, who was a student at Hebrew University at the time.

Israeli immigrants changing Winnipeg community

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Titiana Zeliony says she and her husband chose to immigrate here from Israel because they heard from Israeli friends in Toronto that the Winnipeg Jewish community was looking to grow its community.

"We left the former Soviet Union when we were in our 20s, but after a lot of years in Israel, we decided to come here, mostly for security reasons," Zeliony says.

The Zelionys are among a growing number of Israelis who have come in recent years and are slowly changing the face of the community of about 14,000 Jews. Of some 384 new Jewish immigrants to Winnipeg in 2006, 376 were Israelis from the former Soviet Union.

Some of these immigrants, led by a new group called Canada Sheli, took the responsibility this year for the annual Yom Hazikaron service to remember Israel's fallen soldiers. It was held April 22 at the Berney Theatre.

In the past few years, the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative (WZI) has organized and sponsored Yom Hazikaron. But the WZI has become a dormant organization, and Canada Sheli took the initiative to arrange the Yom Hazikaron service.

Canada Sheli was formed about a year ago by Ron East to meet the needs of the increasing number of Israelis here.

"We decided that we wanted to bring Israelis who are Hebrew speakers together. None of us knew each other. That's how it started, and it has taken on a life of its own. Ron does everything on a volunteer basis," says his wife, Shirli East. The organization has no paying membership, no programming budget, no staff and is not a registered charity.

About 125 people, mostly Israelis, attended the Yom Hazikaron service organized by Canada Sheli. Many of them shed tears. The service began with a two-minute siren, as is done in Israel to mark Yom Hazikaron.

Ron and Shirli East

Performer Cindy Bass played guitar and sang Hebrew songs while many in the audience sang along. A large screen broadcast a singer from Israeli television's Channel 1, and there was a video presentation of the faces of the soldiers who lost their lives during last year's war in Lebanon.

A special prayer for the release of three kidnapped Israeli soldiers, Gilad Shalit, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev, was recited by Arieh Lavy, a former Israeli prisoner of war who was captured in the1973 Yom Kippur War by the Egyptian army and tortured there for weeks before being released.

During the memorial service, Canada Sheli also presented an award to Harold Bastable, who was a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force in World War II. Bastable's aircraft was shot down in a raid on Versailles, and in 1944, Bastable was sent to Buchenwald concentration camp.

The Jewish National Fund (JNF) sponsored an energetic post-Yom Ha'atzmaut concert in Winnipeg by Israeli Idol & Friends, a troupe of eight young singers and musicians.

The sold-out concert was held on April 25 at the Berney Theatre, which has a capacity of 200. The only advertisement for the event was an e-mail distribution list sent out by Canada Sheli, an organization catering to Israeli immigrants, and most of the audience members were Hebrew speakers.

Israeli Idol performers range in age from 22 to 25. The singers used to perform in different troupes in the Israeli Defence Forces, and most were released from the army two or three years ago. The troupe reflects the changing face of Israel, with two of the singers, Sasha and Vladi, having immigrated to Israel from Russia when they were children. They performed a couple of numbers in Russian. Noa sang a song in French, "since French is my mother's native tongue," she said.

The group performed a series of old favourites, including Adon Olam, Eretz Zavat Chalav and Yerushalayim Shel Zahav. By the time they did Ani Noladati Lashalom and a Shlomo Artzi song, most audience members were on their feet and stayed that way for the rest of the concert. At the end of the show, some teenagers went onstage to dance with the troupe, as the crowd loudly chanted "od hapa'am" (encore).

Rami Kleinmann, a JNF emissary, danced in the aisle with his son on his shoulders.

"It was the greatest concert. Just amazing. We had so much fun," Avigal Rakir, a 17-year-old new immigrant from Israel, who is originally from Russia, said.

Her 16-year-old friend Dalia, who just moved here from the Israeli town of Dimona, said, "They rock. I loved it."

Rochelle Kleimke and her husband thought the concert was "great," with "lots of energy."

The evening before, on April 24, Israeli Idol performed in Edmonton. Shir Biton, one of the troupe's singers, said that the concert in Edmonton was good, but 'this was a more enthusiastic crowd… I could feel the presence of all the Israelis."

The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and the Rady Jewish Community Centre put on a "Family Fest" for Yom Ha'atzmaut this year.

Usually, these two organizations sponsor a singer or group from Israel and the event draws about 600 people, of all ages. This year, the April 24 event, featuring arts and crafts for children and the local band Three Times Chai, attracted less than half that number.

Magen David flies at Queen's Park

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

To the beat of a drummer-boy and the blast of a shofar, the Israeli flag was raised for the first time at Queen's Park as part of celebrations last week marking the Jewish state's 59th Independence Day.

A crowd of exuberant celebrants, which organizers estimated at around 300 people, packed the front lawn of the Legislature for a noontime flag-raising ceremony jointly presented by Tony Ruprecht, Liberal MPP for Davenport, and Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's outgoing consul general for Ontario and Western Canada.

"We are here hand-in-hand, shoulder-to-shoulder with the people of Israel… to celebrate a very historic occasion, the foundation of the state of Israel," Ruprecht told the assembled, many of whom waved Israeli flags and were dressed in blue and white.

Dignitaries and politicians of various stripes were also present to take in the event and address the crowd.

"On this day of celebration, I cannot help but reflect on a sobering reality," said Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee's board of directors. "Every state in the world celebrates their independence and on those days there's a deliberate effort to focus on pride… but for Israel, the promise of our national anthem is only partially achieved. We are still far from achieving 'Am Chofshi'… a nation free of fear. But we cannot and must not lose our hope. The day will come when we will live without fear. Am Yisrael chai!"

Ronen's speech drew wild applause and responses of "amen" from the crowd.

Also present to pay tribute to Israel were Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, David Engel, chair of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as representatives of different faith communities, including Donna Holbrook, Canadian director of the International Christian Embassy, and Rev. Brian Warren, founder of Canada in Prayer.

Charles McVety, president of Canada Christian College, stressed his community's unwavering support for Israel.

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty quoted former U.S. president, Harry Truman, who called Israel "the embodiment of the ideals of peace and freedom."

In a personal anecdote, McGuinty told of how his family of nine siblings would protect one another from would-be bullies in the schoolyard. He then drew an analogy between that experience and how all of Ontario's faith communities should always rally together to protect each other.

"Whenever [the Jewish] community is attacked, it's time for all of us to stand up, join ranks and say, 'Not in my house,'" McGuinty said.

Brosh, visibly moved by the spirit of the day, then spoke about how historic it was and how proud he was to represent Israel here.

"Canada and Israel really do share many values and we can learn from each other for a better future," he said.

Brosh then wished Israel, "this country that was born in war… many years of peace."

Ruprecht ended the speech portion of the ceremony by looking up at the newly raised Israeli flag and proclaiming, "The Star of David reaches to heaven… it stands for decency, goodness and humanity."

After the singing of Hatikvah, dancers from the WIZO Nachlat Yehuda Youth Village, a school in Rishon Lezion, Israel, performed a series of horahs and traditional songs for the audience.

1,000 celebrate at UBC in Vancouver

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — On a night when many Vancouverites were riveted to a Canucks playoff hockey game, more than 1,000 members of the city's Jewish community flocked to the University of British Columbia's Chan Centre for the Performing Arts to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The evening began on a sombre note with a moment of silence for those killed defending Israel. "This past year, 233 soldiers and civilians were killed," said Geoffrey Druker, chair of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver's Yom Hazikaron committee.

JFGV president Bernard Pinsky noted with pride that the Vancouver Jewish community showed cohesion and unity during last summer's Second Lebanon War.

"We raised $3.7 million last year in our Israel Emergency Campaign," he said. "I'm proud of our community, which has played such a leadership role in Canada's response to Israel."

Vancouver's Jewish community has a partnership with the Galilee panhandle, an area hit with more than 4,000 rockets last summer.

The Chan Centre's 1,365 seats were sold out for the April 23 event, which featured an opening act by Or Chadash's local teenage singers and dancers, accompanied by a band.

The high point of the evening was an appearance by Dor Chadash, a group of seven young Israeli singers who are members of the Israel Defence Forces' song troupe.

The singers performed a variety of songs in Hebrew, English, Russian and French, including songs by popular Israeli artists and much-loved Israeli folk classics such as Ani Noladiti, and Jerusalem Of Gold.

The West must stand fast

As Israelis were celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut last Monday, a barrage of seven Qassam rockets and 35 mortars was directed at civilians in the western Negev by Palestinians in the Gaza Strip. It was later revealed that the barrage was a cover for an attempted kidnapping of Israelis.

The kidnapping was foiled.

The Israel Defence Forces reacted quickly, forcefully and determinedly to turn back the Palestinian plot. But additional kidnapping attempts by the Palestinians are expected following the successful tactical pattern established by Hezbollah over the past few years along Israel's northern border.

There was nothing unusual about the Palestinians' attack against Israel. According to the report of the chief of the IDF, Gabi Ashkenazi, to the cabinet on Sunday, some 250 rockets and mortar shells have been fired at Israel since a truce came into effect in Gaza five months ago.

What was unusual, according to Israeli analysts, was that the governing Palestinian party, Hamas, immediately claimed responsibility for the attack. After the so-called ceasefire went into effect, Hamas refrained from such responsibility claims, preferring to allow rival groups such as Islamic Jihad or even Fatah-affiliated terror groups to bask in the glory of the perpetration of the violence against the hated Jews.

But Hamas seems to need to change its strategy now and seek a higher, fighting profile against the Jewish state. That the attack took place on Yom Ha'atzmaut was no coincidence. What better day than the enemy's national holiday to prove the party's unflagging commitment to fighting the "occupiers"? On the weekend, its political leader, Khaled Meshal, threatened to ignite a third intifadah if the West does not abandon its financial embargo of the Hamas government.

Ashkenazi warned on Sunday that if Palestinian attacks continue, Israel will have no alternative but to "take action," adding that a major ground operation in the Gaza Strip would be necessary to effectively halt the ongoing rocket fire. Mindful of the impending release of the interim findings of the Winograd Committee, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert added that Israel was "not interested in an escalation but [would] by no means refrain from taking the necessary steps to stop those who try to harm Israeli residents in the south."

IDF officials in the south believe that war with Hamas is inevitable because of the organization's bloodthirsty nature, its relentless campaign of violence against the Jewish state, and the military buildup in Gaza.

Hamas' plan is clear. Draw Jewish blood. Grab another soldier or two as hostages. Harass the Jewish state. Convulse Israeli society and confound the political establishment and decision-making apparatus on the eve of the release of the interim report of the Winograd Committee, which is sure to initiate a round of very bitter politics in Knesset. And in the process, of course, win the favour of its mindless followers on the "Arab street."

But it is a foolish plan whose only certain outcome is the spilling of blood on both sides. The West should take note of Meshal's threats and stand fast. It must not surrender the requirement that Hamas recognize Israel, abjure all violence and abide by prior Fatah agreements. It must not yield the possibility of peace to the terrorists' deadly schemes.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak praised Israel's withdrawal from the Sinai, saying it showed Israel's "enthusiasm for peace." Relations between the two countries began to normalize in the wake of the pullout, with daily bus service beginning between Cairo and Tel Aviv. However, Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin vowed that his country would never again exchange land for peace.

Greetings from the prime minister

I am pleased to extend my warmest greetings to everyone marking Yom Ha'atzmaut, the 59th anniversary of Israel's independence.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut, you have an opportunity to reflect upon the history of the struggle that led to the birth of the modern State of Israel on May 14, 1948. It is a time to remember the past while renewing your dedication to the challenges of the future. The Jewish people have always faced the task of building a nation of freedom and peace with perseverance and enduring faith. These qualities have helped Israel grow in strength and stature since its formation. Its very existence is a testament to the spirit of its people and the power of hope.

Canada enjoys close ties with Israel, and I know that our relationship will continue to flourish in the years ahead.

On behalf of the government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a memorable and enjoyable celebration.

Jewish law and conversion

In his column "A closed-door policy" (CJN, April 19), Yoni Goldstein claims that rabbis have a "warped sense of what constitutes a successful marketing strategy." Rabbis are not concerned with marketing; they are obligated to ensure converts have all relevant information, including difficulties and negative aspects of becoming Jewish, in order to make an informed decision before changing their lifestyle.

Rabbi Chelbo's statement in the Talmud comparing converts to leprosy is misinterpreted. An alternative explanation is that sincere converts go through a difficult process giving up their previous culture. Their voluntary acceptance of the Torah makes born Jews look bad (just as leprosy does) because born Jews often take their Judaism for granted. The comparison to leprosy is not negative, but rather a positive reflection of the convert's commitment to Torah.

The demands "requiring attendance at Orthodox synagogue and regular Torah study" are not unreasonable, considering that davening and studying Torah daily are obligatory for all Jews; converts, too, must accept these aspects of Judaism. It is not that "Orthodox leaders are making life difficult," but the Talmud and Shulchan Aruch, which detail requirements for conversion, including "acceptance of the yoke of the mitzvot." Without accepting the observance of mitzvot, conversion is meaningless. Jewish law is demanding, and if people want to become Jewish, they should want to live according to the Torah's demands.

Goldstein claims that "Orthodox demands must be relaxed." What would he propose as relaxed demands? Not requiring converts to observe Shabbat, keep kosher or study Torah? It would be ludicrous to be able to convert to Judaism without being required to observe Halachah and mitzvot. Can one become a Canadian citizen without agreeing to follow Canadian law? Asking Orthodox rabbis to ignore the Talmud and Shulchan Aruch is like asking Supreme Court judges to ignore the Charter of Rights.

Many would argue, contrary to Goldstein's view that Rabbi Chelbo made a mistake and that "today's Orthodox rabbis would be wise to avoid making the same mistake," that today's rabbis are correct in demanding converts sincerely accept the Torah and observance of mitzvot, just as Jewish law requires.

Ethnic cleansing in Darfur

The editorial "Darfur, now" (CJN, April 26) repeats a common error when it says that "more than 250,000 have been killed in Darfur." That is far from true. What is true is that 300,000 or so Darfuris have died – the vast majority of them from hunger and disease directly attributable to the conflict. What we are witnessing in Darfur is not genocide but a most brutal ethnic cleansing: more than 2½ million people have been forced from their homes, and unless the world finally gets its act together, they will never get to go home. What is occurring in Darfur is way beyond the "responsibility to protect" threshold that mandates an aggressive response from the international community. The Jewish community here and abroad is in the forefront in consistently calling for a rescue mission in Darfur, and this is both noted and appreciated within foreign policy circles.

What does it mean to be a Jewish writer?

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

Among those jostling for room in crowded conference halls in downtown Jerusalem were a Serbian novelist, a Russian short story writer, an Israeli poet and a German playwright.

They were among some 100 writers who gathered from across the world to begin a conversation on what it means to be a Jewish writer.

Polish-born writer Eva Hoffman spoke of how Jewish identity intertwines with her writing life.

"I started writing out of the Diaspora [experience] – the great rupture of emigration, the loss of my first language and finding a second language," she said during a panel discussion. "Being inside and outside… this is the classic Jewish and writer's position."

Kissufim, the Jerusalem Conference of Jewish Writers, was the first gathering of its kind in Israel. The four-day event, which ended April 19, featured readings and roundtable discussions on topics ranging from memory and the Holocaust to Nobel winner S.Y. Agnon to the variety of languages in Jewish literature. It was hosted by Beit Morasha of Jerusalem, the Academic Center for Jewish Studies and Leadership.

Central to the gathering's goals was to expose Israeli Jewish writers and Diapora Jewish writers to each other.

At a panel discussion on what defines a Jewish writer, Israeli author Aharon Megged said using Hebrew was central to his writing experience.

"In Hebrew, every letter has meaning," he said. "It is the language of the Bible, a language with layers of history… there is something Jewish deep inside it that you cannot distance yourself from."

Melvin Jules Bukiet, a New York novelist and literary critic, asked if the glorification of Hebrew was not in some ways an attempt to disenfranchise other languages.

Prize-winning writer Maya Kaganskaya, who immigrated to Israel from Kiev and writes exclusively in Russian, said that despite many years in Israel it's still the Russian language and its great authors that she connects most deeply with.

Such debate was among the aims of the conference, organizers said. The idea was not that participants should agree on every topic but rather – because this was a unique encounter between Diaspora and Israeli Jewish writers – they would start debating the same themes and topics.

"There is sometimes a sense that there is a Diaspora-Israel break, that some Israelis have a very strong sense that Israel is the centre of the Jewish world and some people in the Diaspora feel very uncomfortable with that, as if it is some sort of denigration of their own lives," said Michael Kramer, a conference organizer and director of the graduate creative writing program in Bar-Ilan University's English department.

"One of the things we were trying to do was get beyond that sense of a break," Kramer said. "We invited people to speak and read in their own languages, trying to get things translated not just in the linguistic sense, but also the larger sense to get a sense of their world translated."

Jonathan Rosen, a New York author and editor, said the conference provided important insights.

"It's unusual to have a conference like this in Israel, where Jewish identity plays a different role in the cultural imagination than it does in the United States," he told JTA.

Rosen said the conference dealt with those differences but also underscored the emerging understanding among Israeli writers that there's a vibrant Diaspora, just as it allows Diaspora writers a chance to contemplate the vital role Israel plays in Jewish life.

"We all need each other," Rosen said.

Another theme that emerged was a return by some American Jewish writers to the role of religion in their lives. Rosen himself wrote a novel, Joy Comes in the Morning, that features a female rabbi as its main character.

Rosen said that stands in contrast to the older generation of Jewish writers, who wrote about moving away from their religious and immigrant origins to embrace American culture, even viewing Ellis Island as the new Mount Sinai.

Now, he said, there's a "journey back toward Jewish identity and consciousness rather than self-consciousness. It is a journey that is equally heroic, fruitful and exhilarating and is even quintessentially American, because without an individual identity one cannot have an American identity."

Rosen traces the trend to the 1960s, when Jewish studies began to make inroads at American universities, the Six-Day War boosted Jewish self-confidence and genteel American anti-Semitism went into eclipse.

Nessa Rapoport, a Canadian-born memoirist and writer who now lives in New York City and long has dealt with Jewish themes, also sees Jewish writing taking a turn toward its religious roots.

"Once I felt considerable solitude as a writer in my passion for the Jewish literary tradition," she said. "Now I see an increasing number of Jewish American writers as engaged as I am by the eloquence of our shared literary inheritance."

Rapoport said she is sometimes overwhelmed by how much writing there is on Jewish themes.

"I used to be able to read most of what was published in American Jewish writing," she said. "Now, I cannot possibly keep up."

The conference was an opportunity for the writers to network and begin to create a kind of community. Plans are under way for another gathering in two years.

Carolyn Hessel, head of the Jewish Book Council, was among those attending the conference. Considered among the most powerful voices in North American Jewish literature, she has been delighted by the recent surge of high-quality literary fiction produced by the younger generation.

"It's like a Renaissance of Jewish literature," she said.

JTA

KIRYAT ONO, Israel — In their first meeting, Nathan Englander and Etgar Keret playfully joust about influences and literature and how experiencing Jewish and Israeli life informs their writing.

Englander, 36, a former Long Island yeshiva boy turned darling of the American literary scene and his Israeli counterpart, Keret, 38, in turns adored and excoriated for his fantastical and rebellious short stories, came together recently at a conference sponsored by Bar-Ilan University's master's program in creative writing.

Their rapport was instant and full of good humour. When audience members at a public discussion between them requested that they speak up, Englander offered, "I'll project from the diaphragm." Keret quipped, "and I'll try to speak from Nathan's diaphragm."

Englander's 1999 debut collection of short stories, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, became an international bestseller with its tales of the secret desires of Orthodox wig makers, condemned Yiddish writers awaiting death in a Stalinist prison and Jews on a train to a concentration camp who transform into acrobats and tumble their way to safety. His upcoming novel, The Ministry of Special Cases, eight years in the making, is about the Jewish community in Buenos Aires on the eve of Argentina's 1976 military coup.

Nathan Englander

Englander eventually rejected his Orthodox upbringing and immigrated to Israel, where he wrote his first book in a Jerusalem cafe. He sees the book as part of his transition out of the Orthodox world.

"It was clear it was about my leaving the religious community," he said. His upcoming novel, he said, is about "the idea of community as a whole, how it functions and how it corrupts."

He at first did not intend the book to focus on the Jewish community, but Jews "kept creeping in."

Englander said being labelled as a "Jewish writer" after the publication of his first book didn't bother him.

"It's not a tag. There is nothing for me to shake off," he told JTA in an interview.

Unlike Englander's rich, literary prose, Etgar's stories have a casual, zany tone. Modern Israel is his usual backdrop, populated with slackers, soldiers and factory workers. His work has been praised for tapping into the Zeitgeist of Israeli youth with witty, but often less than pretty, portraits of alienation and fear.

Etgar Keret

Keret's most recent collection, The Nimrod Flip-Out, published last month in the United States, was written during the second intifadah and was influenced, he said, by the daily toll of violence.

In one story, a pathologist examines the body of a woman killed in a suicide bombing only to discover tumors had taken over most of her body and that she would have died within weeks. The pathologist can't decide whether or not to tell the woman's bereaved husband.

Breaking ranks with Israel's old guard of writers, who try to infuse their work with ideological themes, Keret's cheeky stories seem to mock the country's literary conventions and convictions. Keret was born in Israel, but feels himself an outsider.

By contrast, Englander, at odds with his Orthodox upbringing in America, for a time chose Israel as his home.

It was in Israel that he met a group of young Argentine immigrants who would become close friends and whose stories would help inspire the idea for his novel. It was also in Israel that he began to feel how politics imprints itself onto life.

"Living in Israel made me understand when politics is in your front yard," he said. "Living in Israel, obviously I learned a lot. I became shaped. I became a different person from living in the centre of Jerusalem."

Keret, although often hailed as the voice of young Israelis, feels himself more a Diaspora Jew than a native son.

"I feel very connected to the Diaspora," he told JTA. "My stories seem to me to have more in common with Kafka and Isaac Bashevis Singer than A.B. Yehoshua."

He added: "I was born here but I am the son of immigrants and I feel part of this but also feel on the outside. I think that is something very Jewish but something Israelis have lost."

As the son of Holocaust survivors, Keret finds a sense of eerie triumph that his books sell best abroad in Germany and Poland.

His mother, who grew up in Poland and was the only member of her immediate family to survive the war, was especially moved after she read his work translated into Polish. She told him he wrote like a Polish exile.

When she visited him in Germany where he was a visiting instructor at a Berlin university a few years ago, she told him a story that had haunted her. During her father's last days alive in the Warsaw Ghetto, he told her she would survive and one day avenge the family.

"They want to erase our name. But you will stay alive and everyone will know our name," he said, recounting the words his grandfather told his mother so many years ago.

She told him she had lived to see her father's vision – the sight of German bookshops filled with his books and the long lines of people waiting to hear him speak.

"I was very glad to hear that," Keret said. "To see that there are some circles that do connect."

Englander's visit to Israel to speak at the conference marked his first time in the country since he left five years ago.

He said it was not the bombings and tension that had kept him away but his complete focus on writing.

As difficult and as messy as it was to leave, Englander said he knew he would thrive once he returned to New York. When he Arrived for this visit, the clerk stamping his passport at Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport asked why he had been away for so long.

He answered, "I became Israeli. So I left for New York."

Opinions

Our communities need energizing

Inertia is an all too common phenomenon in many Jewish organizations. There is usually a raft of tangled and defensive explanations about why it occurs and elaborate rationalizations for why so little is done to prevent it from happening. Any attempt to even begin to identify the key reasons for a loss of focus, vision, relevance or productivity in an agency, or in the broader community, is likely to meet with indifference, suspicion or resistance.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Only rarely is there someone who is prepared to rock the boat, to shine a mirror on aspects of community function that need to be revisited and fixed, and to address some of the essential elements of our collective mission that require urgent attention if we are to survive the existential threats that face us in the years ahead.

Businessman and community leader Scott Shay is one such person. Although his book Getting our Groove Back: How to Energize American Jewry (Devora Publishing, 2007) deals primarily with the serious predicaments that our neighbours to the south are having to deal with, his words have similar resonance for other Diaspora communities as well.

In his first few chapters, Shay provides analyses that illustrate the alarming decline in the numbers of American Jews. With this as his major focus, he uses most of the rest of the book to expand on his ideas for reversing the trend and revitalizing his community. A commitment to Jewish education, a reaffirmation of Jewish identity at every level, and a sustained effort to get all young American Jews to Israel according to a plan that goes beyond birthright israel are among the topics that he explores.

But aside from what seems intuitively self evident, though worthy nonetheless of re-emphasis, Shay also launches fearlessly into topics that are as controversial as they are challenging. In his chapter on intermarriage, he exhorts the Reform movement to reconsider its policy on patrilineal descent, while elsewhere in the book he refers to the "tyranny of the status quo" in certain Jewish organizations and calls for "the creative destruction and/or reorganization of these agencies in order to free resources for more pressing needs."

He also expresses his concern over the imbalance between Jewish charitable giving to Jewish causes and Jewish giving to non-Jewish causes. He notes, for example, that between 1995 and 2000, when charitable donations in the United States totalled $29.3 billion (US), 188 out of the 865 gifts that exceeded $10 million were made by Jews. However, only 18 of these went to Jewish organizations.

In his articulation of both the problems facing American Jewry today and his approaches to solving them, Shay pulls no punches. Getting our Groove Back is yet another wake-up call for anyone who values the concept of Jewish continuity.

On Yom Ha'atzmaut

The following is excerpted from a statement made to the UN Security Council on April 25 by Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Yesterday, we in Israel celebrated our Independence Day, marking Israel's 59th year of statehood. It is, of course, a time of great joy and festivity.

Dan Gillerman in New York

We celebrate the greatest miracle to happen to our people in contemporary history – the gift of our own country, to be a free people in our homeland. We celebrate the vibrancy and vigour of the State of Israel. We celebrate its remarkable renaissance and growth, especially for such a small country – and after only 59 years of existence. And we celebrate the beauty and openness of Israeli democracy, the bountiful and rich contributions of Israelis to international arts and culture, science and medicine, and the resilience of a people who fervently dream of peace, each and every day.

And yet the reality of Israeli history means that Independence Day is also a solemn time, when we remember the difficulties of the past. We honour the valiant courage of our soldiers who were killed while defending the people of Israel, and the great tragedy that befell the victims of terror. We mourn them, and we miss them…

But it is not only the reality of history that lingers in our minds. It is also the reality of the present day and the challenges ahead.

That harrowing reality, Mr. President, was demonstrated yesterday when Hamas, by its own account, launched more than 28 Qassam rockets and 61 mortar shells at Israel… These attacks, which came as Israelis woke up to celebrate Independence Day, were nothing short of an act of extreme provocation.

Later in the day, we learned that Hamas' fierce rocket fire was just a front, to divert attention away from its truly evil plans, to kidnap an Israeli soldier. Thankfully, the IDF thwarted the kidnapping.

Yesterday Hamas declared the ceasefire that had been in place in the Gaza Strip null and void. Since the ceasefire began at the end of November 2006, Israel has continually exhibited restraint to the more than 200 rockets fired at it by Palestinian terrorists. Israel always reserves the right to defend itself and its people, as enumerated in Article 51 of the United Nations Charter, and will do so if the attacks do not stop.

I strongly advise the Palestinians, and the world, not to mistake this restraint for acquiescence or take it for granted… We will do all that is necessary to put an end to this violence.

If there are still any skeptics out there, yesterday, the Hamas-led Palestinian government showed its true colours. Israel needs no further evidence to know that Hamas's ways are not the ways of peace. Hamas has shown it will not stop its campaign of terror until its unholy ambitions of destroying Israel are fulfilled.

Mr. President, the international community, represented by the Quartet [the United Nations, United States, European Union and Russia] has made the obligations of the Palestinian government very clear – to recognize Israel, renounce violence and terror, and abide by previous agreements. Hamas also still holds the Israeli soldier Gilad Shalit, kidnapped by its terrorists last June. These basic conditions are principles of peace. As the Palestinian government flaunts these conditions and sees terror as a legitimate goal, the international community should continue its policy toward that government.

Nothing – no initiatives, summits, or declarations – can take the place of an end to Palestinian terror. We will continue to engage with President [Mahmoud Abbas], as Prime Minister [Ehud] Olmert is continuously doing by holding their bi-weekly meetings. But we will fight Hamas as if there is no Abbas…

As Israel looks forward to a prosperous and peaceful coming year, our 60th year of independence, we know there is no shortage of challenges ahead of us. But we are prepared to meet each and every one of them, no matter what it takes.

Israel yearns to live in peace with all her neighbours… In the meanwhile, Israel will continue to defend itself, while praying for peace, taking strength in one another and putting trust in our faith and traditions, in our social fabric and human values, and in our people, wherever they may be.

Israel's accomplishments and challenges

Most journalists and pundits who talk and write so much about Israel miss the main point. While Theodor Herzl and his colleagues sought political sovereignty to ensure physical survival, the Zionist movement also saw this in the context of a Jewish renaissance. The constant wars, both military and political, in which Israel has been embroiled and which get most of the attention, are a tragic by-product of Arab rejectionism. But Jews did not and still do not come to Israel in order to fight these external battles – we came to reclaim, restore and rebuild our culture.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

From this perspective, as Israel enters its 60th year, we can be proud of our accomplishments, and also prepare to meet the considerable challenges that go beyond Iran and Palestinian terror.

First, the good news. The renaissance and revival of 4,000 years of Jewish cultural life has succeeded far beyond what was considered realistic when Ben-Gurion proclaimed Israeli independence in May 1948. Two thousand years after the Exile, Hebrew is a living language again, and with this achievement, the original texts – from the Bible to the Talmud to the rabbinical commentaries – are accessible to millions of Jews, as well as non-Jews.

This has spawned an amazing growth in creativity. Journals such as Azure and newspapers such as Makor Rishon (meaning "first source"), both founded a few years ago and dedicated to promoting this renaissance, have growing lists of contributors and expanding readerships to match. (There is no English edition of Makor Rishon, making access to its articles difficult, and as a result, few journalists outside of Israel are aware of its existence.)

This cultural resurgence is also no longer restricted to a narrow group of religious Israelis, and the cultural barriers are slowly being overcome. The attempt to replace the Jewish tradition with a new "Israeli man" has given way to an effort to merge the two approaches. With the exception of a few diehards, the militant anti-religious ideology has been replaced by a dialogue. Many non-religious intellectuals, artists, and leaders have a "Jewish bookshelf" and use these texts in their writings and performances. Their children attend "secular yeshivas" and similar schools, giving them the background necessary for this dialogue. The Jewish cultural renaissance taking place in Israel has also spread to the Diaspora, and Israel is now the senior partner in this relationship.

At the same time, these achievements do not offset or justify Israel's failures – including widespread leadership failure (secular and religious) and an unacceptable level of poverty and lack of economic opportunity. While the quality of education for the richer sectors is growing, schools in poor neighbourhoods and peripheral towns are neglected and underfunded. Social services are highly inadequate, particularly for olim from non-western countries.

And the antiquated political system that encourages corruption has alienated many younger Israelis. Good people do not seek leadership positions, and the results are very costly. To meet this challenge, the new generation must find a way to take part in the process without becoming infected by the corruption.

The corruption among Israeli leaders reflects the "get rich quick" and materialistic mentality that replaced the pioneering spirit which prevailed during the first decades of Israel's existence. This has blinded many Israelis to the growing level of poverty that is entirely foreign to Jewish tradition. Past promises to offset this situation have not been fulfilled, and while Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has pledged to cut poverty by 25 percent, implementation will require sustained effort and moral leadership.

Israel's future success depends on the readiness to meet these challenges, which exist in the shadow of the ongoing threats of war and terror. We can't afford to address only one dimension – success requires directing the same investments internally as are applied to fighting our external enemies.

The framework, language of demonization ("repatriation" and "ethnic cleansing") and carefully selected "experts" reflect the inherent bias of the editor chosen by CIDA. The Kirshner File

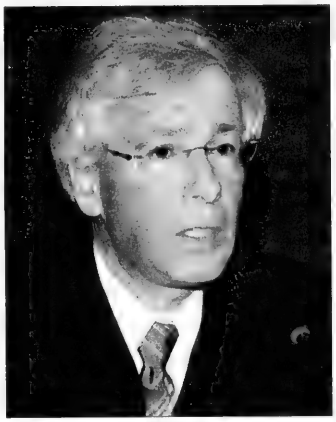
Taliban insurgency in Afghanistan rages on

Eight more Canadian troops were killed in Afghanistan last month, raising Canada's war dead to 53 in almost six years of combat. Sparking an outpouring of hand-wringing and a tsunami of grief, their deaths prompted a new outburst of political recriminations, with Liberal party leader Stéphane Dion warning that Canada faces a quagmire in Afghanistan – a Muslim nation bogged down in an increasingly bloody civil war – and declaring that Canada's role there should end when its current commitment expires in February 2009.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Dion's blistering critique, which coincided with an upsurge of fighting in that strife-torn country, was hardly unusual. Although Canada's present contingent of 2,500 troops was dispatched to Afghanistan in 2001, when the Liberals were in power, Canadian politicians have had qualms about the mission ever since. Jack Layton, the NDP leader, has repeatedly called for a withdrawal, while Bloc Québécois leader Gilles Duceppe has complained that Canada's efforts have become too focused on hunting down terrorists rather than on rebuilding that ravaged, somewhat dysfunctional country.



Stéphane Dion

Stephen Harper, the Conservative prime minister who extended Canada's mission by two years, holds a completely diametrical view. He believes that Canada has an obligation to President Hamid Karzai's besieged pro-western government in Kabul and to the United Nations-backed coalition of 37 countries battling the Taliban and its Al Qaeda ally.

A similar debate rages in the United States, which bears the main burden of protecting and nurturing Karzai's government and has funnelled $14 billion (US) worth of aid since 2001. Congressional critics of the war in Iraq have charged that it has siphoned away critical resources from what they describe as "the forgotten war" in Afghanistan.

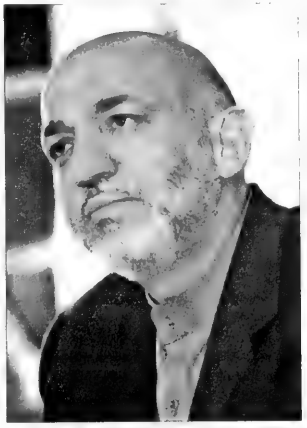
Yet, what seems clear is that international troops, led by the United States, Britain, Canada, Germany, Italy, Holland and Spain, will be in Afghanistan for some time to come in the battle against Islamic radicalism. Addressing this issue recently, Canadian Defence Minister Gordon O'Connor said Canada would spend $650 million to acquire 100 second-hand tanks from Holland and lease 20 more from Germany to deal with 10 to 15 years of further conflict in Afghanistan, which has been in a virtually perpetual state of turmoil since its invasion by the Soviet Red Army in 1979.

An impoverished, land-locked nation coveted by European colonial powers in the 19th and 20th centuries, Afghanistan was thrown into further chaos when the Soviet Union, in a last gasp of imperialism, invaded the country to prop up an unpopular Communist government. The United States, aligned with Saudi Arabia and Pakistan, covertly supported a motley but highly motivated collection of Afghan fighters, the mujahideen, who fiercely resisted the Soviets and their local allies. Exhausted by the war, Moscow withdrew in 1989, having lost 15,000 soldiers. For the next seven years, Afghanistan was awash in violence as warlords battled for dominance.

The Taliban, a puritanical movement extolling the virtues of Islamic fundamentalism, seized power in 1996 and proceeded to transform Afghanistan into a backward bastion of austere, reactionary Islam in which women and minorities were oppressed.

Governed by Mullah Mohammed Omar, the Taliban regime invited Osama bin Laden, the Saudi leader of Al Qaeda, and Ayman al-Zawahiri, his Egyptian deputy, to establish their headquarters and training camps on Afghan soil.

Al Qaeda, a Sunni-based organization dedicated to eliminating Western influence in the Middle East, dethroning secular Arab leaders and destroying Israel, carried out its first major terrorist strikes against the United States with attacks on two of its embassies in Africa in 1998 and on the USS Cole in Yemen in 2000. On Sept. 11, 2001, Al Qaeda struck once again when 19 terrorists, the vast majority of whom were Saudis, hijacked commercial airliners, crashing them into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.



Hamid Karzai

Faced by the most serious peacetime assault on the United States since Pearl Harbor, with a loss of life approaching 3,000, President George W. Bush geared up for what would be the defining mission of his administration, the war against terrorism. In short order, the United States invaded Afghanistan, while the United Nations sent a peacekeeping force. Washington's strategy was to unseat the Taliban, destroy Al Qaeda's base and reconstruct the country. The Taliban was ousted, but six years on, bin Laden and Zawahiri remain at large, presumably somewhere in Pakistan's rugged tribal areas, and a new generation of Al Qaeda leaders has emerged.

Meanwhile, as the Karzai government struggles to assert its authority beyond Kabul and rebuild the country's infrastructure, the Taliban and Al Qaeda, following a period of retrenchment, have stepped up the pace of guerrilla attacks and suicide bombings against the reconstituted Afghan army and foreign peacekeepers (35,000 troops from 26 NATO nations and 11 other allies).

Last January, after the Taliban's leader in hiding threatened to continue the war until foreign troops leave Afghanistan, the Taliban warned that 2007 would be the bloodiest year yet of the insurgency.

It has not been an idle threat. The Taliban, having begun its much anticipated spring offensive, has already sprung two jolting surprises – capturing two remote districts and sending a suicide bomber to an American air base that U.S. Vice President Dick Cheney happened to be visiting.

In response, NATO has launched a big offensive aimed at clearing out the rebels from the largely lawless southern provinces of Kandahar and Helmand, where much of the fighting has taken place of late. In concert with these operations, the United States has applied pressure on Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf to do more to eradicate the network of Taliban and Al Qaeda bases in Pakistan and demanded that certain NATO allies fulfil all their manpower commitments.

It remains to be seen whether NATO's latest campaign will succeed, since the Taliban and Al Qaeda are formidable adversaries. Emulating the insurgents of Iraq, they masterminded some 350 bombings in 2006, killing more than 600 civilians.

To a significant degree, the Taliban finances its operations through the cultivation of opium, of which Afghanistan supplies 90 per cent of the world's supply. There is a direct connection between the insurgency and the illegal cultivation of poppies, from which raw and unprocessed opium is extracted. By encouraging Afghan farmers to cultivate a poppy crop, which is far more lucrative than any other, the Taliban forces Karzai to react and thus turns them against his government.

It is a clever tactic and may be working, much to Karzai's disadvantage.

School funding motion defeated

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Jewish, Muslim and Sikh advocates for faith-based school funding in Ontario responded in frustration and unity last week to help defeat a motion in the legislature that sought to buttress the Liberal government's policy of not funding private schools.

Peter Fonseca, Liberal MPP for Mississauga East, introduced a private member's motion in the house in early April that said "the Legislative Assembly of Ontario affirms that its commitment to students in the public education system is so strong that it opposes any attempt to take public money and hand it over to private schools."

In his opening remarks during debate on the matter last week, Fonseca said he filed the motion out of fear that "if we do not continue along the path that we have over the last 3½ years… we may find ourselves where we were prior to coming to government, where we were closing schools, where we were underfunding our schools, where we had strife and instability in our public school system."

The motion was ultimately defeated when the speaker called for a voice vote in the legislature, and those against it shouted it down.

Conservative MPPs Frank Klees, who has long urged that funding be extended to faith-based schools, and Tim Hudak, led the opposition to the motion.

Stuart Lewis, executive director of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), which represents scores of Ontario schools, and Steven Shulman, Ontario regional director of Canadian Jewish Congress, were among a delegation that attended the April 26 debate.

"We were shocked at Mr. Fonseca's words," Lewis said. "So we made phone calls, got support and the motion was defeated."

Lewis said the delegation was warned by Klees and Hudak that the motion would likely pass, given the Liberal majority in the legislature.

"So we were shocked and pleased when it was voted down," Lewis said.

Klees called Fonseca's resolution, "one of the most offensive pieces of legislation ever presented to this house."

Speaking in the legislature, Fonseca said he realized there were objections from faith-based schools to the government's stance on funding private schools, but he reminded the house that public funding for Catholic schools in Ontario is "embedded" in Canadian history.

"The essence of our public school system is to bring people together," Fonseca told The CJN. "Publicly funded schools should not divide one group from another… [they] should act to bring Ontarians together. That's why our government opposes sending government money to private schools."

The province's faith communities have long fought the Ontario government over this issue, which they say is inherently unfair and illegal.

In a follow-up e-mail sent to The CJN, Lewis wrote, "The funding system for families of faith in Ontario that the government supports is one where Catholics go for free and other religious minorities pay full fare – at back-breaking cost to hard-working, Sikh, Muslim, Jewish, and Christian parents."

Ira Walfish, chair of the Multifaith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools, said in an April 25 press release that Fonseca's stance was "extremely unfair and misleading" and that "excluding all funding for 'private' schools means that non-Catholic faith-based schools will continue to be treated as second-class citizens."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Making the most of our lives

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

"It's all in the name." Companies spend millions on research, not just on product development, but in the search for appropriate names for their products. Certain names project images that can make or break a product in the marketplace. In other words, a name or phrase is much more than a bunch of letters. It's an image. It's a statement.

In Judaism, the various forms of the names of God denote the Almighty in different modes with humankind. Likewise, each holiday has a variety of names that express the various messages and histories of each of these occasions. We know that the choice of a name for a newborn is a complex experience, and a change of name signals a serious situation or circumstance.

This is especially true in the Torah, where words and phrases have a multitude of meanings, ranging from the plain translation (pshat) to a multitude of interpretations (drash). Even the names of the portions are more than mere titles. Often their proximity and sequencing bring another message to light above and beyond the content of each portion. For instance, in the past two weeks we have read three portions. Each portion stands by itself, containing profound content such as the laws of Yom Kippur, sexuality, the festivals, a complex moral and ethical code, and so much more. There is enough there to keep us occupied for months.

Going beyond the straightforward text, we can discover an amazing truism when we link the three portions together. Acharai Mot- Kedoshim-Emor, which, when translated as if it were a phrase, means "after the death of the righteous, talk." It's very cryptic and seemingly contradictory, because dead people don't talk.

But that's not necessarily so. All too often, it is only Acharai Mot, after the death of a person or at the end of a relationship, that we realize Kedoshim, their virtues and special qualities that we failed to truly appreciate. At that point, Emor – we want to say what we "could have" or "should have" but did not. We think about it, we shed some tears, we regret, but, alas, it's too late. Time and circumstance have taken away any opportunity to say and do the things that could have been and should have been.

Thoughts and feelings normally reserved for eulogies and epitaphs should be shared and spoken during one's lifetime, when sentiments can be acknowledged and appreciated. It is most appropriate that we recite the Aishet Chayil, lauding the virtues of our spouse, every Friday night in the presence of family and friends, rather than at the person's funeral.

Perhaps this is why these Torah portions are followed first this coming week by Lag b'Omer, a joyous day ending 33 days of semi-mourning that recall the deaths among the 24,000 students of Rabbi Akiva, each steeped in Torah study but remiss in personal relationships. The following week, we have Mother's Day and soon after Father's Day, giving us quite a lineup. Each represents ongoing real-life challenges that hopefully, will be answered through our understanding of these three Torah titles.

The purpose of the sequence of these portions is to kick-start us into making as many days as possible to be days of meaningful relationships and experiences with parents, children, siblings and friends while they are alive and well. The ability to make most of the days of my life into genuine people days becomes the real barometer of the quality and purpose of my life.

While respecting and honouring others is important, it's only half the equation. The more neglected piece is the challenge to be the mother, father, spouse, child or friend that I know I ought to be or could be – to conduct myself in a way that I bring honour to the various roles I fulfil, and not just by playing the roles, but by being them with sincerity and integrity.

No, it's not always convenient or even comfortable, but it is who I am. When I honour that essence within myself, I can begin to appreciate the same qualities in others. If I can accomplish that in the course of a lifetime, then the Kedoshim, the purpose of my being, will itself be Emor – it will speak for itself. The Lag b'Omer feeling of human worthiness will prevail.

What's in a name? Everything – one's entire lifetime.

Sinai's permanence isn't about ratings

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

One of the central questions in the history of religion is what happened at Sinai. How can Mosaic prophecy be understood? As Shavuot nears, it's worth taking a moment to briefly sketch Maimonides' struggle with this issue.

For Maimonides, rationality is the "pure understanding" of reality, whereas the imagination poetically interprets things. The artist will see in terms of image or metaphor, but the philosopher will try and see in the cold sober light of objective truth, if we can speak of such matters.

On Sinai, Moshe has a vision of God, which enters into him through his brain not as an image or a metaphor, not as a piece of language. This is virtually impossible for us to conceptualize, because we understand ideas through words and images. Moshe must communicate this pure vision of God to the Jewish nation so that they can be guided by it.

Some people are very comfortable with cold statistical fact, but have little flair for the creative translation of reality. They perhaps lack vision, a larger scope. Other people are a bit more ethereal, dreamy, intuitive, but have little use for definition of terms, for precise scientific fact.

But the prophet is able to combine those two ways of being or faculties and translate God's word into action. Moshe must convert his Platonic idea of God into terms that the Jewish nation can use to live a moral life of service of God.

It's this translation of spiritual ecstasy into rules for living that distinguishes the Sinai moment. Some people think of a prophet as an isolated holy man or guru up on a mountain. But the Jewish conception of prophecy is that it largely serves a political function. Its intent is to translate moral and ethical truths to a large number of people.

Moshe was foremost a legislator who was able to use his powers to bring forth a coherent body of law around which communities could organize and chart out a new way of life. The pure intellect of a prophet is irrelevant if it's not connected to what function this prophecy serves for the community at large. Moshe comes with the mission of spreading the Law, not to indulge in private intellectual speculation.

Prophecy that's obviously self-serving – for instance, where someone said that God told me I have to receive $8 million tomorrow – is already illegitimate in the Jewish view. But even less self-serving enterprises, if they deny the truth of Sinai or the permanence of Torah, are unequivocally rejected in Jewish tradition.

No one has the right to do that, even if they do have a whole bag of magic tricks up their sleeve. The Jewish problem with Jesus, therefore, would have less to do with whether or not he was capable of walking on water and more to do with the Christian negation of 613 mitzvot as a binding proposition.

Sinai is not network TV. It can't be cancelled, rescheduled, reworked or laugh tracked, and its permanence does not depend on ratings. Moderns like to stress the appeal of the now, and on the deepest level, Sinai is always about today.

Einstein: His Life and Universe by Walter Isaacson, Simon & Schuster.

Einstein's perplexing religious ideas

Do we need another book about Albert Einstein? Perhaps we do. This latest biography, more than most, delves into Einstein's perplexing religious ideas and theology.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Was he religious? Certainly not in a traditional or conventional sense. He asserted, "I believe in Spinoza's god who reveals himself in the orderly harmony of what exists – not in a god who concerns himself with fates and actions of human beings." He rejected both immortality and the concept of free will. He maintained, "I cannot accept a deity who could meddle at whim with the events of the creation."

But he insisted that he was not an atheist: "What separates me from most so-called atheists is a feeling of utter humility toward the unattainable secrets of the harmony of the cosmos."

Out of his ambiguous and seemingly contradictory contentions, there emerges a kind of benign deism. This is the belief that God is the creator of the universe who, after setting it into motion, abandoned it, and exerts no influence on human behaviour or natural phenomena.

His astonishing scientific achievements in 1905, which included his special theory of relativity, led in 1921 to his Nobel Prize for physics.

People admired Einstein for his becoming modesty, humour, pacifism and unflinching defence of human rights. Offered the presidency of Israel in 1952, he refused on grounds of age and lack of aptitude.

Asked repeatedly to explain his theory of relativity, he answered in this manner: "When a man sits with a pretty girl for an hour, it seems like a minute. But let him sit on a hot stove for a minute, it seems like an hour – that's relativity."

Einstein's unkempt appearance was typical of his desire to ignore superficiality and go directly to the heart of things. Once when he received a sizable consulting fee, he used the cheque for a bookmark – and then lost the book.

Speaking at the Sorbonne during the 1930s, he said, "If my relativity theory is verified, Germany will proclaim me a German and France will call me a citizen of the world. But if my theory is proved false, France will emphasize that I am German and Germany will declare that I am a Jew."

Judaism, he declared, led him to the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake, the almost fanatical love of justice and the desire for personal independence. "These are the features of Judaism which make me thank my stars that I belong to it."

Playfully, he suggested that the hardest thing in the world to understand is the income tax. And more seriously, he concluded that "nationalism is an infantile sickness; it is the measles of the human race."

Finally, there are these ringing words for us and for those who will come after us: "Strange is our situation here upon earth. Each of us comes for a short visit not knowing why, yet sometimes seeming to divine a purpose. From the standpoint of daily life, however, there is one thing we do know: that man is here for the sake of other men… many times a day I realize how much my own outer and inner life is based upon the labours of my fellow man, both living and dead, and how I must exert myself in order to give in return as much as I have received and am still receiving."

Einstein is the acknowledged greatest scientist of the 20th century and one of the supreme intellects of all time. The inscription on Sir Isaac Newton's tomb might be applied even more appropriately to him: "Mortals rejoice that there has existed such and so great an ornament of the human race."

Israeli controversy at Eurovision

Since it began in 1956, the Eurovision Song Contest has been responsible for bringing quite a few tunes to the world stage. A few have been memorable, others forgettable, and many, kitschy. But almost all have been non-controversial. That wasn't the case this year with the official entry from Israel. Today, a look at Eurovision and Israel's Push the Button (Kaftor Adom).

On May 10, the Israeli group Teapacks will be on stage in Helsinki at the Eurovision semi-final, hoping to impress international viewers and do well enough to make it to the Saturday night finals. But their appearance at the semifinal wasn't a sure thing. Sung in Hebrew, English and French, and mixing folk, rap, rock and chutzpah, Teapacks' Push the Button is a thinly veiled allusion to Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's not so thinly veiled threats against the Jewish state: "The world is full of terror/ If someone makes an error/ He's gonna blow us up to biddy biddy kingdom come/ There are some crazy rulers they hide and try to fool us/ With demonic, technologic willingness to harm/ They're gonna push the button, push the button/ Push the bu-, push the bu-, push the bu-, push the button." [www.diggiloo.net/?2007il]

Those lyrics didn't please the European Broadcasting Union, which opposes entries that carry "political propaganda." Teapacks countered that their song "does not refer to countries, continents, names of people and may, just like any other text, be subjectively interpreted in many different ways and angles." [http://tinyurl.com/3cpflw] Eurovision organizers deliberated whether to allow Push the Button at the competition. In the end, the song survived the scrutiny and was pronounced "generally appropriate." [http://tinyurl.com/23gyek]

The group behind the song, Teapacks (pronounced "Teep-ex"), was formed in 1998 by lead singer Kobi Oz, bassist Gal Pereman and several other musicians from the southern Israeli town of Sderot. Since then, the band has released seven albums and has sold more than 300,000 copies. [www.teapacks.com/] Ironically, the Eurovision controversy has meant a comeback for the band. Pereman even thanked the Finnish official who sparked the controversy. "The flowers are on the way," Pereman promised. [http://tinyurl.com/2ljseo]

Speaking of political controversy, in 2000, the Israeli pop group PingPong lost its backing from the Israeli Broadcasting Authority when it waved Syrian flags during a rehearsal of the song Sameyakh in Jerusalem. That gesture was apparently the band's bid to promote peace between the countries. PingPong had to pay its own way to compete in Stockholm, where it closed its act by waving Syrian and Israeli flags before millions of viewers. PingPong placed 22nd. [http://tinyurl.com/2uxd2t].

Actually, Israel has done quite admirably at Eurovision with three wins since it began competing in 1973. [http://eurovil.iba.org.il/] You can watch these memorable performances online:

- A-Ba-Ni-Bi, first place, 1978, Izhar Cohen & Alphabeta [http://tinyurl.com/2lwl7y]
- Hallelujah, first place, 1979, Gali Atari & Milk and Honey [http://tinyurl.com/39olah]
- Hora, second place, 1982, Avi Toledano [http://tinyurl.com/32ooxv]
- Chai, second place, 1983. Ofra Haza [http://tinyurl.com/36ps5h]
- Diva, first place, 1998, Dana International [http://tinyurl.com/2srphh]
- Hasheket Shenish'ar, fourth place, 2005, Shiri Maimon [http://tinyurl.com/2pbt6b]

You can watch all the Israeli entries as well as some entries from other countries. Go to this link [http://tinyurl.com/2mh6en], hover your mouse over "media clips" and then click on "EurovIL". (You can even listen to winners Abba for Waterloo, Sweden 1974, and Céline Dion for Ne partez pas sans moi, Switzerland 1988.)

As for Teapacks, their fate is in the hands of viewers from three dozen countries who will be tuning on May 10 and voting for entries to go to the Saturday night finals. For his part, Oz is clearly thankful that he and his group are getting the chance to appear. "We just want to go to Finland because of the duty free," he said. [http://tinyurl.com/2qpcpq]

WWII monument to be unveiled at Harbord CI

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A monument titled We Remember, dedicated to the memory of students and staff of Harbord Collegiate Institute who perished in World War II, is to be unveiled at the school.

The ceremony takes place at 10:30 a.m. on May 8, the 61st anniversary of VE-Day, at the southeast side of the building.

The 18-foot monument, created by Harbord graduate Morton Katz, is in the form of an H, the school's emblem. Of the 500 students and staff who enlisted and served in the war, more than 50 died in active duty. Their names will be inscribed on the stainless steel sculpture.

Katz, a graduate of Harbord, is an internationally renowned architect and sculptor. He taught at the University of Toronto School of Architecture and served for many years as the president of the Sculptors Society of Canada.

The chair of the fundraising campaign for the monument project, Murray Rubin, a retired pharmacist who graduated in 1950, says the cost of the monument was covered by donations from Harbord grads and students, present and former staff members, members of the community and several private charitable foundations.

Rubin also spearheaded the campaign to raise the money to refurbish and restore the Our Soldiers monument, honouring those who perished in World War I. It was dedicated in 1920 and rededicated on Remembrance Day 2005.

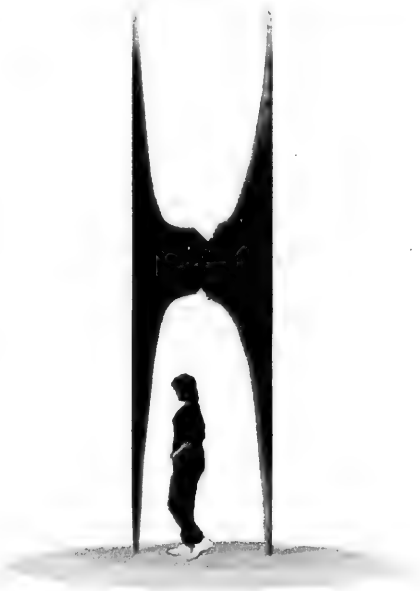
"We are proud that the Harbord Club was able to raise the funds for both monuments from generous individuals without any government support," Rubin said. The Harbord Club is an alumni organization made up of more than 2,000 former students and staff.

Opened in 1892, Harbord Collegiate Institute has a strong multicultural history. Many of the students at Harbord during World War II were Jewish, Rubin says.

Syd Moscoe, a Harbord graduate, is the chairman of the unveiling ceremony committee and the MC of the program. The Harbord Collegiate orchestra and choir will perform.

The graduates who will participate in the program include Leslie Dan, philanthropist; Ivan Fecan, head of CTV Television; Joe Pantalone, deputy mayor of Toronto; and Bob Sterling, who served with the Royal Canadian Air Force and was awarded a Distinguished Flying Cross and was one of the few Canadians to receive the Croix de Guerre.

Featured on the program will be Vernon White, the last person to see Lou Sommers, a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force who perished in a bombing raid when his plane was shot down over Holland. Sommers instructed his crew to bail out while he attempted to bring down the plane but went down with his plane.



The We Remember monument, erected at Harbord Collegiate Institute in memory of fallen soldiers of World War II, was created by architect and sculptor Morton Katz.

France bestows highest honour on Danson

which included a playing of the Marseillaise, the French national anthem, and the presentation of the medal to Danson and five others – Frederick Barnard, Theodore Bennett, Arthur Boon, William Hale and James McCullough.

The Order of the Legion of Honour was created by Napoleon Bonaparte in 1802. It's the longest surviving decoration in France and its highest national order, similar to the Order of Canada. It is awarded to civilian and military personnel for acts that contributed to the defence and prosperity of France.

French Ambassador Daniel Jouanneau presented the medals. Noting the bravery of the recipients in the fight to liberate France, Jouanneau said "We, Canadians and French, [share] a long common history.

"A close link keeps us united: from the wars we fought together, the wars we won together at the highest price. Twice in their history, Canada and France were committed, side by side, to defend values they considered worth [fighting] for: liberty, democracy, sovereignty, dignity.

"France will never forget the Canadian soldiers who came from all over the country, all volunteers, all so young, who crossed the Atlantic Ocean to free Europe. Thousands died in France in Beaumont-Hamel in 1916, in Vimy in 1917 and we will celebrate them with great solemnity, in Dieppe in 1942 and during D-Day in Normandy in 1944. Courage, honour and sense of sacrifice characterized their exemplary behaviour."

We saw war coming and believed as Jews we should be there

Danson, who served as defence minister in the government of Pierre Elliott Trudeau, enlisted in the Canadian army even before the war broke out. Along with his good friend, Freddie Harris, "we saw it coming and believed as Jews we should be there," he said.

Danson "made sergeant" and was enrolled in officer's training when Canadian forces hit the beaches on D-Day. Harris "did not want to miss D-Day, refused a commission and was killed on the beach," Danson said.

Danson saw action in the battle to close the Falaise Gap, an attempted Allied encirclement of German forces in Normandy. On Aug. 20, 1944, as the battle came to an end, Danson was hit.

Despite his wounds, Danson considers himself lucky. Of his four closest wartime friends, three were killed. His regiment alone lost more than 400 men during the war.

He accepts the loss of eyesight late in life with a soldier's stoicism. "That's alright," he said. "I'm alive and all my friends are dead."

As for the award, he admits to being "a little embarrassed because I didn't think I deserved it more than hundreds of others – thousands of others."

In accepting the award, Danson said he did so "for Canada and the troops."

Walk With Israel 2007 accessible to all members of the GTA

Toronto streets turn to sea of blue and white on Sunday, May 27

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

In its effort to bring out as many people as possible for the Walk With Israel 2007 on May 27, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is taking steps to ensure that the day's events are welcoming to all members of the community.

Those for whom the 7.7-kilometer route is too long will be able to take a shuttle bus from the first rest stop – only 1.7 kilometers from the start – to the Canadian National Exhibition's Automotive Building, where the RioCan Carnival will follow the Walk. Dignity Transportation executive vice president Jeff Passoff is providing the wheelchair-accessible buses free of charge because, he says, "by having these vehicles out there, maybe more people will see and understand the options available to all members of our community."

Chaya Fischman will be interpreting into sign language for members of the deaf community during the Walk start at 9:30 at Coronation Park, just across from the CNE's Princes' Gates. In addition, UJA Federation is working to accommodate other community groups serving those with special needs that have expressed interest in joining this year's Walk.

Chaya Fischman, seen above at last year's Walk With Israel, will return to this year's event to interpret into sign language for members of the GTA's deaf community. Chaya's presence is just one of many initiatives undertaken by UJA Federation to make the Walk accessible to all members of the community.

The force behind these initiatives is UJA Federation's Inclusion Committee. Formed in 2002 under the banner "We all belong," the committee promotes the participation of all Jews in mainstream communal life, including those with disabilities and their families.

"It's a highly visible event and, therefore, a perfect opportunity for UJA Federation to demonstrate our belief in total inclusion," said Fay Rotman, UJA Federation's director of inclusion. "Our goal is to ultimately see every public event be totally inclusive and UJA Federation needs to be at the forefront of the effort," she said. "It's not just that we physically accommodate people with different needs, but that we make them feel welcome."

The Walk With Israel is also an event for people of all ages. DJ companies Mint Lifestyle Events, Sole Power Productions Inc., and Magen Boys Entertainment, – all popular with the bar and bat mitzvah crowd - recently visited Jewish day schools to excite students about the Walk with high-energy presentations.

For more information visit www.walkwithisrael.com, where you can also register for the Walk and sponsor participants.

Women's Campaign & Advocacy torch is passed for 2008

Incoming Women's Campaign & Advocacy chair Liora Yakubowicz has a clear vision of what she wants WC&A to accomplish for UJA Federation Annual Campaign 2008. "We can bolster greatly neglected social services," she told an audience of over 100 participants at the recent WC&A leadership installation. Decrying Jewish poverty in Israel and Toronto, as well as the alienation of many Jewish university students from their heritage, Yakubowicz declared, "it is not acceptable and we cannot allow this to happen."

The installation of officers provided an opportunity to thank outgoing chair Judith Finer Freedman and her team, and welcome Yakubowicz (who served as vice chair last year), the new vice chair Lisa Draper, and the rest of the executive and board.

UJA Federation board chair David Engel lauded WC&A's achievements. "Campaign 2007 was an extraordinary one," he said. "Our community was presented with a great challenge: an unexpected war between Israel and Hezbollah that demanded our immediate response as well as a sustained effort throughout the annual campaign. As usual, Women's Campaign & Advocacy rose to the challenge: each of you in this room understood what was at stake, and you got the job done, raising a record $9.3 million dollars," he said.

Lesley Binstock Offman, co-chair of Campaign 2008 with Morris Perlis, past chair of WC&A, and member of the WC&A 2007 Executive, also addressed the gathering. "As I sat around the boardroom table I was thrilled to see daughters of my friends being part of the Executive," she said. "Yasher Koach to Judith for opening the door and inviting in the next generation."

Outgoing chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy Judith Finer Freedman (l) joined new chair, Liora Yakubowicz (centre) and vice chair Lisa Draper at the recent WC&A Installation of Officers at the Lipa Green Building.

Turning her attention to this year's Campaign, Binstock Offman welcomed Yakubowicz, with whom she traveled to Israel on a fact-finding trip along with Perlis and Campaign vice-chair Harvey Frisch. "We discovered that we share a passion for Israel and our community," she said.

Indeed, Yakubowicz, the daughter of Holocaust survivors and born in Israel, feels strongly about the intertwined destinies of Israeli and Diaspora Jewry. "Our very existence depends on Israel's security," she said. "We are like conjoined twins."

But while "the need is urgent," said Yakubowicz, she is looking forward to what lies ahead for her as WC&A chair. "It is so heart-warming to be connected to like-minded women who come together to share ideas and ideologies about philanthropy, tzedakah, Judaism, Zionism, and teaching and mentoring our children about the values that are so important to all of us," she said.

Ontario Jewish Archives expanding virtual Synagogue exhibit

The UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) is in the process of expanding its virtual exhibit "Toronto's First Synagogues." The original display, which was funded by Canada's Digital Collections, included the First Narayever, Kiever and Knesseth Israel synagogues. This fall it will launch exhibits in two new shuls – the Beach Hebrew Institute and Anshei Minsk – bringing the number of religious institutions included in this initiative to five.

The next phase will involve two more synagogues, Shaarei Tzedec on Markham Street and the Palmerston Street synagogue, Agudath Israel Anshei Sfard, which closed during the late 1970s.

"These next two shuls should be very important additions to the site due to their historic value to the community as well as their aesthetic beauty," said director of the OJA, Ellen Scheinberg. She added that "when the Palmerston synagogue closed, the congregation transferred a number of its treasures to the Archives, which have been preserved and safeguarded since then."

The OJA is looking for individuals who may have records documenting these synagogues in their homes, such as ledgers, photographs, invitations, ketubot and artifacts that could be used for this display. Members of the founding families are also encouraged to contact the Archives in order to contribute to this project.

In the future, the OJA will continue to add new synagogues to this site until all of the early shuls are included. However, donations are required to incorporate larger synagogues into the exhibit because of documentation complexity.

Anyone interested in contributing to this effort is asked to contact the Ontario Jewish Archives for more details at 416-635-2883 ext. 170.

The exhibit can be viewed at www.ontariojewisharchives.org by clicking Exhibitions and Special Presentations.

UJA Federation takes care of business with unique conference

Business, sports and entertainment leaders unite

By HOWARD ENGLISH & ALANNA PETROFF
UJA FEDERATION

What do Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey, acclaimed economist Sherry Cooper, Cineplex CEO Ellis Jacob, Apotex chairman Barry Sherman and children's toy manufacturer Anton Rabie have in common?

They were all five-star panelists among 28 first class speakers on a recent sunny Sunday at UJA Federation's recent "Taking Care of Business" conference, organized by Business Cabinet chairs Gilbert Palter and Ken Tanenbaum, together with Howard Lichtman and Richard Wajs.

The conference brought together some of the best and brightest Jewish notables in the fields of business, sports and entertainment for the benefit of nearly 400 participants.

"Taking Care of Business was an incredible experience for both panelists and participants," said organizer Howard Lichtman. "It was a once-in-a-lifetime opportunity to see Canada's leading businesspeople on the same stage, sharing their paths to success and community involvement."

Participating speakers in the eight sessions were: Jeff Ansell, Barry Avrich, Brent Belzberg, Mark Cohon, Dr. Sherry Cooper, David Cynamon, Daniel Daviau, Carey Diamond, Paul Godfrey, Ned Goodman, Ellis Jacob, David Kassie, David Koschitzky, Howard Lichtman, Michael Moskowitz, Neil Nisker, David Ossip, Gilbert Palter, Morris Perlis, Anton Rabie, Ariella Rohringer, Lewis Rose, Larry Rosen, Barry Sherman, Edward Sonshine, Chuck Swirsky, Ken Tanenbaum, Lawrence Tanenbaum, Richard Wajs, Chuck Winograd and Phyllis Yaffe.

The stories below offer a sampling of the insights supplied at the conference.

From Success to Significance

Teaching younger generations about the importance of maintaining a Jewish community will ensure the continuation of Jewish philanthropy.

The theme of engaging second and third generations was a heavily discussed topic at "Taking Care of Business" and the invited speakers - David Koschitzky, Morris Perlis and Barry Sherman – all highlighted the need to educate young Jews about their background to inspire them to participate in the community.

Koschitzky, the incoming chair of the UJA Federation Board this November, said it is human nature to give back once you have found success. The difficulty is encouraging people to give back to Jewish causes.

Panel moderator, Ariella Rohringer, chair, along with Fred Waks, of UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign, which raised an unprecedented $81 million, cited the fact that only 20% of Jewish donations go to Jewish causes.

Perlis, incoming chair, along with Lesley Binstock Offman, of UJA Federation Campaign 2008, recommended catering to the values of younger generations as a means of involving them in Jewish philanthropy.

Sherman, the chairman of Apotex Inc., said involving younger people in philanthropy also means explaining to them the personal satisfaction that comes with donating time and money to worthy organizations and initiatives.

Spotlight on Tzedaka

Barry Avrich's eyes light up as he talks about the upcoming opening of a 235-seat theatre in Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

After coming up with the idea and seeing it through to fruition, Avrich calls the theatre his "raison d'etre." The theatre, slated to open May 18, "will showcase newly-released blockbuster movies for children in the hospital and provide them with a much-needed escape," said Avrich.

As president of an entertainment marketing agency, it would seem that Avrich has enough on his plate with a full-time job and the theatre project. But he is also on the Board of the Toronto Film Festival and Best Buddies, a program that pairs students with mentally disabled adults.

The importance of giving back to the community was engrained in Avrich at an early age, when, at his grandfather's house, he would always hear the tinkling of coins in the tzedaka box, he said.

Avrich was one of three entertainment moguls who talked about the entertainment business, while highlighting their community work as well.

Ellis Jacob, CEO of Cineplex Entertainment described how he provides free screenings of the inspirational movie Paper Clips about a rural Tennessee initiative to highlight the Holocaust, to school groups.

Alliance Atlantis Communications CEO Phyllis Yaffe described her role in philanthropy by taking part in Women Against Multiple Sclerosis. "It's hugely important to be someone who can start giving back to your community," she said.

Sunshine ahead for Canadian economy

Dr. Sherry Cooper

It would be hard to find a more optimistic forecaster for Canada's economy than Sherry Cooper.

As the chief economist for BMO Capital Markets, it's Cooper's job to provide insights into our economic future, and the immediate future, she noted, leaves little room for anxiety.

"There is no recession in sight," she said.

Among Cooper's other observations were:

- The Bank of Canada will not raise interest rates this year, but long-term interest rates will be under modest pressure.
- Canadian corporations have more cash balance than "ever before in history."
- House prices will increase at a slower rate but there is no risk of an American-style housing price slowdown.
- The distribution of Canadian income and wealth is increasingly uneven.
- The fastest growing component of the labour force consists of 55-64 year old baby boomers.
- Business confidence in Canada is much higher than in the United States.

Cooper's solo session was a conference highlight.

Leading executives claim philanthropy makes good sports

North America's leading athletes should be as committed to charitable giving as they are to their athletic prowess, say three of Toronto's most powerful sports executives.

Toronto Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey, the CFL's new commissioner Mark Cohon, Argos co-owner David Cynamon and Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment chairman Lawrence Tanenbaum all agreed that in Tanenbaum's words "doing well and doing good is a very important concept."

"Every one of our players gives a portion of his salary to the Jays Care Foundation," said Godfrey, who noted that Blue Jays outfielder Vernon Wells pledged a million dollars of his most recent contract to charity.

Tanenbaum commended Raptors power forward Chris Bosh for doing the same.

The Argos, said Cynamon, try to "focus on good personalities who do much more than playing on the field."

Other topics covered at the session included prospects for a National Football League team in Toronto, for which Godfrey is still optimistic.

Obituary

WWII veteran remembered for his generosity

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Sam Cohen, a retired regimental sergeant major who fought with the Toronto Scottish Regiment machine gun unit in Europe in World War II, died on April 18 at 101.

Cohen served in France, Belgium, Holland, Germany and Luxembourg and was decorated with many medals, ribbons and citations for his war service. He was a career soldier until the age of 60.

In France, Cohen was wounded by shrapnel fire during a bombing raid. After retiring from the army, he went to work for a security company until he was 78.

Cohen was active with the General Wingate Branch 256 of the Royal Canadian Legion.

On his 100th birthday, Cohen told The CJN that one of the highlights of his life was returning to the Netherlands in 1970 for the 25th anniversary of that country's liberation.

Cohen lived in a house on Shaw Street in Toronto, which he purchased after he returned from the war, until his 100th birthday, when he moved into L'Chaim Retirement Home.

His parents came from Kiev, Russia, and met and married in Toronto. His family name was "Kagan," but it was changed to Cohen by an immigration officer because his father, David, who did not speak English, told the officer he was a "kohen."

Sam Cohen fought across Europe with the Toronto Scottish Regiment.

Cohen's father had a butcher shop at College and Markham streets. Cohen, who was born in 1905, attended Harbord Collegiate Institute. He operated a grocery store on Lippincott Street during the Great Depression.

He ran into financial problems because he extended credit to many of his customers, who were unable to repay him. He was known for his generosity throughout his life.

Cohen closed the store and enlisted in 1940. When he went overseas, he left behind his then 10-year-old daughter, Theresa, and one-year-old twin daughters, Joscelyn and Marilyn.

At the funeral service, Cohen's granddaughter, Gianna Kasman, spoke of her memories of her grandfather and his love of family and sports.

"My grandfather was famous for his love of all the Toronto teams – the Blue Jays, the Raptors and the Maple Leafs." She said that he read the sports sections of the newspaper every day.

"He was so vital. He experienced more things in his long incredible life than most, and [was] completely with it right to the very end."

She added that her grandfather's longevity defied all medical logic. "He smoked two packages of unfiltered cigarettes every day until he was 100 and enjoyed eating foods that were not healthy."

Cohen, who was buried in the Jewish War Veterans Memorial section at Mount Sinai Memorial Park, was predeceased by his wife 16 years ago.

He is survived by his daughters Theresa Strom, Joscelyn Kasman and Marilyn Weinrib, his sister Hilda Gould, seven grandchildren and 12 great-grandchildren.

Sol Kanee was key figure in world Jewry

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Israel Singer, the former executive director of the World Jewish Congress, once described Sol Kanee, who passed away on April 24, in Winnipeg at age 97, as one of the most influential figures in world Jewry in the second half of the 20th century.

Sol Kanee
[CJN file photo]

Kanee's resume includes the chairmanship of the World Jewish Congress, the presidency (1971-74) of the Canadian Jewish Congress, 17 years as a member of the board of the Bank of Canada, and the chairmanship of the Federal Business Development Bank. He also revolutionized the flour milling industry in Canada and helped put the Royal Winnipeg Ballet on the map. He received the Order of Canada in 1977 and the Order of Manitoba in 2000.

Yet despite all his accomplishments and accolades, Kanee, in the words of his son, Stephen, always saw himself as a boy from Melville, Sask.

"My father lived a charmed life," Stephen Kanee said in his eulogy for his father. "He had a propensity for being in the right place at the right time when momentous events were taking place."

The son of immigrant parents Sam and Rose Kanee, Sol Kanee was born June 1, 1909, and grew up in Melville and Winnipeg. He came to Winnipeg for university, where he signed up for the debating team. Among his fellow debate team members at the University of Manitoba were Samuel Freedman, who went on to serve as the first Jewish chief justice of Manitoba, and Maxwell Cohen, who became a well-known journalist and writer.

"The three of them cut a swathe through North American colleges with their debating skills," Stephen said. "That is how dad developed his formidable speaking skills."

Armed with a law degree from the University of Manitoba, Kanee returned to Melville in the early 1930s and opened a practice. It was his great good fortune that he fell under the wing of Liberal politico Jimmy Gardiner, whom Stephen described as the "perpetual cabinet minister from Saskatchewan in the federal Liberal governments of MacKenzie King.

"Gardiner was dad's first great mentor," Stephen Kanee said. "He was later mentored by Sam Bronfman [liquor magnate and head of Canadian Jewish Congress] and Nachum Goldmann [of the World Jewish Congress] and later took it upon himself to mentor others."

Through Gardiner's influence, Kanee became an influential figure in his own right in the federal Liberal party. In the 1967 leadership race, Kanee supported his very good friend, former foreign minister Mitchell Sharp.

When it became evident that Sharp wasn't going to win, Kanee persuaded him to drop out of the race and throw his support behind Pierre Trudeau.

"Dad's father always reminded him that for everything good that he received in life, you have to give back to the community," Stephen said. "Dad gave back in every way above and beyond the call of duty."

In 1939, Kanee was one of the first Jewish Canadians to enlist in the armed forces. He finished the war with the rank of major.

"In the army, my father learned discipline, strategy and how to focus," Stephen said. "He had the ability to quickly size up a situation and assume a leadership role."

After the war, Kanee returned to Winnipeg to resume practising law.

In the early 1950s, Kanee's father, Sam, and his younger brother, Abe, moved from Melville to Winnipeg and bought a struggling flour mill. Kanee gave up his law practice to help run the mill.

"My father knew nothing about milling," Stephen said, "But, as was his usual way, he sought out advice from the best and the brightest. He was told about a new technology in use in Switzerland. He went to Switzerland and brought back the technology to the family's mill. The Soo Line Mill was the first in North America with the technology. It revolutionized the industry."

His father would constantly be going on trips when Stephen was a boy. "My mother [Florence Barrish Kanee, who passed away 17 years ago] was an exquisite beauty, but she was shy and retiring," Stephen recalled.

"She knew that she had married a comet. She showed enormous patience and sacrifice through the years, and dad gave back in kind in her declining years."

Stephen noted that for relaxation, his father enjoyed going fishing. "My father loved nothing more than sitting in a boat on a lake fishing and quoting full length poems."

Stephen closed his eulogy by reciting his father's favourite poem: Crossing the Bar by Alfred Lord Tennyson.

Kanee is survived by his son Stephen and his wife, Marianne, as well as by his sister, Ricky Schachter, in Toronto, and several nieces and nephews.

A cappella singers raise voices to raise money

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Varsity Jews are at it again this year as they prepare for a concert to raise money for another good cause next Sunday.

The Varsity Jews, an a capella group at the University of Toronto that's now in its fifth year, will perform a concert on May 6 at Holy Blossom Temple with all the proceeds going to Beit Hashanti, a shelter and therapy centre for at-risk youth in Israel.

"The show is called Shir Brilliance. It's a multiple play on words, since shir is Hebrew for song, and brilliant also refers to a tonal quality of music," said Avi Shack, who has been part of the Hillel-affiliated, 16-person choir for three years.

Last year, Shack said, the group raised more than $10,000 for Save a Child's Heart, an Israeli non-profit organization that provides children from developing countries with free open-heart surgery. The $10,000 was just enough to fund one open heart surgery for a needy child.

"We expected a crowd last year, but we didn't know Holy Blossom would be so full. It was almost filled to capacity. By the end of the show, the audience was standing, dancing and singing at their seats," he said.

This year, the Varsity Jews, who describe themselves as "bound by [their] love of music and desire to incorporate Judaism into campus life," are focusing their attention on another Israeli organization and hope the response from the community with be just as enthusiastic as it was last year.

"We're trying to raise funds for Beit Hashanti... [It] takes in people from every walk of life, regardless of language, ethnicity or nationality. These young people have been assaulted, have experienced parental drug abuse, or are given one last chance before entering the correctional system," said Shack, 20, a third-year sociology and Jewish studies student at U of T.

The choir will sing traditional Hebrew folk songs, as well as classic rock songs with a Jewish twist. For example, they'll preform parodies of classic tunes such as My Bar Mitzvah, which is sung to the tune of Abba's Mamma Mia.

"This year's show will have a lot of the same vibrant, lively energy as our past shows. We'll still be singing some of our old favourites, but our repertoire has changed a lot to include new musical styles and some great new songs," Shack said.

Two teens arrested for shul vandalism in B.C.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

RICHMOND, B.C. — Thanks to surveillance camera footage that captured the April 15 vandalism at Richmond, B.C.'s Beth Tikvah Synagogue, two teens were arrested late last month in connection with the crime.

The youths were released and will appear in court this month, the Richmond RCMP said.

"They're 15 and 17 years old, and one is a local Richmond boy," said Rabbi Claudio Kaiser-Blueth, spiritual leader of the congregation. "The next step is they'll be brought in front of the judge, and he'll have to make the final decision."

Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth said that according to police, the fact the vandalism happened on Holocaust Remembrance Day was coincidental.

"By their age, we assume they have no idea of the history of the Holocaust, and it also seems they have no connection with any group. But I have very little information about the motives," he said.

The pair, whose names have not been released by police because they're young offenders, were captured at 5 a.m. on video surveillance camera scribbling anti-Semitic graffiti on the synagogue's walls.

It included a picture of a hanging man with the word Jew written over it, as well as swastikas.

Canadian Jewish Congress commended the RCMP and the B.C. Hate Crimes Team on the arrests.

Pointing to the presence of security cameras at Beth Tikvah, Mark Weintraub, chair of Congress' Pacific region, noted: "This reaffirms the Jewish community's long-held belief that security cameras can be an aid to police and a deterrent for racist hate crimes such as these. We call on the federal government to support 'at-risk' communities by providing the needed financial resources to equip places of worship, religious schools etc with such equipment."

Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth said his congregation was relieved that the perpetrators had been caught.

In an opinion piece that appeared in the Richmond News, a local community newspaper, the rabbi's response to the perpetrators of this crime was praised.

Asked the day after the attack what might be a suitable punishment for the vandals, Rabbi Kaiser-Blueth had answered: "To come study with us, to learn the history – not jail. Jail just makes them more angry, more enraged."

Richmond News editor Corry Anderson-Fennell wrote: "It's doubtful the culprits will take up Kaiser-Blueth on his offer, given the cowardice they've exemplified thus far. But maybe it will have them think seriously about the hurt they caused, and maybe they'll do a little studying on their own and learn about the significance of the swastika and the horrors of the Holocaust. Maybe they'll crack open a book or, more likely, go online and begin to understand why prejudice and persecution of a people must not be tolerated. History has taught us these lessons, and they apply universally."

London cantor to be honoured for 40 years of service

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Cantor Josef Freiman, who has been at Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont., for 40 years, is being honoured later this month for his dedication to the synagogue and to the community.

The cantorial concert on May 16, called "Voicing Your Love," will also celebrate the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

Freiman, a Holocaust survivor who was born in Romania, studied at rabbinical and cantorial schools in Czechoslovakia and Hungary. He lived and studied in many countries around the world, including Argentina and Uruguay, before he settled in London, Ont., with his wife Eva and his children Lillian and Gabriel.

"Not that I wanted a life wondering around, but I went to study in a rabbinical seminary for three years in Budapest… I went to Italy to study singing, and after that I went to Israel, and then I came here," Freiman said.

"I didn't choose to [settle in London]. I went to New York, but I didn't like it, and then in Montreal, they wanted me, but I had to wait. Then I came here for a temporary job for two years. I stayed because the children were nice and there were very nice people who were nice to me. And I'm nice to them, too," he said with a laugh.

Freiman, who is known for his passion for singing, studying Jewish texts and giving bar and bat mitzvah lessons, is Or Shalom's first and only cantor.

Despite this remarkable achievement, the 87-year-old would prefer that the community not make such a fuss over him.

"I'm not an honour-hunter. Ani lo rodef achrei hakavod," Freiman said, translating into Hebrew.

"I like to do my job, I did it for 40 years. I like music, I like being a cantor. This is my calling. It's not just a job," he said.

"Cantorial music I love very much. I wasn't the greatest cantor, but I loved it. The people liked my style and I liked to be a cantor. I liked to study. I was teaching talmudic things because I learned in an Orthodox yeshiva."

He said he taught Cantor Eric Moses of Beth Sholom Synagogue in Toronto, who is scheduled to perform Hebrew prayers and songs at the upcoming concert.

"I improved his Hebrew and taught his bar mitzvah lessons, and after, I took him for the choir… I took him under my arms," he said of Moses, who came from Sudbury to study with Freiman in London years ago.

Another of Freiman's claims to fame is that he helped the twin brothers of David Shore, the Emmy Award-winning producer of the television series House, become rabbis.

"They didn't behave well, but they were here with me for four years and I prepared them until they went to yeshiva to become rabbis," he said. "They are both in Israel, and between the two of them, they have 18 children."

Shelley Sukerman, the organizer of the "Voicing Your Love" concert, said that in addition to Moses' performance, the event will include a Yom Yerushalayim service, and three congregants from three generations will pay tribute to Freiman by delivering speeches about him.

Henry Krichker, a violinist with Orchestra London and an Or Shalom member, will perform klezmer and other types of music, and there will be a performance by the volunteer shul choir, Sukerman added.

Following the concert, hors d'oeuvres, wine, desserts and hot drinks will be served.

Although Freiman is uncomfortable with the idea that he's being honoured, he is pleased that the community he's been a part of for the past 40 years respects him.

"I did the best that I could do with my life… I like to do my job and I like simplicity. I am happy that people like me," he said.

Tickets to the concert cost $54 and are available from the Or Shalom office. For more information, call 519-438-3081.

Kingston helps celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut in Montreal

The Kingston, Ont., community stood with Montreal last week, to show its solidarity with the State of Israel.

A busload of people, Jews and Christians, came to Montreal from Kingston to participate in the Yom Ha'atzmaut rally organized by a coalition of Jewish organizations (COJO).

Rabbi Daniel Elkin of Kingston's Beth Israel Congregation organized the group, who were thrilled with the opportunity to express their support for Israel and the Jewish people.

Financial backing for the trip came from members of Beth Israel, the participants and COJO.

Four videos about Israel were screened during the bus ride. At the rally, the Kingstonians formed a circle, danced and sang songs of peace.

Rabbi Elkin said he was encouraged by Montreal's invitation to include the Kingston community in the celebration of Israeli Independence Day, expressing special thanks to Ariela Cotler. He was also moved by the support of Christians on behalf of Israel.

Media show little interest in Saudi plan

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In the April 19 CJN, "According to reports" examined two very different columns about the prospects for peace between Israel and the Arab world. David Brooks' New York Times column argued that Israeli and Arab narratives fail to intersect in any meaningful way, whereas Globe and Mail columnist Shira Herzog wrote that, with effective leadership and vision, reconciliation remains possible.

Herzog pointed out that, according to a Tel Aviv University opinion survey, a small majority of Israelis endorse the recent Arab League Saudi initiative as a basis for negotiations. The Saudi plan promises peace if Israel returns to the precise 1967 borders and, in effect, accepts the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel.

Over the years, surveys have consistently found that a majority of Israelis support a two-state solution to the Palestinian conflict based on territorial compromise, and genuine security – the "land for peace" formula of UN Security Council Resolution 242. Both former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon and current Prime Minister Ehud Olmert are publicly committed to a two-state solution.

Olmert reacted to the Saudi plan by saying that while he had reservations about some of its details, there are positive elements that deserve serious attention. On April 1, standing with German Chancellor Angela Merkel, Olmert proposed a meeting of "all Arab states" and Israel to explore the plan.

Since then, the Canadian media, and much of the international media, have remained largely quiet about what could be seen as a potential major breakthrough toward an Arab-Israeli peace deal. While some columnists took note of the Saudi initiative, the story was mostly absent from the news pages.

In an April 2 interview published by the Council on Foreign Relations, an American think tank, Middle East analyst David Makovsky said the key to progress rests with the Arab League's willingness to talk directly with Israel – in short, to take Olmert up on his offer.

Progress also depends on the league's willingness to see the Saudi initiative not as a "take it or leave it" proposition, as Amr Moussa, head of the Arab League, has insisted, but rather as a basis for negotiations.

Makovsky, who has written extensively about Arab-Israel peacemaking, believes that if these two conditions are met, an upcoming meeting of the "Arab Quartet," comprising Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Egypt and Jordan, could advance peace discussions.

While Israel must be prepared for territorial compromise, which Olmert and his Kadima party claim to be, Makovsky insists that the Arabs must also show flexibility on the "right of return." However, giving up this "right" also means relinquishing a major part of the Arab narrative.

Makovsky might be overly optimistic when he says, "Once we get some kind of historical and analytical clarity on this issue, with goodwill, the Arabs and Israelis can sit together and work it out."

For Arabs and Israelis to arrive at an agreed "historical and analytical clarity" on such an emotionally charged issue as the "right of return" means Brooks' thesis that Israeli and Palestinian viewpoints are inherently incompatible must be proved false. According to most other Mideast analysts, that's an unlikely development, made even more unlikely by the rise of rejectionist Islamist organizations like Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

For example, in "The Saudi's True Target" (Jerusalem Report, April 16), Prof. Joseph Kostiner of Tel Aviv University, a leading authority on Saudi Arabia and the Gulf states, argues that the Saudi initiative is not primarily designed to promote Arab-Israeli peace. The Saudis want to enhance their standing as peacemakers with the United States and to shore up influence among Sunni-dominant Arab states, particularly now that the region is being challenged by non-Arab, Shiite-dominant Iran.

Kostiner insists that while Saudi Arabia and Israel have common cause in trying to thwart Iran's influence with Hamas and with Hezbollah in Lebanon, this is of limited value in moving toward peace with Israel itself. Even the "Mecca Agreement" that led to the Hamas-Fatah Palestinian unity government was meant to stem internal Palestinian fighting, not to forge Israeli-Palestinian reconciliation.

Whether the media are confused by the complexity behind the Saudi initiative or share the pessimism of Brooks and Kostiner, so far they have shown little enthusiasm for the Saudi plan.

Disdaining truth, they bury trust

From the editor's desk

Objectivity in journalism is impossible to achieve. Most honest reporters will readily acknowledge this. That is because, however hard they might strive to be objective, reporters and journalists are imperfect human beings who gather, filter, assess and report back information according to distinct, highly individualized, subjective selves.

But whereas true objectivity in journalism is impossible to attain, fairness is not. Indeed, it is indispensable. It is the key safeguard of integrity in news reporting.

Fairness is an aspect of procedure, independent of character. It therefore stands apart from and above individual disposition, preference or personality.

Or so it should.

But apparently not in Great Britain, at least not where news coverage of Israel is concerned. There is neither objectivity nor fairness. That has been the suspicion among supporters of Israel and supporters, generally, of reliable news reporting for many years.

And now the suspicion is confirmed.

Last month at its annual meeting, the National Union of Journalists, voted 66 to 54 for "a boycott of Israeli goods similar to those boycotts in the struggles against apartheid South Africa… and… to demand sanctions be imposed on Israel by the British government and the United Nations."

According to the report in the JTA, the motion also condemned the "slaughter of civilians by Israeli troops in Gaza and the Israeli Defence Forces' continued attacks inside Lebanon following the defeat of its army by Hezbollah," and called for the end of "Israeli aggression in Gaza and other occupied territories."

Apparently the resolution was watered down from earlier versions.

The very language of the resolution betrays its prejudice-soaked nature and its profound ignorance of the truth of conditions on the ground in Gaza or during the war last summer.

That they are the very people upon whom the public relies for accurate information who authored so wholesale, and one should add, so grotesque a distortion of the facts, is highly problematic to the society they purport to serve.

In the union's defence, its general secretary, Jeremy Dear, told the International Herald Tribune, "This was opposed by the leadership and approved by the membership."

Tim Gopsill, the union's press spokesperson, said the "boycott call was a gesture of support for the Palestinian people, notably those suffering in the siege of Gaza."

He also said that the vote did not suggest British journalists could not report objectively on Israel.

But Dear and Gopsill's explanations were lame. The vote proves the very opposite.

Those British journalists who supported the vote put their anti-Israel prejudice on display for the entire western public to see. In so doing they buried any trust we could possibly have for their news reports, commentaries, opinions and analyses about Israel's conflict with the Palestinians.

And worse.

If the voting was representative of the majority of the journalists who report on the news and presumably help shape public opinion regarding that news, it is not an overstatement to say that there is a structural, permanently distorting mechanism within British society twisting its grasp of reality and truth into something misshapen and possibly dangerous.

The National Union of Journalists has a 14-point code of professional conduct that has governed since 1936. True to expectations, the language of the code is succinct of style and ennobling of content.

The governing rules of the union require that "all journalists joining the union must sign that they will strive to adhere" to the code of professional conduct.

And those rules are precise and demanding, their tone and expectation established at the very outset of the code.

"1. A journalist has a duty to maintain the highest professional and ethical standards."

"3. A journalist shall strive to ensure that the information he/she disseminates is fair and accurate, avoid the expression of comment and conjecture as established fact and falsification by distortion, selection or misrepresentation."

Sadly then, these rules of journalistic conduct – insofar as they apply to coverage of Israel – are a bluff. They are meaningless pieties that look good on a plaque on a wall in the union's headquarters but which stand for nothing in the service of truth in reporting on the Middle East conflict.

They are the living proof of the distortion rolling through and taking hold of British media.

This distortion, sadly, is of a distressing piece with that which we see in British academia as well. Last year, it will be recalled, the largest association of university teachers voted to encourage its members to boycott all contact with Israeli academics.

Question. I have been separated for three years and I have a five-year-old daughter. Her father gives me child support off and on but really I don't care if he does and neither does he.

I want to get a divorce and not have to go through a child support and custody battle.

Can I get divorced without having to deal with child support and custody?

Answer: You can apply for a divorce with the court without requesting custody or child support.

However, by law you must disclose in court documents that you have a child, that the child lives primarily with you, the identity of the father, any knowledge of his income and that you are declining to apply for child support.

Believe it or not, under the Child Support Guidelines of the Divorce Act, a judge has a legal duty prior to granting a divorce to ensure that the parent not living with the child is ordered to pay the appropriate amount of child support in accordance with his income, even though you are not applying for it.

To ensure that you are not denied a divorce you should either apply for child support and give some evidence of the father's annual income or explain convincingly in the affidavit in support of your divorce motion why you do not seek it and why it is in the child's best interests for you to waive it.

The same law does not apply to custody matters. However, you can apply for a divorce without requesting a custody order.

Question: I am currently in a custody dispute with my wife concerning our two sons. My wife lied to the court about me abusing her and the children in order to gain temporary custody of the children. I have more than enough evidence to prove that she intentionally lied.

How likely is the court to find her in contempt? What is the best approach to force the court to hold her accountable for her lies?

Answer: No question that perjury is a criminal offence, but parents are very rarely prosecuted. Moreover, it is only "contempt" if she has disobeyed a court order.

However, the more she lies the more she loses credibility. But disproving her lies doesn't necessarily prove you are the superior parent. You must now demonstrate your intimate understanding, skill and acquaintance of the children's needs.

Warring parents often lose sight of what judges look for.

What is your evidence of the children's needs, not just merely of mom's faults and lies?

Alternatives for energy issues tackled by Weizmann Institute of Science initiative

From skyrocketing prices at the gas pumps, to scathing reports about global warming, there is hardly a day that passes without the world fuming over energy issues.

Fortunately, while energy-related conflict and strife is prevalent, so too is our understanding of these problems and a desire to find alternatives and solutions.

Enter the Initiative for Research in Sustainable and Alternative Energy, an endeavour launched recently at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot, Israel.

The ambitious program seeks to bring together leading scientists to pursue innovative research projects that will ultimately result in clean, environmentally friendly and sustainable forms of energy.

"We are straining the resources of the world and we can't continue going in this direction," said Jay Smith, Weizmann Science Canada's chairman of the board and president.

"That is why research in this area is so compelling."

A key goal of the initiative is to attract established researchers and burgeoning scientific minds to come to Weizmann and embark on dynamic research.

"We want to attract brilliant researchers who have new ideas and will conduct basic research in a variety of areas," says Weizmann professor David Cahen.

The initiative is venturing into such diverse fields as solar power, methanol, hydrogen, bio mass, fuel cells, nuclear fusion and energy conservation.

A fundraising campaign is under way to propel the endeavour with a target of raising $20 million worldwide.

The initiative's projects involve researchers and students from different disciplines working hand-in-hand.

"There is no other Institute like this in the world, where all these scientists work together," says Cahen.

"We organize lectures and forums where scientists share their ideas with young people to create awareness and plant the seeds for these young people to help solve critical energy problems."

Here are some details of the Initiative for Research in Sustainable and Alternative Energy.

Here are some details of the Initiative for Research in Sustainable and Alternative Energy.

METHANOL

The Alterative Energy Initiative endeavours to pursue innovative methods of producing methanol, which could be a clean source of energy. Researchers are interested in producing methanol by capturing carbon dioxide and combining it with water (hydrogen).

HYDROGEN

There is much promise in the area of hydrogen research, such as the possibility of using it to produce electrical power. Researchers are considering a number of possibilities including hydrogen as a fuel produced by solar driven electrolysis, as well as hydrogen as an intermediate product in renewable energy production

SOLAR

Weizmann is a world leader in solar energy, boasting an on-campus solar tower and the Canadian Institute for Energies and Applied Research. Institute scientists are looking to continue to blaze trails in solar research, with such projects as generating electricity using solar energy and finding innovative ways to harness the power of natural sunlight.

BIOMASS

Plants have the potential to be phenomenal energy sources and Weizmann researchers are hard at work exploring ways to grow energy rich plants. For example, Weizmann scientists are aiming to produce ethanol through the fermentation of the sugars in straw.

NUCLEAR FUSION

Nuclear fusion can produce heat as hot as the sun. Recent breakthroughs in power fusion have shown it to be cheaper, more robust and a more dependable form of producing energy.

FUEL CELLS

The exciting feature of fuel cells isn't only that creating them results in electricity, but that the by-product is water and heat; two clean forms of energy. Weizmann researchers are looking to combine fuel cells with photovoltaic solar cells to generate constant power.

ABOUT THE WEIZMANN INSTITUTE OF SCIENCE

The Weizmann Institute of Science, in Rehovot, Israel, is a pioneering multidisciplinary research institute, regarded as one of the best in the world. Noted for its wide-ranging exploration of the sciences and technology, the Institute boasts 2,500 scientists, technicians and research students. Institute research efforts include the search for new ways of fighting disease and hunger, exploring mathematics and computer science, probing the physics of matter and the universe, creating novel materials and developing new strategies for protecting the environment.

RAYS OF HOPE

Professor Jacob Karni sees the sun as the great energy source of the future

Sunshine is welcomed by most of us for its soothing heat and natural beauty.

But when Jacob Karni sees the sun's rays beaming down, he has visions of something much grander than warm weather.

"Solar energy is available in many countries," says Karni, who heads the Weizmann Institute of Science's Energy Center and oversees the Institute's solar program.

"It can be turned into electricity, heat, or clean fuels...And it's all within our grasp."

Indeed, not only is there an abundant amount of sunlight, but it is a renewable source of energy.

Karni believes solar energy has the power to meet the world's immense energy needs.

For 16 years, Karni has been working towards that goal at Weizmann's sunny campus in Rehovot, Israel, focusing on harnessing solar power in a cost-effective way and then transporting it to the people who will use it.

In one such project, the scientist is exploring how to generate a synthetic fuel that could potentially run cars with solar energy, all while not producing any greenhouse gases.

His pioneering work also includes such feats as developing a sunlight absorber and a high-pressure receiver window, as well as an ongoing study into solar-driven hydrogen production.

His concepts have also paved the way for two industry-led commercialization programs, including a solar-thermal demonstration plant in China, which uses state-of-the-art technology to convert sunlight into electricity.

Karni notes that if solar panels were placed in China, the eastern part of the country could conceivably be provided with significant energy.

Modestly, the father of four doesn't take individual credit for these accomplishments.

"(Our) effort takes a multidisciplinary group and the Weizmann Institute has the capability to bring the necessary disciplines together," he relates.

The need to move forward on pursuits of alternative, sustainable sources of clean energy is pressing.

Not only are non-renewable resources of energy, like oil, dwindling, but the constant burning of fossil fuels is wreaking havoc on the environment.

"The mean surface temperature of the earth is higher today than at any time in the last millennium," Karni says.

"Within five to ten years, we must provide a large-scale practical approach for renewable energy production, storage and transport."

While Karni and his colleagues have made tremendous strides, what will help fuel them forward is significant funding.

Where were you when the gas ran out?

Short term blackouts and temporary gas shortages are little more than annoying. But what if the pumps ran dry and the lights didn't come back on? What then?

That is the question Weizmann Institute of Science researchers have been asking themselves for decades. Ever since the Canadian Institute for Energies and Applied Research was established in the early 1980's, the Institute has been a focal point in the search for sustainable and alternative energy sources.

The Institute's global $20-million Initiative for Research in Sustainable and Alternative Energy builds and expands upon this pioneering research. Our ambitious program already has more than 250 researchers working on projects ranging from solar power and biomass to nuclear fusion and conservation.

Now is the time to act! Waiting for the future energy crisis to reach us – and it IS coming – means failing to act until it is too late. THE FUTURE IS NOW!

You can be part of the solution. You can help prevent a looming catastrophe.

The quest for alternative energy sources may be the defining global issue of our time. Your generous support may be the defining action of your life.

Jewish Film Festival highlights a variety of themes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A young Israeli suicide-bombing victim struggles to recover from grievous wounds. Jews talk about their former homes in Arab lands. Jewish refugees flee the Nazis during the Holocaust, bound for Palestine. A bevy of beauties compete to become Israel's first Playboy bunny.

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs from May 5 to 13, features movies highlighting these and other themes. A preview follows.

Kinneret Lives (Sunday, May 6, at 3 p.m.), directed by Zamir Dahbash, turns on Kinneret Boosany, a waitress who was badly injured when Arab terrorists bombed the My Coffee House café in Tel Aviv on March 31, 2001, killing one person and wounding 32.

Pronounced clinically dead, Kinneret suffered burns on 70 per cent of her body and teetered between life and death as she lay in a hospital for five months. "She was one big burn, skin and bones," her mother laments. "We cried for a long time."

Told from Kinneret's perspective and that of her loved ones, this poignant 52-minute film alternates between the past and the present.

Pre-bombing clips show her as a hot babe – vibrant, sexy, energetic and beautiful. But now, in excerpts from a video diary, she can hardly grasp the enormity of the tragedy that has befallen her.

Kinneret Boosany recovers from her wounds in the film Kinneret Lives.

In a clip from September 2003, she bewails her condition, speaking of her gloom and loneliness, comparing her situation to a prison, likening herself to a vampire and expressing a desire to be "a normal person." Throughout this crisis, Kinneret is consoled by her parents and by her boyfriend's unconditional love and support.

The film jumps forward by a year as she and her mom visit New York City to raise money for a hospital burn unit. In an appearance before students, she tells of her efforts to walk again. In another excerpt from the same clip, she bashfully admits that she had sex with a man whose name she has forgotten.

Kinneret needs constant surgery, and in New York City, a doctor operates on her face and neck to smooth out scars. "Every surgery is stressful," her mother says in a disheartening tone.

Despite her descent into the darkness of pessimism, Kinneret shows flashes of resilience. The message that shines through is that hope springs eternal.

At one time, up to one million Jews lived in such Arab countries as Egypt, Iraq, Libya, Syria and Yemen. But with the birth of Israel in 1948, their lives were torn asunder as they were expelled or pressured to leave. The Forgotten Refugees (Sunday, May 6, at 8:15 p.m.), an interesting film, relates their story.

In fact, they have not been forgotten. Israel has raised the issue, as have Jewish organizations in the Diaspora. Nevertheless, Michael Grynzpan's documentary is well worth viewing. As he reminds us, Jews were one of the indigenous inhabitants of the Middle East, not the interlopers they were portrayed as by misinformed Arabs.

To a considerable degree, the film consists of testimony from former residents. Mordechai Ben-Porat, an Iraqi Jew, points out that Jews were in Iraq long before the Muslims. Shimon Avizemer, a Jew from Yemen, notes that Jews were subjected to various restrictions.

A tolerated and usually protected minority known as dhimmis, Jews were not, for example, permitted to build homes higher than their Muslim neighbours, and were at the mercy of rulers.

Dhimmi laws, which helped shape Muslim perceptions of Jews, were largely abolished by European colonial powers, but Arab nationalists in the modern era viewed Jews with suspicion. Among them was the grand mufti of Palestine, Haj Amin al-Husseini, who consorted with Adolf Hitler.

Linda Abu Aziz, an Iraqi Jew, tells of the persecution to which her fellow Jews were subjected, while Raphael Israeli, a former resident of Morocco, says that he grew up in a climate of fear. Survivors of pogroms in Libya remember atrocities.

In an effort to present a balanced picture, Gryzspan says that Jews found a haven in the Arab world after their expulsion from Spain and made great contributions to their host societies. He also presents Jews who recall their good relations with Muslims and express their gratitude to Arabs who helped them during bitter times.

Jews who fled left behind property, while those who stayed faced problems. Many of the refugees ended up in Israel, where they struggled mightily. Today, their descendants comprise roughly half of Israel's population.

Irwin Cotler, a Canadian parliamentarian and a former justice minister, enunciates the valid point that the United Nations has not passed a single resolution pertaining to Jewish refugees from Arab lands. As Gryzpan suggests, this is a commentary on its selective morality.

The Darien Dilemma (Sunday, May 6, at 6 p.m.), by Erez Laufer, is a footnote from World War II.

In 1940, when the Nazis were on the march and seemed destined to defeat the Allies, 1,000 Jewish men and women, all members of a Zionist youth group from Vienna, found themselves stranded on the frozen waters of the Danube River in what was then Yugoslavia.

En route to a new home in Palestine, they were suddenly prisoners of poor weather, and vulnerable to Nazi caprices. The newly formed Mossad, an instrument of Palestine's Jewish community, tried to extricate them from their predicament, but it was not easy.

Consisting of file footage from the war, interviews with survivors and dramatic re-enactments, The Darien Dilemma refers to a ship the Mossad purchased to rescue them and a morally charged debate its operatives engaged in while the fleeing Jews waited anxiously for relief.

The chief character, Ruth Klieger, is a hard-driving Mossad agent working ferverishly to save them. Nothing will stand in her way, not even a plan to use the Darien to sabotage the Germans and thus shorten the war.

This supposedly untold tale from the Holocaust is intriguing, but unfortunately, The Darien Dilemma tends to be muddled and confusing in the telling.

Toronto Jewish Film Festival

Hats off to Jerusalem documentaries

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Three unique documentaries focusing on Jerusalem – its people, its sects, its posters and even its hats – are airing at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Igal Hecht's latest film, Streets of Jerusalem, offers different viewpoints of Jerusalem by interviewing eight people (Jews, Muslims and a Christian) who live in the city.

Unlike many of his other films (Disengaging Democracy, Not in My Name), Hecht stays away from voice-over narration and lets the eight subjects, everyday Jerusalemites, tell their story.

There is a Jewish oleh from Australia who lives in the Ramon district of Jerusalem and whose 15-year-old daughter was killed in the Sbarro bombing in 2001.

He minces no words. "Jerusalem is one of the most interesting cities in the world," he says from the cemetery where his daughter is buried alongside her best friend who was also killed in the bombing. "There is so much going on here, yet we are plagued by our proximity to a large group of barbarians."

In Abu-dis, an Arab neighbourhood, an older Arab man is unequivocal. He believes there will never be peace until all the Jews "go back to where they came from. This place," he says pointing to the Old City, "will be full of Jewish blood."

We meet an Arab taxi driver who spent a year in jail for, he says, being wrongly accused of throwing a plank of wood at a bus. He says many times people have refused to get in his cab because he's Arab. "Life is good here," he says as he drives through Jerusalem's traffic, "but the people are not."

At one point, Hecht sets his camera up beside the security fence and films some Arabs trying to cross over it, only to be stopped by Israeli security forces.

An Arab carpenter laments that it now takes him a lot longer to get home after work. It used to be a five-minute walk from his shop, but now he has to circumvent the fence by car, an hour's trip.

In the Old City itself, we meet various vendors – Jewish, Christian and Muslim – whose livelihood depends on the tourism industry. Since the intifadah, we're told, Jews and Muslims rarely integrate as much as they used to.

"This should be an open city of peace," a vendor of Christian sovuenrirs says. "It should be open to Muslims, Christians and Jews. It's what God would want."

In Paris Square we meet the Women in Black, a group of Jewish women who have been protesting "the occupation" for 18 years.

The shtreimel may have originated in Eastern Europe to humiliate Jews.

As they speak to the cameraman, a Jewish driver heckles them. Timing is everything in a documentary.

The lasting impression we're left with after watching this documentary is that if these eight people's opinions are anything to go by, there won't be peace in Jerusalem, or Israel, anytime soon.

A pity.

Streets of Jerusalem has its world premiere on May 11 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema. Hecht will be in attendance.

Meanwhile, in another corner of Jerusalem live another group of people – the Neturei Karta.

In Yoel, Israel and the Pashkavils, an Israeli documentary directed by Lina Chaplin, we get a rare glimpse into this community of haredim who are opposed to the State of Israel because it is a secular state.

Opposed to modern forms of technology, the Neturei Karta disseminate their news and opinions through pashkavils (posters) that they paste on the walls of their community.

But, like in all societies, viewpoints differ, and this documentary focuses on the battle of words between Israel, an extremist who carries no ID card, and Yoel, a savvy, humorous businessmen who is a bit more moderate.

Israel has nine children with his young wife. "I hope to have 22," he says, though his wife just smiles. They live in a one-bedroom apartment. He sees television as a tool of defilement.

Israel owns a printing press and has written hundreds of pashkavils stating the more Orthodox viewpoints. The ironic thing is that Yoel won the contract from the municipality to paste these posters up.

He dutifully puts up their posters, but at times covers them with his own rebuttals. "I'm not afraid to sign my pashkavils," he says. When he is criticized in one of the posters for participating in a television documentary, he prints one saying, "How do you know so well what's on TV?"

"Spirit of the Community" Dinner

זו השנה הרביעית ברציפות שבית חב"ד מקיים ערב תגיגי למען הקהילה הישראלית שהוא משרת. הבעתי את דעתי לא פעם שמעשי בית חב"ד ובראשם רבי לנדא הם צדיקות גמורה בעיני. הבאים מישראל אינם מתקבלים בסבר פנים יפות על ידי הקהילה היהודית, שהיתה רוצה שהם ישארו "שם". רוב הישראלים שמגיעים הנה אינם שומרי מסורת ועל כן גם אינם משתייכים לבית כנסת, דבר שמשאיר אותם מנותקים מהחברות שלהם. ובכל האירה המנטרת הזאת יש מקום אחד שפתוח את ליבו, זרועותיו ודלתו-בית חב"ד.

אני יודע שהישראלים אינם נוטים לתרום לארגונים שונים. הם מרגישים טוב יותר לתרום ישירות לבית הלוחם ולמטרות ראויות אחרות שנוגעות לישראל. כדאי שתחשבו פעמיים: יש כאן ארגון אחד בלבד שדואג לישראלים ללא שאלות על רקע ומוצא, מקום שיקבל אתכם גם ללא תשלום בימים הנוראים, מקום שבו הסיסמא היא אהבת חינם. חב"ד הם ראשי תיבות של "חכמה, בינה ודעת". בעיני חב"ד הוא קודם כל "חמלה, בני אדם ודבקות במטרה". מנסיוני האישי-פגשתי שם אנשים חמי לב שמקיימים את דברי רבי עקיבא"ואהבת לרעך כמוך".

האירוע יתקיים ב 17 במאי, והטלפון לכרטיסים הוא

כוכב נולד בטורונטו

בניגוד לרצוני נאלצתי להיות מחוץ לטורונטו באותו ערב קסום שבו העלה ידידי שמעון זר אביב את טורונטו על המפה. שמעון עשה זאת פעמים רבות בעבר-הביא אמנות ובידור ישראלי לטורונטו, לא אחת תוך לקיחת סיכון אישי גבוה. אלא שהפעם הוא הפיק מופע שלם ומדהים של "כוכב נולד", כשהוא מוציא מן הקהילה את מיטב כשרונותיה-ומביא את תרבות ישראל ושירתה למאות רבות. מכל מה ששמעתי היה זה ערב מדהים, עם שלושה עשר מתמודדים. הזוכה, נעה גולן, התחרתה בזמרים כשרוניים ומוצלחים כמוה, והבחירה היתה קשה ביותר.

הישג זה מצטרף לשורה ארוכה של אירועים משמעותיים שמוכיחים שיש לנו קהילה ישראלית דינאמית ונושמת, שמעוניינת בקשר עם השורשים שלה, ורוצה לתת ביטוי לישראליות שלה. כל הברכות והמחמאות לשמעון, לקובי חי, ליצחק ארגמן ושאר העושים במלאכה. תודה מקרב לב גם משישאר בינינו.

מדינה בירידה

כותרות העיתונים זעקו השבוע מהסטטיסטיקה הקשה שזו השנה השלילית ביותר בהיסטוריה, שבה ירדו מישראל 5000 אנשים יותר מאשר עלו אליה. לפי הנתונים היו מרבית היורדים עולים מחבר העמים.

הידיעה העצובה הזאת לא יכולה להפתיע איש. שמונה חדשים אחרי שיותר ממליון ישראלים הרגישו בלתי מוגנים ונאלצו לישון במקלטים, לאחר שבערי צפון הארץ נורבו בתים רבים-די סביר שיקום אדם בבוקר ויגיד לאשתו-זה היה מספיק, זה הזמן לארוז. והעובדה שהרוב הם עולים חדשים שממילא בחלקם הגדול היגרו לישראל מסיבות כלכליות ולא מתוך אידיאולוגיה ציונית-אך טבעי הוא שימשיכו במסע ויצאו לצפון אמריקה.

בתמונה הגדלה-צריך להיות לישראל אינטרס לאומי לנסות לפתור את הקונפליקט עם הפלשתינאים. ללא פתרון הולם-תמשיך הירידה, כי ציבור יהודי מתקדם לא ישלים עם איכות חיים ירודה שקשורה באיום בטחוני. אני יכול להעיד שבשנים האחרונות פני אלי ישראלים שבחיים לא היתי מאמין שירצו לחיות מחוץ לישראל, וביקשו שאעזור להם במציאת עבודה רפואית, תוך שהם אומרים שאינם רוצים שילדיהם יגדלו בתנאים כאלה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Yoga and meditation

We all search for ways to make our lives less stressful.

I spend a good portion of my time with clients helping them find a couple of de-stressing techniques that they can incorporate into their daily routine to bring about a sense of calm, relaxation and joy.

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

So whether it's yoga or Pilates, laughing, running, aromatherapy, journal writing, meditation, prayer, or just soaking in a hot bath, reading or listening to calming music, take the time to find your quiet corner and introduce a de-stressing technique into your busy day.

For years, my de-stressing technique of choice has been yoga, which originated in ancient India. Some scholars have estimated that yoga is as old as 5,000 years.

Yoga is thriving today. A recent study in Yoga Journal found that 11 million North Americans do yoga at least occasionally and half of those people perform yoga regularly. The benefits of yoga are touted by Hollywood stars and Fortune 500 executives, and even prestigious schools of medicine have introduced yoga techniques as proven as therapies for illness and stress.

Natalia Brajak, co-director of Moksha Yoga Uptown, describes Moksha yoga as "a well-rounded discipline of traditional yoga postures practised in a room heated to about 40 degrees, for the benefit of stretching the muscles and tissues, detoxifying through sweating and, most of all, calming the nervous system."

When asked what is drawing so many people to yoga practice, Brajak replies: "It's the results, the general felt sense of improved experience of living their purpose, the experience of increased muscle tone, increased endurance, higher energy levels, better focus, and a sense of calmness that they can bring to their everyday interactions with people."

What is also interesting about yoga is there is an element of meditation within the yoga class that contributes to a person's overall sense of well-being, because there is a meditative element in the actual practice. "Because you're focusing on your breath, you're maintaining a still gaze, and you're encouraged to tune your attention inwards while you're holding the pose, which is the fundamental benefit of meditation," explains Brajak.

Meditation has been praised for its benefits in reducing stress-related conditions. In The Relaxation Response, Harvard cardiologist Herbert Benson demonstrates that meditation and breathing techniques for relaxation can reduce blood pressure and can have the opposite effect of stress.

Meditation is a wonderful relaxation technique because it teaches you how to breathe more effectively, how to focus, how to stay centred and, most importantly, how to stay calm in the storm.

A great place to start for beginners is to remember to breathe. Take in a full breath through your nose to the count of five, hold gently for five and then exhale to the count of five. Do this five to 10 times during the day to relax and recharge, and notice how much more objectively you can look at things once you have achieve that sense of calmness and serenity.

Find the relaxation strategy that works for you

Many of my clients have also reported great success with journal writing as a stress reducer. The consistency of having a place to surrender your worries and your joys every day becomes a meditation in itself, and it is a safe place you can go to that is all your own. This can be hugely liberating and comforting. A great way to get started is with Julia Cameron's book The Artist's Way, in which she offers tips on how to get started with the journaling process.

Pamper yourself with a massage or create your own aromatherapy spa at home. Draw a bath for yourself with candlelight and soft music and then read a favourite book and enjoy a beautiful night's sleep.

Plant some tulips, buy yourself a bouquet of spring flowers – surround yourself with flowers, they really do make you feel alive and renewed.

Whatever it is, tune in to yourself and find the relaxation strategy that most works for you. And remember, no matter what – when you're in traffic or in a long lineup at the grocery store – just breathe, and automatically your body and your mind will become more relaxed. Then reach into your relaxation toolbox and pull out the de-stressing technique works best for you.

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

A Summary of Emergency Allocations to Israel for Project Northern Recovery

Overview

UJA Federation is proud to present this accounting of funds invested in Israel, thanks to your extraordinary generosity, during and after last summer's war with Hezbollah which caused enormous strain and suffering. The distressing statistics: 159 Israeli lives lost after more than 4,000 rocket attacks over 34 days.

We thank you for contributing a remarkable $20 million for Israel's emergency needs during UJA Federation Campaign 2007. No other community in the world rushed to Israel's aid so quickly as soon as the war began, following Hezbollah's unprovoked attack. Through your commitment, we provided global leadership during Israel's hour of need.

INITIAL ALLOCATIONS

During the war and its immediate aftermath, UJA Federation allocated $5.5 million in immediate relief for the following initiatives:

- Operating summer camps in central Israel for children evacuated from the war zone;
- Respite trips to parts of Israel, outside of rocket range, for families confined to shelters in the north;
- Emergency equipment, food relief, and relief for families returning to their homes immediately following the ceasefire;
- Trauma services

POST-WAR FUNDING

Following the ceasefire, we adopted five operating principles to guide our allocations process:

- Increase impact: Concentrate on no more than four communities for a complementary blend of initiatives;
- Partner with strength: Work with those who proved to be the strongest in northern Israel, in order to support the most vulnerable;
- Act as a catalyst: Initiate innovative projects and partner with other funders committed to maintaining them beyond UJA Federation's short-term investment;
- Leverage Gifts: Ensure matching funds for all allocations;
- Value Added: Ensure that all allocations provide value-added benefit to the residents of northern Israel and do not replace Israeli government funding

UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

Funding for Israel's Secure Future

After our initial allocation of $5.5 million for Israel's urgent short-term needs during and right after the war with Hezbollah last summer, $14.5 million remains for distribution in the following ways:

Community Investments - $7.87 million: The communities of Acco, Hatzor HaGlilit and the Upper Galilee Regional Council have been chosen as three northern Israeli partners for multi-faceted initiatives to strengthen community leadership, bridge socio-economic gaps and attract a strong Jewish population to northern Israel.

The National Project - $3 million: An investment in a national Canadian initiative in cooperation with UIA Federations Canada on behalf of all Federations and regional Jewish communities across Canada.

Centres of Excellence - $1.23 million: This allocation involves an investment in two particular Kiryat Shmona projects with far reaching impact for northern Israel residents. The first is the Granovsky Auditorium - the only large cultural centre and movie theatre in the entire Galilee Panhandle. The second is the Renanim School - the only one exclusively for physically and developmentally handicapped children in the eastern Galilee. The school requires rebuilding after a direct hit from a Katyusha rocket.

Sderot - $ 500,000: The constant terrorist rocket fire afflicting the southern city of Sderot has caused untold trauma, death and destruction. UJA Federation will be allocating $500,000.00 to this stricken community as part of a national $1 million investment.

Unallocated - $1,900,000: These funds will be designated once UJA Federation of Greater Toronto carries out a final assessment of needs and resources available.

DOLLARS DOUBLED

We are proud to report that each dollar invested by UJA Federation has generated at least 1.5 matching dollars from our philanthropic partners, including some of Israel's corporate elite.

THANK YOU

During Israel Emergency Campaign 2007 you, once again, demonstrated the remarkable commitment and generosity of our community. We thank you for our community's extraordinary achievements on behalf of the people of Israel.

MKs spar over casting blame

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Opposition and coalition lawmakers sparred Monday ahead of the publication of a partial report by the committee probing the handling of the Second Lebanon War last year, with some censuring and others defending the government.

The partial report, covering the decision to go to war and its initial days, was delivered to Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz at 4 p.m. on Monday, with the Winograd Committee making its findings public at a press conference an hour later.

Likud faction chairman MK Gideon Sa'ar said Monday that "the Knesset has the important obligation to oversee the government, which refuses to take responsibility, and the prime minister, who has turned deflecting blame into an art form."

But the chairman of the Knesset constitution law and justice committee MK Menachem Ben-Sasson (Kadima) criticized the critics, saying Monday that "the self-serving politicians who constantly hound after headlines and attack the government without restraint, must be held accountable for their irresponsible behaviour since the Second Lebanon War and to this day."

"Much of the public believe that their representatives – the prime minister, public servants and Israel Defence Forces officials – acted out of one singular aspiration: to protect the country and its citizens, and bring the boys [the two soldiers abducted and held by Hezbollah] back home," he added.

But Labor faction chairman Yoram Marciano urged lawmakers to show restraint in the wake of the report's release, saying that censure would serve "the enemies of Israel."

Marciano called on the Knesset to "show responsibility and avoid harsh criticism in regard to the Winograd report."

According to Marciano, "criticism among us would be a victory for the enemies of Israel."

Some members of the coalition also called for the prime minister to step down. Labor MK Danny Yatom said Monday that "Olmert must take responsibility and resign."

A senior Kadima member said Sunday night that Olmert would eventually be asked by his party to step down as prime minister, in order to avoid "dragging the party down with him."

The Kadima source suggested that Olmert could be ousted after publication of the final Winograd report, which is due in the summer. According to the source, there is a potential majority – 15 of the party's 29 Knesset members – who would support Olmert's ouster.

Sources close to the prime minister also said Sunday that none of the Kadima leaders will call for Olmert's immediate removal from the party's leadership. The same sources said Olmert spoke with senior Kadima people and made it clear to them that he has no intention of resigning, and he demanded their support.

More specifically, none of the senior ministers who are considered to be Olmert's political rivals in the party, including Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, intend to take action against the prime minister, at least in the near future.

For the time being, Olmert's camp is adopting a strategy of spreading responsibility around for the Second Lebanon War in an effort to dilute the anticipated criticism of Olmert in the Winograd Committee's interim report.

Those close to Olmert said Sunday that it's "impossible to lay the blame on one person and assert that he is guilty of everything when all the ministers, all of Kadima and most of the Knesset backed him in going to war."

Media increased public's fear

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Comment

The media is one of the casualties of the Second Lebanon War. The public's fury has reached a peak. A Ha'aretz editorial, published in the wake of the findings of a special committee (of which I was a member) headed by president of the Israel Press Council and retired justice Dalia Dorner, elicited a barrage of hostile letters to the editor.

The major allegation is that the media coverage helped Hezbollah choose targets in Israel, supplied the Katyusha rocket launchers with pertinent data, divulged information on where the Israel Defence Forces were planning to attack, and demoralized the public and the soldiers. The military censor was accused of allowing the media to run wild.

IDF experts say that the charge about the media supplying Hezbollah with operational data is not true. Many leaks about IDF operations came from soldiers' cellphones and the SMS messages they sent from the battlefield, which their families then put on the Internet. On the whole, the army's secret objectives in the war remained secret, and if there were any leaks, the media's responsibility was almost nil.

On the other hand, the media were very much to blame for the despondent atmosphere that prevailed during the war. Most of the images were of families returning from funerals and casualties being transported to hospitals. Journalists stationed themselves at cemeteries and were sent out to interview rabbis delivering eulogies.

The media coverage was influenced by newspaper and television ratings. Competition focused not on the quality of the material, but on blaring headlines. Everyone was on the lookout for the most sensational, shocking scoop, for some daily scandal associated with the war and the IDF. Mostly, they fought to be the first to report on the IDF's latest failure, or on tragedies.

Thus, it can be said the media did play a part in increasing the public's fears. Journalists did not look for stories of heroism and courage, as they did in the past. During the war, these stories were pushed completely to the sidelines. The media made up for this only recently, on Memorial Day.

Israel is a democratic country with an open society, and its army is a people's army. That does not mean, however, that the country is obligated to throw open its doors, irresponsibly, to Arab media from enemy countries while a war is going on. It is hard to believe, but during the war, Al-Manar, a television station owned by Hezbollah, had a crew operating in Israel. An Arab television crew was allowed to cover the war for Alalam Iranian TV. Al Jazeera, Al-Arabiya and Al-Hurra reported from Israel during the war, as did crews from Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Abu Dhabi and Lebanon. Most of their accounts of the war were full of Nazi-style propaganda. Not all of them bothered to submit their footage to the censor. One can only imagine what would have happened to an Israeli television crew if it had showed up in Lebanon.

The media coverage of this war was not like that of previous wars. Unless we understand how methods of reporting have changed, we will not be prepared if something like this happens again. This war was covered around the clock, 24 hours a day. Sometimes the broadcasters had nothing new to report, but the patter went on and on, for fear that competitors from other news media would get ahead. This patter turned into an acute case of verbal diarrhea. The hunt began for people to interview, anybody they could get their hands, which only created more emotional distress.

Internet sites and personal blogs added to the deluge of information. On top of that, there were satellite services operated by the foreign media. Some 1,500 foreign correspondents reported on the war from Israel. We tend to forget that armies are not the only ones equipped with advanced technology. The news media has equipment it never had in the past, which makes it possible to relay information even before it reaches the General Staff.

Senior military officers, most of them retired generals, sat in the television studios dispensing advice about what should and should not be done. This is probably more than any future censor will be able to cope with. The answer cannot be panicky efforts to tap the phone conversations of officers who talk to journalists, as in fact happened. We need to prepare for future exigencies, and not rely on superficial plans.

Hamas: new intifadah could erupt

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hamas leader Khaled Meshal has warned that Israel could face another Palestinian uprising unless the West lifts its aid embargo and conditions in the Gaza Strip and West Bank improve.

Meshal told the Palestinian daily al-Ayyam in an interview published Monday that continuation of a western economic embargo of the Palestinian government and military actions by Israel would "give notice of a huge explosion that would not only affect the Palestinians but also the entire region, especially the Zionist entity."

Meshal also defended the firing of rockets, saying it's a response to Israeli killing of Palestinians, but told al-Ayyam he hopes a ceasefire can be expanded from Gaza to the West Bank.

Western powers imposed severe sanctions on the Palestinian Authority (PA) after Hamas came to power in March 2006, after beating Fatah in parliamentary elections.

"I warn and say that I see that the current situation is heading in the direction of the conditions that prevailed in the late 1990s… that paved the way for the Al-Aqsa intifadah," Meshal said. "I warn, and under 'warn,' I put many red lines."

Hamas formed a unity government last month with PA President Mahmoud Abbas' secular Fatah faction in a bid to end internal fighting and ease the year-old economic embargo.

But tensions between Hamas and Fatah remain high, particularly in the Gaza Strip, and a western ban on direct aid to the PA is still in place.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said on Sunday that Israel would take measures to stop Palestinian militants firing rockets from the Gaza Strip or attempting to infiltrate the Jewish state.

Meshal, who held talks with Abbas in Cairo on Friday, has criticized Arab countries for being slow to live up to financial commitments made to the Palestinians.

Israel Briefs

Gaza rocket fire persists

Palestinian rocket fire into Israel continued despite Egyptian efforts to stop the salvos. At least one rocket was launched from Gaza on Thursday, hours after Egyptian mediator Maj.-Gen. Burhan Hammad, told Israeli officials he had reached a deal with Palestinian terror groups to renew a truce declared in November. The latest attack caused no casualties, and there was no immediate claim of responsibility. According to Hammad, despite a Hamas declaration the putative ceasefire is over, the various terror groups wanted to return to relative calm. But he said they wanted the truce to extend to the West Bank, which Israel has said it will consider only if the terrorist threats from that territory diminish and the existing ceasefire in Gaza is actually kept. The ceasefire has been broken almost daily by rocket attacks on Israel.

Bishara faces charges

A former Israeli Arab MK is suspected of aiding the enemy during wartime, police said. An Israeli court allowed publication of details in the case against Azmi Bishara, who left the country weeks ago and then resigned from the Knesset from abroad, saying he was being persecuted by Israeli authorities. Bishara is suspected of aiding Israel's enemies during last year's war with Hezbollah and violating money-laundering laws. Police appeared to suggest Bishara has abetted Hezbollah, a Lebanese terror group with which he has openly sympathized. Bishara, 50, a fierce ideological opponent of Israel, denied the allegations. He hasn't said if he will return to Israel, saying he could be arrested and mired in lengthy prosecution. Another Arab MK, Hadash Chairman Mohammed Barakeh, said Bishara must return to face the charges. "We are members of Knesset. When we decided to run for the Knesset and were elected, we accepted the rules of the game, for better or for worse," Barakeh said.

Olmert may face charges

Israel's state comptroller called for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to be investigated on suspicions of cronyism. Micha Lindenstrauss asked Attorney General Menachem Mazuz to order a police probe of Olmert on suspicion that in 2003, while serving as industry and trade minister, Olmert illicitly helped a silicon factory obtain state subsidies. The factory was represented at the time by a lawyer considered an Olmert confidant. The prime minister, who has frequently sparred with Lindenstrauss over various allegations of impropriety, denied wrongdoing. Mazuz's office said he was considering the recommendation by Lindenstrauss. Olmert has been investigated several times on suspicion of various improprieties, but the probes have always come up empty.

Jews remember Yeltsin's historic role

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
JTA

MOSCOW — Boris Yeltsin, Russia's first popularly elected president, made a lasting impact on Russian Jewry, though his legacy included some controversy and tragic failures.

Russian Jewish leaders agree that the community should remember Yeltsin, who died Monday at age 76, primarily as the man who ended decades of state-sanctioned anti-Semitism in Russia.

"With Yeltsin's passing, a page is closed for the Jewish community, that of revolutionary changes in the life of Soviet and Russian Jewry," said Borukh Gorin, spokesperson for the Federations of Jewish Communities, Russia's largest Jewish group.

"Yeltsin was an important figure" for the Jewish community, said Mark Levin, executive director of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, a Washington-based group that works on behalf of Jews in the former Soviet Union. "His opening of the country allowed for the development of Jewish communities throughout Russia. His willingness to create a more open, democratic country certainly had an impact on the Jewish community."

Both of Russia's chief rabbis offered their condolences Monday to Yeltsin's wife, Naina, and daughter, Tatyana.

Mikhail Chlenov, who established Russia's first legal Jewish group in the early years of Yeltsin's rule, said Jews should remember Yeltsin as a great figure.

"It was his great achievement that the new Russia came to life without that evil called state anti-Semitism," said Chlenov, president of the Va'ad of Russia.

Others credit Yeltsin for allowing Jewish life to develop freely in Russia to an extent that was hard to imagine, even under his predecessor, Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev.

With American Jewish activists marking the 40th anniversary this year of the movement to free Soviet Jewry, it is notable that meaningful Jewish emigration began under Gorbachev, but it was Yeltsin who really opened the floodgates.

"While Gorbachev made freedom of emigration a reality for Soviet Jews, it was Yeltsin who made possible an unprecedented freedom of Jewish life in the country," Gorin said. "Jewish schools and new synagogues were opened – it was he who made the impossible possible."

Yeltsin was much criticized for economic policies that left millions of Russians living below the poverty line, but he was the "ultimate Russian president with a very Russian character," Gorin said. "It's no exaggeration to say we were blessed to have Yeltsin as president."

Another leading figure of the Russian Jewish renaissance during Yeltsin's presidency noted the fundamental changes in civil liberties and economic freedom that Yeltsin helped establish in Russia, changes that ultimately benefited Jews.

"I won't make a direct connection between Yeltsin's rule and Jewish life in Russia unless we take into account the maxim that the more freedom there is, the better it is for Jews," said Alexander Osovtsov, who served as executive vice-president of the Russian Jewish Congress from 1996 to 2000.

Boris Yeltsin

But Yeltsin's legacy was also filled with controversy.

"His resignation did not mean an immediate return of the things he demolished, but I cannot consider it accidental that during his rule, many people with anti-Semitic views came to power," Osovtsov said.

Osovtsov noted in particular Boris Mironov, an anti-Semitic publicist now on trial for hate speech, who served as press minister early in Yeltsin's tenure.

"This only underscores the controversies of this gigantic figure," said Osovtsov, who is now a liberal opposition activist.

At the same time, some observers said that controversial policies in the second half of Yeltsin's presidency – such as the escalating war in Chechnya and his decision to appoint a successor rather than have one elected – paved the rise to power for Vladimir Putin and the slide back toward authoritarianism that has been associated with his rule.

But Osovtsov said Yeltsin's legacy cannot be underestimated, since some of the fundamental changes associated with his reign, including the end of state-sponsored anti-Semitism, have continued long after he left the office.

Chlenov agreed that Yeltsin was a controversial and even tragic figure, which has become even more evident since he stepped down in December 1999 in favour of Putin.

Yeltsin successfully fought the predominance of communist ideology, but was unsuccessful in overcoming the influence of bureaucracy and powerful apparatchiks. Many of the negative trends in Russian political and public life since his resignation are a direct result of the unfinished struggle Yeltsin led, Chlenov said.

"These are these bureaucratic circles who are taking their revenge now," Chlenov said.

taking the government to war without allowing the ministers the possibility of making a choice.

Halutz is also expected to be criticized for preventing officers with dissenting opinions from speaking to decision-makers, and for not taking seriously the threat posed by the Katyusha rockets and the damage they could wreak on northern communities.

General criticism will also be directed at the entire cabinet for accepting the military's plans without evaluating them in detail and without asking for alternative suggestions.

The vast majority of the draft report focuses on the decision-making process that led to the war. The committee has limited itself in this report to analyzing the first five days of the war – from the Hezbollah attack and the abduction of reservists Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser on July 12, 2006, to July 17 and the prime minister's speech before the Knesset plenum.

Most of the events of the war – the failed military operations, the diplomatic moves, the defence of the home front, the decision to carry out a massive ground offensive in the two final days – are not discussed in the partial report.

Similarly, with the exception of Halutz, there is no severe criticism of senior individual officers in the report.

Another significant portion of the report deals with the period between the IDF's withdrawal from southern Lebanon in May 2000 and the outbreak of the war. During this period, Israel was attacked on a number of occasions by Hezbollah, but prime ministers Ehud Barak and Ariel Sharon, backed by senior IDF officers, adopted a policy of restraint and Israel's response was thus limited.

The committee is expected to issue a number of recommendations in its final report.

How to identify Jerusalemites by the type of hats they wear

Meanwhile, Yoel is caught by the interviewer using a cellphone. "Isn't this wrong?" the interviewer asks.

Yoel shrugs his shoulders guiltily. "Only the latest ones are," he replies.

This is an interesting, at times humorous look into this rather secretive sect of chassidic Jews.

It airs May 9 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema.

Last, but certainly not least, is a different documentary focusing on another group of Jerusalemites – hat wearers.

Hats of Jerusalem by Nati Adler posits an interesting thesis: Would we be able to tell Jerusalemites apart if it wasn't for their hats?

What might seem an odd concept for a documentary actually turns out to be quite intriguing.

Graffiti messages on the walls of the Neturei Karta community.

In the Orthodox quarter of Mea Shearim, for instance, you can see many different types of hats. The differences, some subtle, some not so subtle, speak volumes about the origin of the wearer.

For instance, Jews from Vishnitz have a bow on the right side of their hats. Jews from Belz wear the bow on the left. A "super" is actually a hat with a smaller brim worn by the Satmars.

The folds on the hat can also be different, but, the narrator says, this may not have any significant attachment.

The tradition of hat-wearing for the Chassidim probably goes back to 1215 when Pope Innocent ordered Jews to wear a "funny" hat in order to humiliate them.

In fact, the film argues, the fur-brimmed shtreiml still worn today has its origins in this humiliating edict.

No one interviewed in the film seems to know for sure where the shtreiml originated. Some say in Ukraine, others Poland, still others Holland. They all agree that the hat was meant to identify them as Jews.

Originally, the hats had a fur tail on the back, probably made of fox tail (perhaps to symbolize cunningness). The narrator discovers an old book of Dutch paintings showing medieval outcasts (lepers, disabled people) wearing foxtails.

Jewish men, of course, aren't the only ones wearing head coverings. The film also shows the different styles of head coverings Orthodox women wear.

It veers into other faiths as well, showing, for example, the different styles of hats Christian monks of various sects wear, and at times, the film seems to be stretching itself a bit thin. A scene at the Russian Orthodox convent doesn't go anywhere or explain the significance of the nuns' headgear.

On the other hand, the scene with the Armenian monks listening to heavy metal music was an unexpected dose of surrealism.

Overall, this documentary is surprisingly interesting. The next time I'm in Jerusalem, you can bet I'll be paying close attention to everyone's headgear – and maybe dropping by the Armenian quarter for some headbanging.

Hats of Jerusalem airs at the Al Green Theatre May 6 at 4 p.m. with the Turkish short The Lace Peddler.

Emergent director crafts compelling mysteries

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Fans of the classic murder mystery movie take note, there's a new Jewish writer/director on the scene and he's brimming with talent.

Albertan Michael Rothecker premiered his first feature-length film, The Poet, at last month's Canadian Filmmakers Festival in Toronto to a sold-out audience.

Jointly produced by Rothecker's company, Ninth Life Productions, and Alfa Nova Productions, the film was also runner-up for the Audience Appreciation Award at the festival. And for good reason.

With its gritty, minimalist look and eerie industrial score, Rothecker crafted a grim psychological thriller that keeps the viewer guessing through to its plot-twisting end.

Talking to The CJN last week, Rothecker admitted that he has a penchant for psycho-dramas, citing Alfred Hitchcock and Stanley Kubrick as his primary directorial influences and Charlie Kaufman as a writing role model.

It took Rothecker more than two years to put the film together, after adapting the screenplay from a story by Robert Schwartzmann, and it's laden with Hitchcockian trappings: the tilted camerawork, feverish close-ups and requisite descent into madness (or freedom?) for the main character.

Lead actor George Santino does double-duty, portraying both protagonist and villain with skill and nuance.

The Poet revolves around the lives of two men: one a massively popular, hedonistic poet, the other an everyday Joe (and the poet's physical doppelganger) who develops an unhealthy obsession with his more successful double's lifestyle.

But when it comes down to it, the movie is about the search for identity. And that's something Rothecker can easily identify with.

While growing up in Cochrane, Alta., "a town famous for its ice cream – I have no idea why," he said, Rothecker, 30, experienced his own identity crisis.

His parents divorced when he was two years old. His mother had initially converted to Judaism to marry his father, but he was "brought up in a sort of Catholic [but] a little bit Jewish household," Rothecker recalled.

From the time he was little, he felt he wasn't sure of his spiritual place. When he was 18, he went on a 10-month working trip to Israel sponsored by a Habonim Dror program, on a quest to define and find himself.

Michael Rothecker

He termed it "the biggest learning experience in my life," and it led him to filmmaking and a renewed sense of belonging.

"When I went to Israel, well… maybe there was a part of me trying to figure that stuff out, but I looked at it more as an opportunity to learn," he said. "[In Israel], I started writing screenplays and thinking of being a filmmaker. A lot of my [identity issues] came to light there. Identity is so integral to people, but can be someone's undoing if it's pursued to the nightmarish extreme" as viewed in The Poet, he said.

Rothecker admits that he doesn't practise and has not had a bar mitzvah, but he introduces himself as a Jew to everyone he meets and considers himself a spiritual Jew.

"Spiritually, if you go [to Israel] and you're a Christian, Muslim or Jew and you're not moved… then I don't think you're human," he said with a laugh.

Rothecker is currently at work on his next feature film, Pushover, which he said will follow similar themes to those in The Poet.

"Pushover is about a man who has a mental breakdown when he catches his wife having an affair. And he believes his reflection [in the mirror] is his other half who speaks to him," Rothecker said.

If it's anything like his directorial debut, it should cement Rothecker as a budding master of artful drama.

The Poet is available for purchase from the Canadian Filmmakers Distribution Centre at cfmdc@cfmdc.org.

Al Jolson Festival comes to Mississauga

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Though he's long since left this world to entertain on that great stage in the sky, Al Jolson's legendary vaudevillian and Broadway fame lingers on.

And doing his part to help to keep the "Jazz Singer's" flame alight is Leon Price, 74, a retired family lawyer living in Hamilton.

A longstanding member of the international Al Jolson Society, Price, who is Jewish, will see one of his dreams come true later this month, when the Al Jolson Society holds its first-ever Canadian Jolson Festival in Mississauga.

"I've been to many [Jolson] conventions, but I'm so pleased I get to co-host it in Canada," Price told The CJN by phone from his home last week. "The conventions are a lot of fun."

Price said he expects more than 150 Jolson acolytes to gather at the Stage West Hotel for the May 25 and 26 weekend convention. The event will feature performances by impersonators – Price refers to them as "sound-alikes" – collectors selling and trading memorabilia and auctions.

Jolson, who dubbed himself "The World's Greatest Entertainer," recorded more than 200 songs between 1911 and 1949, and is famous for popularizing musical standards such as April Showers, Swanee River and California Here I Come.

Price believes this year's convention is the perfect chance for fans both new and old to be reminded of Jolson's impact on the entertainment industry.

The Al Jolson Society website tells how Jolson was the first singer to have a "million-selling" recording for the song Sonny Boy in 1928 and how he coined the phrase "you ain't seen nuthin' yet" at a benefit performance for San Francisco's National Theater after the 1906 earthquake.

Though his mass popularity was unquestioned in his era, the singer also had his faults.

Even Price, who said he has "about 7,000 hours of Jolson material" and has been a fan since viewing The Jolson Story in 1946 as a teenager, admits to Jolson's difficult side.

"He had a monumental ego. Insufferable off-stage. And he was a philanderer… he married four times," Price said. "But we're interested in his image onstage and that likability. He was an electric presence. And in his will, he left his estate to charity."

However, Jolson's career was also marred by allegations of racism.

The singer-actor was famous for performing in "blackface," rubbing shoe-polish on his face and hands to approximate the look of African-Americans.

To some, this was unforgivable, to others, it was perceived as an homage to black performers who could not get the same recognition as white performers. But Price urges people to remember this in context.

"Everybody did blackface at the time," Price argued. "It was not meant to be demeaning. Jolson did not have a racist streak in him."

Jolson was born Asa Yoelson in the tiny village of Srednik in Russian Lithuania on May 26, 1885. He immigrated to the United States with his family, and they eventually settled in Washington, D.C.

His father was a cantor and wanted him to continue in the family tradition. But Jolson ran away from home to seek his fortune in show business.

Jolson died of a heart attack in 1950 in San Francisco.

Spinning toward success

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Combine downward dog and cobra pose with a high-intensity cardio workout on a stationary bike and you have the recipe for Spynga.

The 60-minute workout that harmonizes the traditions of yoga and the art of cycling is the inspiration behind Toronto's Spynga studio, which opened last month.

Brought together by a shared affinity for the monkey bars at Thornhill's Westminster Public School in Grade 6, Sari Nisker and Casey Schacter, both 32, have been best friends ever since.

In 1997, Schacter moved to Los Angeles to pursue an acting career. To counter the stress of Hollywood, Schacter became a regular at RPM studio, where she took six to seven cycling classes a week.

"L.A. is a crazy city. When I moved there, I only knew one person and cycling really helped me get through some stressful situations," she said.

In 2000, Nisker moved to New York to attend a merchandising program at the Fashion Institute of Technology. She began her career in marketing at L'Oreal, but resigned from the corporate world to pursue her true passion for fitness and teaching yoga.

A few years later, Nisker convinced Schacter to leave Los Angeles and join her in New York.

"She said she would try it for three months, and she ended up staying for over two years," Nisker said.

Both in New York and passionate about fitness, the girls encouraged each other to participate in their respective exercises of choice.

"She would beg me all the time to teach me and I'd say, 'But Sari, I can't do yoga.' Finally, she got me on the mat, and I really enjoyed her teaching, methods and began to see the benefits," Schacter said.

"People don't realize that yoga and cycling have a lot of similarities and how they can balance each other out. So, that's when we came up with the idea of Spynga," she added.

"Both cycling and yoga are journeys. When you're practising yoga, you get into a flow and you're in your own zone and that's the same for cycling.

They are about being in the present, being aware and being with your breath – your life force," Nisker said.

With the goal of sharing Spynga with the public, the girls decided to leave New York in 2005 and return to Toronto to focus on their dream of opening a private cycling and yoga studio, and after years of hard work, they are starting to enjoy the studio's acclaim.

Still, Nisker and Schacter remain humble. They feel honoured, privileged and lucky for the support they have received from friends and family.

"Sari and I have been so fortunate. Our family and friends, who we've grown up with, have really come through for us in ways we didn't imagine," Schacter said.

"Growing up Jewish, coming together is part of the culture. It's the spirit part of Judaism that really came through for us during this process," she added.

When it came to designing the Spynga studio, located at 1415 Bathurst St., Nisker and Schacter drew inspiration from their years in New York and Los Angeles, respectively.

"We wanted to create a beautiful environment that is unpretentious and calming. We want you to walk in, leave your world and relax," Nisker said.

Designed to resemble a contemporary art gallery, the white walls serve as a blank canvas to showcase the art of Patrick Kerney, this month's featured artist.

A black chandelier in the cycling room and a white chandelier in the yoga room establish the yin and yang of the space.

Many of the appointments in the studio are round, like the studio's logo, to symbolize the cyclical nature of life, Schacter said.

Except for the co-ed change room, the Spynga studio intentionally does not have mirrors.

"We want people to turn inward. It's not about the external and the material. And by not having the option of mirrors, it allows people the time to just be with themselves," Nisker said.

Debbie Drutz, 31, has been spinning for the last six years, both as a student and as certified spinning instructor. She met Nisker and Schacter more than 15 years ago when they were campers at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith.

After bumping into the girls a year ago, Drutz was encouraged to join the Spynga family. She teaches cycling to riders of all levels twice a week at the studio.

"What Sari and Casey are doing is amazing," Drutz said. "Casey is an avid spinner... she's an animal on the bike – it's phenomenal. And Sari is so passionate about people and promoting harmony through yoga. They are an incredible match and are truly going after their dream," she added.

Some of the workshops that will soon be available at their studio include beginner, kids and prenatal yoga, boomer boot camp and learn a language on a bike.

One of the more intense workshops offered at the studio is smoke-free Spynga. The six-week program is designed to help people quit smoking by integrating Spynga, nutritional counselling and message therapy.

With the launch of Spynga complete, these Toronto entrepreneurs are focused on sharing this new culture with as many people as possible.

"You have to dream big if you're going into business," Schacter said.

Canadian ex-Mossad agent recalls his career as a 'combatant'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Clad casually in blue jeans and an open-necked black shirt, with his chest hair showing and his eyes sparkling, Michael Ross looked every inch like a salt-of-the-earth kibbutznik enjoying a day trip to a big city.

This impression is not far-fetched. Twenty-five years ago, when he was 21, fresh out of the Canadian army and thousands of kilometres from his home in Victoria, B.C., he lived on a kibbutz in the Beit Shean Valley, where he tended to a cotton plantation.

But Ross, an Anglican convert to Judaism who joined the Israel Defence Forces, married an Israeli, obtained Israeli citizenship and sired a family in the Jewish state, was more than a farmer.

From 1988 until 2001, he was an undercover agent, a spy, in the Mossad, Israel's feared and respected external intelligence agency.

Recruited after his demobilization from the army, and formally inducted into the Mossad brotherhood after a rigorous one-year training program that many of his fellow candidates flunked, Ross was groomed to be "the ultimate weapon" in the Mossad's arsenal: a "combatant" in a shadowy unit that was originally formed to hunt down the Palestinian terrorists who took part in the massacre of Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich summer Olympics.

Disguised as a businessman and using foreign passports to enter Muslim countries such as Tunisia, Iran and Sudan, he was involved in a series of potentially risky missions to protect Israel from harm.

"Israel would be a lot less secure if the Mossad didn't exist," he said in an interview in Toronto to promote his book, The Volunteer: A Canadian's Secret Life in the Mossad, which was published last month by McClelland & Stewart and written with the assistance of Jonathan Kay, a managing editor at the National Post. "The Mossad has played an integral role in foiling attacks against Israel."

Now living in Victoria with his second wife and their daughter, Ross, self-composed and articulate, participated in a succession of dangerous, Hollywood-style missions, first as a field agent, then as a counter-terrorism liaison officer to the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation and, finally, as a covert agent in Africa and Southeast Asia.

Invariably, teamed up with a fellow agent, Ross worked on a wide variety of operations. He was tasked to verify the address of a Palestinian terrorist in Tunis, to blow up an Arab ship carrying Scud missiles to Syria, to size up Iran's nuclear program on Iranian territory, to collect information on Islamic terrorist organizations in Khartoum, to expose Hezbollah agents in the United States and Germany, and to discourage Iranian agents from buying advanced weapons in South Africa.

Michael Ross in an undated picture taken in Jerusalem

Judging by his account in The Volunteer, he never directly killed anyone in the line of duty. But a bomb he attached to a vehicle in Turkey, driven by a member of Hezbollah or of a radical Palestinian organization who had "blood on his hands," detonated and presumably obliterated its occupant.

"Sometimes, you have no recourse but to eliminate your enemy, a fact the rest of the world is waking up to," said Ross, who also participated in an operation to assassinate the leader of Islamic Jihad, Fathi Shiqaqi. The mission was scrubbed to avoid collateral damage, but the Mossad eventually killed Shiqaqi.

A freelance journalist since his return to Canada four years ago, he has contributed op-ed pieces on the Middle East and terrorism to the National Post and the Globe and Mail.

He wrote The Volunteer – which may yet be published in a Hebrew edition – as a platform to further his career in journalism and to articulate his views on the Middle East.

"There is a dearth of information on the Mideast, and I'm well qualified to speak about it," said Ross, who hopes to move into broadcasting as a talking head, and who currently lives off a family inheritance. "This was a unique story and it warrants attention."

Ross, who served under four Mossad directors, beginning with Nahum Admoni and ending with Ephraim Halevy, criticized Victor Ostrovsky, a Canadian veteran of the Mossad and author of By Way of Deception (1990). "Ostrovsky never finished his training course, and his book was calculated to cause damage to the Mossad," he claimed. "I've got more credibility and authenticity."

Describing The Volunteer as an unauthorized "personal story" rather than an "exposé," Ross said that it preserves state secrets and does not undermine Israel's security. "I've not given anything away," he said, noting that he left out far more than he included and that he also made "alterations" so that nothing "would hit too close to home."

Indeed, Michael Ross is probably not even his real name, he admitted. "I've had a lot of identities, and this name serves me well," he said insouciantly.

He declined to be photographed, saying that he prefers to retain a certain degree of anonymity, yet he permitted a publicist to send two photographs in which he is seen from a distance, one of which illustrates this article.

"I'm not really worried about the Iranians or Hezbollah," said Ross, who is fluent in Hebrew and whose first wife and two grown sons live in Israel. "I'm more concerned about someone who has strong anti-Semitic views and may be unstable."

He left Israel for a number of reasons, having grown tired of the hot weather, the endless traffic jams, the low wages, the "confiscatory" tax rates and the terrorism. But he regards himself as a "hard-core Zionist" and a committed Jew, keeps up with the news in Israel and does not rule out the possibility of returning to Israel one day.

He added, "Canada is my homeland. It's where I live and where my life is. But I have a huge affinity for Israel, which is my spiritual home."

A veteran of an armoured unit in the Canadian army, Ross arrived in Israel as a backpacker from Europe, intending to leave after a few months. But he fell in love with the country, identified with its struggles and felt a bond with Judaism. "Converting to Judaism wasn't made lightly," said Ross, who was a combat engineer in the Israeli army and served in southern Lebanon.

He never told his family in Canada about his Mossad connection, but he suspects that they had an inkling that he was not merely an Israeli government employee.

Looking back at his days in the Mossad, Ross said that he has no regrets, even though the stress and loneliness of being an agent in the field, often away from his wife and sons, tempted him to resign on at least two occasions.

"I believe everything happens for a purpose," he observed. "This was the path I was destined to travel on."

In a reference to political developments in the Middle East, Ross said that he worries about Iran's emergence as a regional power with nuclear ambitions, the growth of Islamic radicalism, Syria's acquisition of chemically tipped missiles, Hezbollah's rising influence in Lebanon and its storehouse of missiles, Israel's unending conflict with the Palestinians, the demographic threat resulting from a higher Palestinian birthrate and the spectre of trans-national terrorism.

He is definitely not impressed by the calibre of Israel's current leaders, saying that they mishandled last summer's war in Lebanon.

But at the end of the day, Ross is confident in Israel's ability to overcome serious challenges and survive. "I believe in the strength of Israel and, with wise leadership, Israel can contain the threats it faces."

Filmmaker looks at his father's obsession with bodybuilding

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Commercial lawyer Bill Friedman is the man of steel. He's got the moves and the muscles to prove it.

Trying to regain his title, World Grandmaster Champion of Bodybuilders, he's sporting a big red S on his barely there blue bikini.

Choreographed to Superman's theme song, he struts his stuff, flexing and posing before scores of screaming women showing off his well-toned bronze bod.

Looks like weeks of tough training, pectoral pain and buckets of sweat pay off.

Enter the competition. There's Jerry Shapiro, 54, of Toronto; Carl Krazner, 59, of Niagara Falls; and Dave Weinstock, 54, of Fort Lauderdale. All viable contenders. All in their 50s? Yes, Bill's 59!

Taking a break from his studies at the Bora Laskin library, Bryan Friedman meets me to discuss his newest flick, The Bodybuilder and I, a humorous look at his dad's obsession with bodybuilding and a sensitive approach to their strained father-son relationship.

Written and directed by Friedman, The Bodybuilder and I is co-produced by Julia Rosenberg – the première film from her production company, January Films – and Anita Lee of the National Film Board.

Recently screened at the Hot Docs film festival, the idea for his latest documentary emerged in a discussion between Friedman and Rosenberg.

"Julia was aware of my dad's bodybuilding hobby and our somewhat tense relationship. When she asked if I'd consider making it into a film, at first I thought it would be about geriatric bodybuilding, which was quirky and fun, but it became obvious it would also be about him and me," Friedman says.

His parents divorced when he was young, and he3 felt his relationship with his father was greatly affecting him. "I didn't know how to approach the situation – the walls were getting too thick to break through – so I decided to make a film about it."

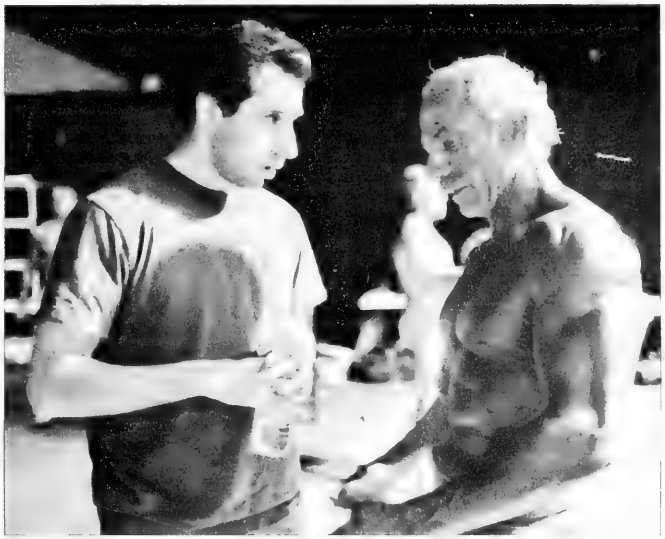
Friedman, 27, first showed an interest in film as a child. "It's a great escape. I always thought it was a wonderful way to enter a new world. I found solace in that," he says.

With a keen interest in books and movies, he wondered if he could be the teller rather than the listener.

A graduate of New York University's film school, Friedman began his career in Toronto at Serendipity Point Films in production and development, working on features like Being Julia and The Statement for associate producer, Rosenberg.

Searching for a creative project, Friedman, then 25, attended a four-day lecture series run by the National Film Board. "The NFB had a Momentum Program for emerging filmmakers with an opportunity to make and air a film on CBC." he recalls.

One of four proposals chosen in a hundred, Friedman wrote and directed Selwyn in 2005, a brilliant 12-minute documentary inspired by an Afro-Canadian denied entry into law school due to his LSAT scores.



Bryan Friedman, left, with his father Bill

Recognizing the inequities in the test, Selwyn Pieters fought for his rights. Losing his battle in court, he triumphed in the end – Osgoode Hall accepted him unconditionally.

Spectacular photography and soothing jazz draw the audience into Selwyn's compelling story.

Honing his talents, Friedman was a script analyst at Telefilm Canada and Canadian TV Fund, and at Rhombus Media, an associate in business affairs and legal, who worked in production and development.

In The Bodybuilder and I, Friedman enters into his father's world with hopes of understanding Bill's obsession and growing closer to him.

Friedman sees the extensive training his father undergoes with weight lifting and bench presses – all part of his daily dose of strain.

The filmmaker follows his dad to learn what's crucial when preparing for the competition. Bryan looks on while Bill goes on a shopping expedition for brown-rice cakes – part of his strict diet – selects the "right" soundtrack for his routine, "bakes" in front of hot tanning lights and practises stripping down to his custom-made Superman costume.

What Friedman discovers is the time and energy his father devotes to bodybuilding and becomes irritated by it. Old resentment starts to resurface. Why didn't his dad devote time and energy to him?

Through interviews with family members, Friedman brings to light the issues he has with his father.

In a poignant scene when Friedman is shooting basketballs, he reveals he's broken up with his girlfriend of six years because he fears marriage and fatherhood, believing he would repeat the mistakes his father made.

Once Bill Friedman realizes the impact his actions have on his son, it's a wake-up call.

Candidly his son asks, "Why did you take part in the film?" Bill answers, "I thought it was important to you. I knew it wouldn't be good for me. I wanted to help you."

Seen as a turning point in their relationship, Bryan reveals, "It's enough of a gesture to start taking the wall down between us."

What's significant to the filmmaker? That the audience realizes it's a son's perception of his father. "I had to be honest. It's not meant to be a character assassination," he says.

Instead Friedman hopes there's some universality in the film, that people can see value in it.

"If baggage is affecting your life, dealing with it is important – I can honestly say I feel a hundred pounds lighter."

When asked what he thinks of bodybuilding now, he replies, "It doesn't make sense to me, but there's something about bodybuilding – if you spend enough time with these men, you'll see the effort and the time it takes. My father's found a way of expressing his individuality which works for him. I think that's great."

Does Bill win the competition and regain the title he held in 2004? Friedman smiles, then laughs, saying, "They'll have to see The Bodybuilder and I to find out."

He is looking at his dad in a much different light these days. The end of the film provides a new beginning for him and his father. "Now I think I can learn from him," Friedman says.

Since Bryan Friedman is completing his first year at law school, he might be able to do just that!

Seven Years

Adapted from Midrash Zuta Ruth 4.

Asher picked up the heavy plowshare and heaved it into the ground. No, not deep enough. He wriggled the plowshare to get it out, and tried again.

It hadn't always been like this. Once, he had been a landowner himself. But hard times had come to him, and he had been forced to sell his landholdings, one after another. Now, to support his family, he plowed the fields of others.

Asher drove the plowshare into the soil. He bent over to inspect it. Good. He was about to begin plowing when a dark shadow fell over him.

An old nomad was standing above him. "I have seven years of goodness to give you," he declared, without further introduction. "Would you like them now, or later?"

Oh, great, thought Asher. It's one of those people who make predictions in exchange for money.

He looked up at the man. "I don't have anything for you. I'm sorry. Have a good day."

Asher returned to his plowing, and the man left. But not for long.

"I have seven years of goodness to give you. Would you like them now, or later?"

Asher looked up, annoyed. "I already told you I don't have any money for you. Please leave me alone."

Asher dug the plowshare into the hard earth and continued his work.

"I have seven years of goodness to give you," came the all-too-familiar voice.

Asher dropped the plowshare, exasperated. "Listen, Mister," he said. "I appreciate your predictions and all, but I – do – not – have – any – money – to – give – you. You are bothering me. Please, please let me work in peace."

"Would you like your years of goodness now or later?"

"Aaaargh! Enough! Thank God I have a lunch break now. I'm going to ask my wife what I should do with you!"

"You're not going to believe this, Hannah. I'm trying to do my job plowing, and this old man keeps coming over to me. He's dressed like a nomad, and he's giving me no peace, 'predicting' that we're going to have seven years of goodness. Then he asks when we want them, now or later. I can't work with him hovering over me like that. What do you think I should do with him? What should I tell him?"

Hannah thought for a minute. "Tell him we want the seven years of goodness now."

"You mean you think he's for real!"

"You never know. It could be Elijah the Prophet."

Asher shook his head. "Okay, I'll tell him. But Hannah, do me a favour. Don't tell the kids about this."

"Ah, there you are!" exclaimed the nomad. "So, when do you want your years of goodness, now or later?"

"I'll take them now, please."

The nomad nodded. "Return home. Before you even enter your yard you shall see the blessing."

For the first time all day, the man actually left. Wow, Hannah's advice worked! Asher realized. He was about to return to his plowing when he thought, Maybe it really was Elijah. Maybe we really are about to have seven years of goodness. Maybe…

And before he knew it, he was home again.

Hannah was waiting for him "Asher! Look!" her hands were overflowing with golden coins.

"Where did you get that?"

"The kids were digging up the yard, and they found a chest of gold!"

Asher raised his eyes. "Thank you God, for this gift! Thank you, thank you!"

"Asher," said Hannah, "since God has given us this great gift, shouldn't we share it with others? There's definitely enough gold to go around."

"What do you have in mind?"

"Well, the family down the block from us can't afford shoes for their children. It's painful to see them go around in the cold barefoot. Let's get them shoes."

"Agreed."

"And you know the old woman who lives up the hill? Her roof leaks terribly. Let's get her a new roof."

"Yes indeed," nodded Asher. "And Rafael the schoolteacher is marrying off his daughter next week, and I know how much debt they're in. We can help them too."

Hannah beamed. "That's the spirit!"

The years flew by. Asher and Hannah generously gave from their chest to whoever needed help. And Hannah was right. There really was enough gold to go around. Why, the chest was still almost full, Asher realized one day with amazement.

He was about to close the chest when a dark shadow fell over him. He looked up. It was the nomad.

Asher rose. "To what do I owe the honour of this visit?"

"Your seven years are up."

What? thought Asher with dread. But I still need to pay for the rooms I just added to my house! And the people we're helping, he realized with a start, who will help them?

"I only took the years of goodness on the advice of my wife," he finally said. "I can only return them with her consent."

The old man nodded, and waited while Asher ran to Hannah.

"Hannah, it's the old man again! The one who told me about the seven years. He says our time is up!"

Hannah smiled. "Tell him that if he can find anyone who will use the treasure better than we have, he is welcome to transfer it to them. But if not, I'm sure he will agree that the best place for it is right here."

And she was right.

Sharing family 'heirlooms'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Many of us have things that came from relatives long ago or far away, things such as candlesticks, menorahs, jewelry, prayer books or pictures.

Whatever they are, they are precious, not just in terms of money, but for what they mean to us.

Tami Lehman-Wilzig has begun a series called Jewish Heirloom Stories, about lessons we can learn from those inheritances. They are published by Gefen Books.

Mayer Aaron Levi and His Lemon Tree is one of the first books in the series.

Mayer Aaron Levi, his wife Raizel, their two sons and two daughters lived in a small village. Like their neighbours, they were very poor.

Mayer Aaron considered himself very lucky, though, because he had a lemon tree. He took very good care of it, keeping it in the proper size pot during the summer, and bringing it inside during the bad weather.

The tree gave a lot of lemons. He and the children would pick them and give them to Raizel to make into lemonade. The lemons were very important to Raizel, because Mayer Aaron could take the lemonade into town and sell it for money to buy clothes for the children.

All of a sudden, though, lemons started to disappear. Mayer Aaron didn't seem at all worried, but Raizel was very upset. She began to keep watch over the tree, and that seemed to stop the stealing. As soon as she came inside, it started all over again.

On Rosh Chodesh, the first day of the new month, Mayer Aaron was late coming home from shul. When he got back, he found several of his neighbours there, with presents. There was lemon tea, lemon pie and lemon pudding – all made from lemons from their tree.

It turned out that, without telling his wife, Mayer Aaron had been putting out a bucket of lemons, with a sign saying that people could take some. He felt that his family had enough, and it was only right to share with people who had even less than they did.

Now, you will probably think he had no business doing this without telling his wife. I certainly think so. But he probably thought she would be upset, and would stop him from giving away some of the lemons. Also, in those days, husbands often did things without telling their wives.

Mayer Aaron cut off four branches from the lemon tree and planted them in pots. He gave one to each of his children, and then each of them gave one to their children. The story was passed down, too, with the message from Mayer Aaron: "I want you to remember it and never forget to let others share your fruits."

The book is illustrated by Ksenia Topaz and shows how a small village in eastern Europe would have looked.

At the end of the book, Lehman-Wilzig has left a page for the readers to write about something that has been passed down to them and what they learned from it.

COUNTING THE LOSS

Grade 6 students at Bais Chaya Mushka Elementary School are collecting six million pennies to better comprehend the size of the loss suffered by the Jewish people during the Holocaust. The pennies will subsequently be donated to charity in memory of the six million who died. Here they display what they've collected so far. Feel free to send them your pennies – every penny counts!

Canadians no match for superior Israeli team in Fed Cup tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

KAMLOOPS, B.C. — After a wait of 35 years, Israel finally defeated Canada by winning three consecutive matches on Canadian soil in Fed Cup tennis.

The Israeli women's tennis team left no doubt which nation was superior by jumping to an unassailable 3-0 lead before losing the final two meaningless matches to win the Fed Cup matchup 3-2 late last month before 1,500 fans at the new indoor tennis facility in Kamloops, B.C.

The Israelis earned revenge in only the second meeting between the two nations in the 44-year history of the Fed Cup, an international women's tennis team competition. In 1972, the Canadians soundly thumped Israel 3-0, winning 36 games to only three by Israel in three matches.

Canada and Israel reversed roles this time, although the Canadians fought hard in the best-of-five format. Israel was led by 19-year-old Shahar Peer, ranked 16th in the world. The young army corporal won both her matches. Veteran Tzipi Obziler, ranked 90th, won the other to seal the victory.

With the win over Canada, Israel raised its world ranking to 12th from 14th among the 87 nations in Fed Cup and will advance to the World Group playoffs in July for a possible berth in the elite World Group of the top eight nations in 2008. Israel will play Austria.

Israel's Fed Cup victory over Canada is the best performance of any Israeli team ever on Canadian soil, eclipsing Harel Levy's runner-up finish at the 2000 Canadian Open tennis tournament and Jonathan Erlich's and Andy Ram's runners-up doubles finish at the 2005 Canadian Open.

Following the singing of Hatikvah and O Canada, Peer dominated the opening match by taking a 4-1 lead in the first set en route to defeating Stephanie Dubois 6-4, 6-4 in 90 minutes.

The second match between Obziler and Aleksandra Wozniak, ranked 107th in the world, was the most thrilling contest of all. Obziler led 4-0 in the opening set, but

Wozniak broke Obziler's serve twice and evened the set at 4-4. Obziler broke Wozniak once more to win the first set 6-4.

Buoyed by the enthusiasm of the crowd, Wozniak took a 5-4 lead in the second set, trading serves with her opponent and broke Obziler at love in the 10th game to take the second set 6-4.

In the final set, it wasn't the 34-year-old Obziler who tired but 19-year-old Wozniak. Obziler broke Wozniak in the seventh game for a 4-3 lead and won her remaining service games for her 6-4, 4-6, 6-4 victory.

"I just kept believing I could win right up until the last point, and I think it was my confidence and experience that made the difference, " Obziler said after her victory.

The following day, Peer made sure there would be no Canadian comeback by sealing the victory for Israel in the third match with a 6-4, 6-0 win over Wozniak. Despite dropping her first serve in the opening set, Peer rallied for a 3-2 lead and broke Wozniak in the 10th game to take the first set. After that, she went on cruise control to win all games in the final set.

Following hugs and proudly showcasing the Israeli flag on court after winning the overall matchup, Peer, although jubilant, took the victory in perspective, noting the day was one of mourning in Israel.

"Today [April 22] is a sad day for us in Israel as we mourn those who lost their lives in our many battles. I hope this victory will make the day a little happier for us," Peer said on court after her second match.

"I played the big points better and that made the difference in both my matches. This is the best Fed Cup team ever for Israel, and I am proud to be part of it," she said.

Peer has now gone undefeated in 11 Fed Cup matches dating back to April 2005. Her ability to fight has given her star status on the women's tennis circuit and has boosted Israel's ranking to among the world's top tennis nations. Israel has now won nine Fed Cup matchups in a row.

Canada won the final two dead rubber matches to finish by losing 3-2. With a victory no longer at stake, both teams used reserve players at the finish. Marie-Eve Pelletier defeated 17-year-old Israeli Julia Glushko 6-1, 6-1 in the fourth match and in the final match, Dubois/Pelletier defeated Obziler/Peer 6-3, 4-6, 7-5 in doubles.

Although Anna Smashnova was on the Israeli team, she didn't play. Smashnova probably made her last trip to Canada, as the 30-year-old veteran of a record 61 Fed Cup matches in 15 years plans to retire after playing Wimbledon in June. Smashnova has won 12 titles in her career – the most of any Israeli in tennis – and is second all time among Jewish players behind American Julie Heldman, who won 25 titles.

"Israel won because of Shahar Peer, and one of Shahar's best attributes is her mental aspect. She fights very hard and that's how she wins a good percentage of her matches," said American Vania King, Peer's doubles partner at tournaments.

"She's prepared to go out there and play as long as it takes to get a win."

Peer's outstanding play over the past 12 months – a semi-final finish at the Miami Sony Ericsson Open, quarter-final finishes at the Australian and French opens, a quarter-final finish at the Rogers Cup last August in Montreal, in addition to her stellar play in Fed Cup action – has given her celebrity status in Israel. Peer regularly gets calls from Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, congratulating her on her victories.

"Everywhere I go in Israel, people see me, know me and congratulate me on my efforts. I was delighted to know that the prime minister watches all my matches," said Peer.

TWO DECADES OF CARING

Chabad's Children of Chernobyl (COC) airlifted 16 children to Israel last week from the irradiated danger zones in Belarus and Ukraine affected by the nuclear accident in Chernobyl 21 years ago. This brings to 2,462 the number of children brought to Israel by COC under the auspices of Chabad Youth Organization. While in Israel, the children live in Kfar Chabad, where they receive medical care, schooling and other support. Most settle in Israel permanently following the aliyah of their parents.

A Family Business for over 60 Years

Dear Ella,

I am single, and although many people assume that I am older, I'm only 19. All my friends are older, and even my closest girlfriend is 25. Right now I am working, but I am starting university in September and am living at home.

I met this guy at the place I work. Our initial conversation was memorable, to say the least. We seemed to really get along. When I told my girlfriend about him, it turned out that she knew him. She told me he was about 30 years old.

He asked me to join him at his place on Shabbat, and I did. We were able to talk all day with no distractions. We really hit it off. I know he has some years on me, but I want to see where this can lead. He knows I'm younger than him, but he doesn't know how much younger. I've had poor judgement with relationships in the past and I don't want to lose this chance just because of my age. Do you think I have to tell him now? Can we have time to get to know each other first?

Torn

Dear Torn

A relationship is something that needs to be built, much like a building. Without a strong foundation, both will fall apart. Trust is the mortar that keeps people together. When you lose trust, you have very little reason to continue. As you mentioned, you are only 19 and all the people you hang out with are older.

About Life

A man who is 30 has very different goals from a girl who is 19. It doesn't mean it won't work. It just gives you both a big stumbling block to get over from the very start. It's not the actual age difference per se that's the problem, it's where you both are in your lives. You are just starting school, but where is he? Has he finished his education? Is he working? Does he own or rent his own apartment while you still live at home? Has he done all the preliminary life-building while you're just starting to embark on yours?

All these things add pressure to a relationship. Times are tough, and you have the best shot if you start out honestly and try to think with your head, not just with your heart. At 19, that's not always so easy. Come clean. If this relationship is meant to survive, it will. In the meantime, stay focused on your schooling and don't compromise the well-rounded person you are trying to become.

Learning from Righteous Gentiles

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Much has been written about Righteous Gentiles, non-Jews who risked their lives, and frequently the lives of their families, to save Jews during the Holocaust. Their daring acts of kindness showed the world that a choice can be made to be heroic and ethical in the face of danger and threats all around. Every Righteous Gentile is a role model for bravery and should be studied and emulated, especially with genocides being all too common today.

While reading this year's "Footnotes: Travel Diary for the March of the Living," an exceptional publication developed for the program's participants, I learned more about Righteous Gentiles and some of the facts behind these very bold individuals and nations.

More than 21,700 people, a number that includes family members of those who shared in the rescue of Jews, have been recognized as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem, representing more than 8,000 authenticated rescue stories. And of the 40 nations listed by Yad Vashem as countries with citizens named as Righteous Among the Nations, Poland leads the list with 5,632 names.

I grew up learning that all Poles were wicked and entirely complicit in the Nazi war effort. Yet, after seeing these numbers and hearing from numerous Holocaust survivors about their decent Polish neighbours, it appears that many of these eastern European nationals had consciences.

Did you know that the entire Danish people is honoured at Yad Vashem for its collective courage? Denmark's story is magnificent and should be read over and over to show others what it takes to be a nation of good people.

Within three weeks of the Nazi deportation order, nearly all Danish Jews were hidden or smuggled from occupied Denmark into neutral Sweden. Christian ministers encouraged resistance from their pulpits, and university students went on strike. All of the 117 citizens of the Dutch village of Nieuwlindde agreed to hide at least one Jew, and many people often hid entire families. Each villager is honoured at Yad Vashem.

We should put these villagers' actions under a microscope of universal introspection. We might just discover the secret to achieving world peace.

And what of the nuns of the Benedictine Convent in Vilnius, Lithuania, who afforded safe haven to members of the Jewish underground and dressed them in their habits to disguise them from the Nazis? Have you read about them?

I cried when I read about Mother Maria of France who, after being deported to Ravensbruck for rescuing Jewish children, exchanged her identity papers with a Jewish woman in order to save that woman's life. My God! How brave can a person be? How holy must Mother Maria have been to make the ultimate sacrifice? Let us learn from the life of Mother Maria. We might ascertain the secret of love.

Would I have been a "righteous Jew"? I don't know. Would you have been? Until one is faced with the choice of saving another person while putting one's life in peril, it's difficult to say.

One thing that is clear, however, is that the citizens of Nieuwlindde held on tightly to their principles and remained forever aware that the skeletal bodies reaching out to them in Europe were human beings, not the marginalized "vermin" that the Nazi propaganda machine portrayed them to be.

Righteous Gentiles were heroic not only because of their actions, but because they remained true to their conscience and individuality even when faced with the harshest tests of human existence.

We must learn from Righteous Gentiles how to be righteous Jews, as many such skeletons still walk the streets – and the dirt roads of Darfur – and cry out to be saved.

Bless the Righteous Gentile. Thank them for a lesson in valour.

(Every Jew must be a warrior. Visit www.jew-watch.com to see why.)
